Lukanov also said that at present negotiations are being held between companies covering several important cooperation projects. These include the construction of a pulp and paper factory, a copper foundry and other projects in the mining industry.

Lukanov also said Wednesday that negotiations are going on for the construction of holiday villages in Bulgaria. Apart from this, efforts are being made to increase tourism, for example, by opening an air route between Finland and the areas by the Black Sea during the season.

The new cooperation program is unusual in that Finland has no comparable program with any other country, apart from the Soviet Union. The program includes all current cooperation projects between Finland and Bulgaria. Within the framework of the agreement, it has also been decided that Finland and Bulgaria will look into the possibility of cooperation projects in third countries.

Trade between Finland and Bulgaria has doubled in the last 2 years, and it looks as if this swift growth trend will also continue this year, Foreign Ministry Foreign Trade Department Chief Pauli Opas said.

The value of Finnish exports to Bulgaria amounted last year to 61 million markkaa, while imports totalled 67 million markkaa.

On Wednesday it also became clear that the deliveries of equipment for the copper foundry mentioned in the agreement will begin this fall. The value of the deal is around 200 million markkaa.

Deputy government chief Lukanov has been paying an official visit to Finland at the invitation of Rekola. During his visit, Lukanov has met with Prime Minister Mauno Koivisto, Foreign Minister Paavo Vaeyrynen, and Finnish Bank Director in Chief Ahti Karualainen. Lukanov returned home Wednesday evening.

FRG CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT TO VISIT NORWAY 28 AUG

LD220959 Helsinki International Service in English 0830 GMT 22 Aug 81

[Text] West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt will pay an official visit to Norway from Friday next onwards [28 Aug]. This visit, at the invitation of the Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland, will be the fourth yearly meeting between the prime minister of Norway and the German chancellor. Last September, Mr Schmidt met then Prime Minister Odvar Nordli in Federal Germany.

ARMY TO BUY SWEDISH ANTIAIRCRAFT MISSILES

PM251020 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 29 Jul 81 p 5

[Olav Trygge Storvik report: "Antiaircraft Missiles in the North for 130 Million"]

[Excerpt] The army has just signed a contract for the purchase of Swedish RBS-70 low-level antiaircraf missiles for a total of 130 million kroner, Maj Gen E. Jorgensen of the Armed Forces Supply Command announced.

The contract signed with the Swedish firms Befors and L.M. Ericson will also mean reciprocal purchases from the Kongsberg Vaapenfabrikk factory in Narvik worth 50 million kroner. This time the purchase is of the minimum amount of antiaircraft equipment needed for a brigade, that is, one battery, and for a smaller coastal artillery unit. Last year, Swedish low-level missiles worth 100 million kroner were bought from Bofors. They have already been supplied to the north Norway brigade and the artillery regiment's college and exercise unit at Haslemoen. It has still not been decided where the new battery will be deployed. The head of the Armed Forces is still looking into the question. But, according to AFTENPOSTEN's information, both Bardufoss and Andoeya airfields are being considered.

The Swedish RBS-70 missile has a short range, limited to 5 km. The missiles are fired at attacking aircraft from the ground and are steered towards their targets manually with the help of laser beams and a gyrostabilized optical sight. The firing unit with its missile can be dismantled and can be carried by three men.

The agreement which has been reached means that the Swedes will have to make reciprocal purchases worth 50 million kroner from the Kongsberg Vaapenfabrikk factory in Narvik, Major General Jorgensen said. The army is very interested in building up technical competence at this factory for reasons of combat readiness, but regional employment policy considerations have also played a part in awarding the contract to the Narvik factory.

IRANIAN STUDENT ARRESTS PROTESTED IN STOCKHOLM

[Text] Stockholm, 25 Aug (AFP)--About 100 Iranian students demonstrated outside Stockholm Central Prison today to protest the arrest of 35 anti-Khomeyni Iranians who occupied the home of Tehran's ambassador here yesterday.

Iranian ambassador to Sweden 'Abdol Rahim Govahi and his wife were freed unharmed by police yesterday after being held for six hours in their suburban villa by the group of unarmed Iranian leftists.

The students, who were still being held by police today on charges of violating diplomatic property and destroying dossiers, had condemned the "massive executions" in Iran and called for the creation of an international commission to probe the fate of political opponents of Iran's Islamic regime.

Commenting on the occupation, Swedish Foreign Minister Ota Ullsten said in a radio interview today that "the expeditive verdicts and executions taking place in Iran are incompatible with the Swedish idea of justice." He added, however that Stockholm could not tolerate occupations of diplomatic missions.

Iranian students have been occupying their country's missions in various foreign capitals to protest the strongarm regime of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni. Brief occupations of the Iranian Embassies in Brussels and The Hague were staged today in the latest such actions.

Hunger Strike Reported

[Text] Stockholm, 26 Aug (AFP)--Thirty-six Iranian dissident students arrested after occupying their country's diplomatic mission here on Monday and holding the ambassador and his wife prisoner for six hours, have gone on hunger strike, their lawyer said today. He said the strike was to protest against the conditions of their detention in Stockholm's penitentiary, where they were being held in isolation without being allowed to see one another.

The students, who were unarmed when they staged the embassy raid to draw attention to mass exeuctions and persecution of the Iranian opposition in their homeland, are likely to be tried for illegal restraint of the ambassador and his wife, the lawyer indicated.

DAGENS NYHETER URGES 'STORM OF PROTEST' ON N-BOMB

[Olof Santesson editorial: "Reagan's Bomb Gambit"]

[Text] The U.S. decision to manufacture the neutron bomb is both depressing and worrying. But it should come as no surprise. President Ronald REagan has in no way concealed the fact that one of his most important objectives is the rearming of the U.S. combat forces. The promises of new arms were an important part of the picture he tried to give of himself as presidential candidate, the image with which he also quite rightly was able to triumph over Jimmy Carter.

We are forced to accept that no weighty voices of U.S. protest will be raised after the disclosure about the neutron bomb. The atmosphere in the United States today is not exactly favorable for disarmament endeavors. The political opposition to Reagan's line, which nevertheless exists, is at present almost paralyzed by his successful domestic policy maneuvering.

The new hard-boiled attitude which in the present situation permeates the U.S. security policy debate is of course fueled by the actions of the major U.S. antagonist, the Soviet Union.

The different disarmament demarches from Soviet President Brezhnev are seen--especially in the United States--as pure propaganda gestures, which to a large extent they are. But they look all the more closely at what he's doing--the SS-20 missiles and the aircraft known as the Backfire in the West are the most important examples of the fact that enormous Soviet rearmament is taking place, year after year, in the field of nuclear arms and in the field of so-called conventional military weapons.

Not even Reagan and his closest advisers can be unaware, however, that the neutron bomb in particular has become a controversial nuclear weapon. They cannot even agree among themselves.

The background to the new U.S. decision is one of the most sensitive chapters in an increasingly messy tale of the relations between the United States and its allies in West Europe. Jimmy Carter made things difficult for other Western governments by originally deciding to invest in the neutron weapon. He hardly made things easier for them when through a similarly one-sided decision he later suddenly abandoned the idea of producing any neutron bombs. Pressurized West European statesmen simply could not keep up with the swings in the arguments.

Many champions of peace and disarmament imagined that it was a strong body of popular opinion which caused Jimmy Carter to back off.

Among all the varieties of nuclear weapons, the neutron bomb, to use Olof Palme's commentary, appears to be an "unusually repulsive weapon" with its effect of a slow death through radiation. One ghastly point of the device, which is not a "bomb" but an artillery shell or a warhead on a rocket, is that with its intensified radiation at a given strength, it kills people without the same gigantic material devastation as other nuclear weapons. (it is absolute rubbish that no damage at all is done to houses and plants.)

The inventors of the neutron bomb have always stressed its suitability as a counter for a side inferior in conventional arms (the West) to steamrollering tank attacks (the East). For with such a weapon the nuclear threshold is lowered in a horrifying way. This prospect has made not only broad popular groups react vehemently. Even a number of establishment figures in the West have attacked the whole of the senseless thinking behind the neutron bomb and other short-range arms--the notion that it would be possible to fight limited wars with them without ending up in an armageddon.

Unfortunately, there is also a myth among more or less pronounced hawks in the West that it was not Western public opinion which made Carter retreat, but rather a skillful Soviet campaign. In propaganda terms, the Soviet Union has mobilized enormous resources against the neutron bomb--this much is true. When a U.S. President now brings back the neutron bomb, it is presumably intended as an indication of the political strength Western leaders looked for in Jimmy Carter. It is to make it clear that it is too late for the Soviet Union to try to launch a psychological counteroffensive.

The United States stresses that it is a question of a U.S. decision. The announcement seems to have taken place before the allies were informed. Some governments, the Norwegian and Danish, have expressed the same well-founded criticism of this foolish new arms gambit as representatives of Swedish opinion. Others are mumbling, possibly relieved at not having to accept some of the responsibility. As usual, when new arms systems are concerned, the Americans are also saying that it could help to force new arms limitation agreements, if the Soviet Union only becomes sufficiently alarmed.

In the twisted world of the superpowers, armaments can sometimes work in this way. For the hosts of peace marchers, and others who ardently hope for some sort of rethinking over the weapons of lunacy, however, Reagan's announcement is a cold shower.

The originator himself has gone on vacation. At the present moment, he is politically strong enough to make the most fateful decisions without any great reflection or concern for tomorrow. But all the difficult questions surrounding arms and the survival of the world will still be there when he returns. Ronald Reagan has no solutions to offer other than the policy of strength. The self-preservation instinct forces people to find other paths to the security we all seek. May a new storm of protest break loose.

S. AFRICAN AMBASSADOR SUMMONED OVER INCURSION

LD261340 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1300 GMT 26 Aug 81

[Excerpts] South Africa's ambassador to London was summoned to the Foreign Office today and told his country's troops should be withdrawn immediately from Angola. The ambassador, Mr Marais Steyn, saw a senior official, Sir Leonard Allinson, who is responsible for African affairs. In a ten-minute meeting Britain made its displeasure apparent at the South African action in sending troops into Angola.

A statement issued afterwards said Britian deplored the South African action, "the consequences of which could be highly dangerous for stability in southern Africa." "We trust that the current action will be terminated and South African troops withdrawn immediately from Angola."

The statement said Britain could not confirm precise details of reports of the fighting, "but it is evident that military activities have escalated in the last two days, and that there has been a substantial South African incursion into Angola." It recalled that Britain had repeatedly condemned violence in the region, from whichever quarter it came, and that Deputy Foreign Secretary Sir Ian Gilmour told the South African ambassador two weeks ago of Britain's concern at the escalation of military activities in the area.

TELEGRAPH PRAISES U.S. RESPONSE TO LIBYANS

[Editorial: "Lesson From America"--passages within slantlines denote boldface as purblished]

[Text] President Reagan's decision that naval exercises should be resumed in the Gulf of Sidra and that American aircraft should return fire if attacked was a calculated and confident act of leadership of a kind to which the world must learn to become accustomed. The impact was dramatised by the fact that two Libyan aircraft were foolish enough to make such an attack--according to Col al-Qadhdhafi without orders to do so, although there have been several instances of similar ineffectual but unpunished attacks in the past. The underlying momentous import for the free world was further obstructed and trivialised by the grotesque concentration of much of the American media on such subjects as the exact time at which Mr Reagan cleaned his teeth before retiring at night.

There was also, from the same quarter, a barrage of scepticism about what really happened which spread around the world and, even in allied Europe, was too often and too eagerly taken at its face value and embellished. Did the Libyan pilots /really/ shoot first? In any case, did Mr Reagan deliberately /invite/ trouble, strolling down Gun Alley rarin' to show he is the fastest gun in the Med? Didn't the Tomcat pilots tempt the Libyans by pretending to be asleep? This unique combination of legitimate probing and malicious innuendo has by now been swept aside for all reasonable people. Col al-Qadhdhafi admitted, nay, claimed, indeed boasted, that his men shot first. Mr Reagan's "Why wake me when the other fellows were shot down?" restored a sane perspective. The remarkable press conference on the Nimitz clinched the matter.

Mr Reagan was doing more than making a very necessary assertion of international rights in the Gulf of Sidra. He was also warning not only the maniacally ambitious Al-Qadhdhafi but also Russia, who continues to pile up sophisticated arms in his Libya, to "watch it." Russia's relative reticence over the whole affair reflects a healthy caution about involvement in support of her unstable client. Mr Haig has been quick to pass the general message on to Castro. But above all Reagan has signalled the end of an era, personified by the pre-Afghanistan Mr Carter, when "power" was a dirty and shameful word and its use, for whatever purpose, however legitimate, was considered immoral. America is back in legitimate power politics under enlightened, resolute, democratic management. We should all be deeply grateful.

IRAQ, IRAN EXCHANGE PRISONERS AT LARNACA

[Text] Nicosia, 25 Aug (AFP)--Iran and Iraq exchanged prisoners captured in the Gulf war at Larnaca airport here today under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross. Forty-five Iraqis arrived aboard a Swiss plane. They were swapped for 40 Iranians.

The Iranian prisoners were reticent after their liberation, but the Iraqis clearly showed their joy to be free again. Today's exchange was the second at Larnaca during the 11 months of fighting between Iran and Iraq.

GREEK COMMERCE MINISTER DEPARTS, MAKES STATEMENT

NC251540 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1400 GMT 25 Aug 81

[Text] Greek Commerce Minister Kalantzakos has left Cyprus where he had a 2-day official visit at the invitation of Mr Kittis, the republic's commerce minister.

In a statement at Larnaca airport, Mr Kalantzakos stressed that during the talks with Mr Kittis, the joint decision for cooperation was renewed aimed at boosting bilateral commercial and economic relations. The Greek commerce minister said: During the examination of the problems we explored the possibility of encouraging private initiative in the private investment sector and the creation of joint enterprises to develop Cypriot productivity aimed at the Arab countries.

Mr Kalantzakos further said: We examined the possibility of establishing sea transportation among Greece, Cyprus and Arab countries. We also discussed Cyprus' association with the EEC, and we jointly decided to maintain close contact to deal with the issues arising from Greece's entry into the EEC. Mr Kalantzakos also said that it was decided to organize exhibitions in Cyprus where the Greek products will be introduced and corresponding exhibitions in Greece where the Cypriot products will be exhibited. Mr Kalantzakos further said: We also considered it imperative to organize seminars where the prospects that are being set forth for the two countries' economic and commercial development will be studied. A joint Chamber of Commerce committee has been recommended toward this aim. Lastly, the Greek commerce minister addressed to the Cypriot people greetings of love and admiration and wishes that their aspirations and expectations may be vindicated.

Mr Kalantzakos was seen off at the airport by Commerce Minister Kittis, Greek Ambassador to Nicsoia Zakharakis and other officials.

GREEK CYPRIOT SIDE SUBMITS VIEWS ON PROPOSALS

[Text] A new meeting was held this afternoon at the Ledra Palace Hotel within the framework of the intercommunal talks. During today's meeting, Greek Cypriot side's representative Ioannidhis delivered to Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan an aide-memoire explaining the Greek Cypriot side's views on the Turkish Cypriot proposals.

A UN communique says that the Turkish Cypriot side will put forward its comments on the Greek Cypriot side's views at a suitable time. The communique also says that, during the meeting, all four questions on the agenda were discussed in rotation--that is, resettlement at Varosha; initial practical measures; and the constitutional and the territorial aspects. There will be another meeting next Wednesday at 1700. In a statement prior to today's meeting, Mr Gobbi, UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, said that because the talks are in a very delicate phase, he would not like to make any comment at present.

He added: Sometimes my comment has been misinterpreted; even my optimism has been considered as a misleading factor.

The only thing I would like to stress, Mr Gobbi said, is that I had a very constructive dialogue with Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen and I believe that he favors an indepth discussion on all aspects of the Cyprus problem, and he hopes for progress in the talks. Asked whether he has discussed with Mr Turkmen the question of the presence of Turkish troops in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi said: As I said at the beginning, I am not going to make comments at the present stage.

Mr Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, answering a question as to whether the Turkish Cypriot proposals provide a basis for negotiations, said he could not comment on them publicly. Asked whether the Greek Cypriot side has prepared counterproposals, Mr Ioannidhis again said he could not disclose anything. Asked whether he ruled out the possibility of submission of counterproposals, Mr Ioannidhis said: I do not rule it out; everything is possible during the talks.

In his statement, Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan said that during today's meeting he expected to hear the views, comments or even the proposals of the Greek Cypriot side on the proposals which the Turkish Cypriot side submitted on 5 August. Answering a question, Mr Onan said that the Turkish Cypriot leadership had an indepth discussion on developments with Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen, and added that there is nothing new. He added: The way in which Mr Turkmen approaches the problem is that we must do everything we can until a Cyprus settlement is achieved.

Answering another question, Mr Onan said that the proposals which he has submitted on the territorial and the constitutional aspects of the Cyprus problem are open to discussion. Asked to what extent the proposals are open to discussion, Mr Onan said that he was going to discuss this question with Mr Ioannidhis, after listening first to the Greek Cypriot side's view.

SPOKESMAN REFUTES TURKMEN CLAIM ON UN RECOURSE

[Text] Yesterday, the government spokesman avoided commenting on Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen's statement made 2 days ago on the Turkish Cypriot proposals on the Cyprus problem and other relevant issues. The spokesman stressed that the Cyprus Government's views on the Turkish proposals are well known and have been put forth by President Kiprianou.

The spokesman denied Turkmen's claim that there is agreement that the Cyprus Government will not seek recourse to the United Nations. Finally, the spokesman reiterated that contacts made by the Cyprus Government's with foreign governments prove that they are not satisfied with the Turkish proposals.

Turkmen-Gobbi Conversation

[Excerpt] Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen has assured Waldheim's special representative in Cyprus Ambassador Gobbi that the Turkish side considers all the aspects of the Cyprus problem, including the territorial aspect, as negotiable at the table of the intercommunal talks, and that the Turkish proposals mean this.

Two days ago Turkmen and Gobbi had a private meeting during the Turkish foreign minister's visit to occupied northern Cyprus. This was revealed yesterday by Gobbi in a statement to O FILELEVTHEROS editor Mikhalis Pandelidhis. Gobbi added that his talk with Turkmen on Cyprus developments was useful and constructive.

Gobbi avoided referring to details but it is understood that in the meeting Turkmen referred to the philosophy inherent in the Turkish proposals and to the economic and security criteria which will have a determinative influence in defining the extent of and the areas each side will have under its control.

IRANIAN ENVOY WARNS AGAINST BANI-SADR ASYLUM

AU271221 Vienna KURIER in German 27 Aug 81 p 3

[Text] As KURIER reported exclusively on Tuesday, representatives of overthrown Iranian President Bani-Sadr are currently trying to buy secretly several hundred million schillings worth of arms in Austria.

Indications of a possible putsch against Khomeyni obviously worry Mohammad Keiarishi, representative of the Iranian revolution in Vienna:

Because "for me, there can be no doubt that Bani-Sadr will get those arms," says the bearded diplomat; "and he is a power-hungry man who will risk everything to prove himself." He adds that the overthrown leader was getting the millions of dollars for the purchase of arms from exiled Iranians who, because of business interests, would like to see Khomeyni deposed: "But these people will never bring us to our knees, because the Iranian people are standing behind us."

Today the ambassador is "sure that Bani-Sadr was never really our president. His present attitude shows to which category he belongs."

Keiarishi believes he could do nothing against the arms purchases of the prospective putschists in Austria; "but should Bani-Sadr be granted asylum here, I promise there will be difficulties."

The Revolution Guards allegedly have no intention of making any attempt against Bani-Sadr in Paris: "We want to take him to court," Keiarishi declares unperturbed in his Vienna residence, and adds: "Hence we need him alive."

Lanc Rejects Threat

AU271223 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1059 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] Interior Minister Lanc today sharply rejected the threat by Iranian Ambassador Keiarishi that there would be difficulties should Austria grant asylum to overthrown Iranian President Bani-Sadr. The interior minister said he absolutely would not stand for the Iranian ambassador's uttering vague threats against Austria. Austria does not need to listen to advice from the representative of a state where day after day people are executed because of their political views, Lanc declared.

BUCHAREST EMBASSY DENIES REPORTED CHOLERA OUTBREAK

[Text] "It is not cholera; merely gasteroenteritis," Austria's diplomatic representatives in Romania declared on Wednesday in a teletype message to KURIER. FRG newspapers had played up reports on an alleged cholera epidemic on the Romanian Black Sea coast at Mamaia and Constanta in which five people were said to have died. Actually no one has confirmed the reports of these deaths--including returning tourists, who merely complain about an "ugly diarrhea." FRG newspapers reported thousands of persons taken ill. According to reports by tourists, the epidemic is already under control: Romanian health authorities have disinfected some areas on the Black Sea coast, they declare.

PAPER CONCERNED AT 'MAMMOTH' U.S. ARMS PLAN

PM261625 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 17 Aug 81 p 3

[Editorial: "Knock Knock"]

[Text] The world has scarcely had time to get over the shock of the U.S. decision to begin production of the neutron bomb when reports come from Washington of a plan by Defense Secretary Weinberger which could give the nuclear arms race an even grimmer countenance. It is a truly mammoth plan aimed at a complete modernization and escalation of the U.S. strategic nuclear potential.

There is little that is not contained in Weinberger's nuclear shopping list. A new air fleet will have to be built for the mobile MX intercontinental missiles: He advocates production of a new version of the B-1 bomber, which was scrapped from the defense program by President Carter in 1978; development of the Trident 2 missile, which will be submarine-based, is to be accelerated; even the reintroduction of the antimissile-missile (ABM), which disappeared from the nuclear arsenals 10 years ago thanks to the SALT I agreement, is recommended; finally the command and communiations structure on which the nuclear apparatus rests is to be reorganized and refined.

If the scope of this plan makes you giddy, the most worrying thing is the inclusion of what Pentagon officials advocate without batting an eye; namely that by around 1990 the United States will once again have an indisputable nuclear superiority over the Soviet Union. No matter how many objections there are to the medium-range missiles and the neutron bomb, both weapons systems were at least still defended with the agreement that they fill a "gap" in Western defenses. But Weinberger's plan breaks with the thinking in terms of nuclear parity and sets against it the strategy of nuclear superiority. This is extraordinarily dangerous.

Fortunately it still has not been said that this plan will be quickly implemented in full. It is also meeting resistance within the Reagan administration. Another question is whether the funds can be found for all of this and if Congress would then be willing to grant them. But the mere fact that the Reagan administration is discussing matters on this wavelength gives rise to the most serious fears about the attitude with which Washington will come to an understanding with Moscow in the coming months--primarily under pressure from its European allies.

A first illustration of this was the light-footed way in which President Reagan announced last week that he has proposed to his Russian counterpart Brezhnev that they hold--at a later date, which according to his staff will be postponed until even later--a summit on the preservation of world peace. Bearing in mind the arms policy of the Reagan administration, this announcement reminds one strongly of the detective film in which John Wayne as a fearless detective kicks the door in and then says, "Knock knock."

But perhaps there is still hope to be drawn from the knowledge that Moscow has a weakness for John Wayne movies.

SPD OFFICIALS DISCUSS EUROPEAN SECURITY ISSUES

However, Apel noted that those who relied solely on balance and deterrence were "building on sand." Therefore, the SPD supported efforts for arms control and confidence-building measures as a further element in a security policy. Like Bahr, Apel rejected as unrealistic the peace initiative demands for the Federal Republic to leave the Western alliance and flee into the "idyll of neutrality."

The representatives of the peace movements, with whom the SPD intends to continue discussions at the district level, strongly opposed further Western arming, especially in the field of medium-range missiles and the neutron bomb.

Bahr stressed that joint security could only be reached in the foreseeable future with the existing East-West alliances--not against the potential adversary, but with him. Anyone who wanted to withdraw from the NATO decision would torpedo negotiations between the United States and the USSR and the only apparent way to more joint security. The first aim of these negotiations must continue to be the striving for the so-called zero option. Any such agreement must include all medium-range systems affecting Europe. Bahr said he was convinced that the SPD Party Congress in 1982 would stick to its "No" to the deployment of the neutron weapon in the Federal Republic. He called upon the peace movement to cooperate with the SPD because it was harmful to the aim of security when the two forces went their separate ways.

The chairman of the German Society for Peace and Conflict Research, Prof Karl Kaiser, noted that the system of nuclear deterrence had led to the longest period of peace in Europe and could not simply be abandoned. He said that the view that there was a secret understanding between the United States and USSR superpowers to conduct a war only in Europe was not credible. Alfred Mechtersheimer, peace researcher at the Max-Planck Institute in Starnberg and a CSU member, said the West had developed no clear concept for an arms control policy. There was no compromise betwen the two positions that counterarming was either necessary or harmful.

Rudolf Bahro, the critic of the system who was deported from the GDR, said that the SPD could not at present be described as a "party of peace." He called for the Federal Republic to leave the Western alliance and for an "ABC weapon-free zone from Poland to Portugal." Bahr described this as a "fantastic illusion." He said the Federal Republic was strong enough to destroy stability in Europe by leaving the alliance, but not strong enough to guarantee peace in Europe.

SPD federal manager Peter Glotz said by way of introduction that the SPD saw its task to be helping citizens to make a decision through an open and public dialogue with the peace movements. The attempt must be made to "get beyond the relentless confrontation of unalterable agruments." The SPD was ready for an unprejudiced discussion and did not want to "simply capture and integrate" movements that had arisen spontaneously.

[Theo Sommer article: "Is Everything Anti That Is Criticism?"]

[Text] Is it anti-Americanism if, notwithstanding all dislike for the boisterous eccentric Al-Qadhdhafi, one is intiially suspicious of the U.S. version of the air incident over the Gulf of Sidra, having been made wise by the Tonkin incident in 1964 when a falsification ultimately caused America's fatal involvement in the rainy jungles of Vietnam?

Is it anti-Americanism if people lament the aspirations of the Reagan administration to nuclear superiority ("policy of strength") and instead prefer to insist on the concept of balance?

Is it anti-Americanism if people, unlike Reagan's security adviser Allen, do not regard arms control as a mere supplement to counterarmament but as a potential and even desirable alternative? If they want to talk prior to arming, and not vice versa?

Is it anti-Americanism if people, also under Ronald Reagan, hold the thesis of his Republican predecessor Ford according to which inflation and economic stagnation are public enemy No 1 and not the Soviet Union and the Red Army? Is it anti-Americanism if we remind U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger of the passage which his fellow cabinet member, Secretary of State Haig, signed next to Hans-Dietrich Genscher in March; economic stability and social justice form the prerequisites for maintaining defense spending at the planned level?

No other term has been the subject of so much nonsense lately as has the term anti-Americanism. The former president and the chancellor, the foreign minister and the opposition leader threw it around like handgrenades; the lower ranking echelons are even more careless with it. Meanwhile, it would be important to describe things carefully and in a differentiated manner to prevent the existence of what nobody in this country really wants; the breakdown of the developed German-American friendship. Now then, what are the facts?

To begin with, anti-Americanism is no mass pehnomenon. It can hardly be substantiated statistically. All serious public opinion polling institutes are agreed that the affinity of the Germans to the Americans is unbroken. The popularity of the United States ("I like it") according to figures provided by the Allensbach Institute has remained amazingly constant over a quarter of a century 40 percent in 1957; 58 percent in 1966; 50 percent in 1979. In 1954 about 62 percent advocated good relations with Washington, the corresponding figure for 1979 was 63 percent and for 1981, 65 percent. Forty percent wanted the alliance with the United States in September 1961, 88 percent in July 1980.

Therefore, there is no such thing as a change in the attitude of West Germans toward Americans. There is no wild anti-Americanism; calls of "Ami go home" occur much more seldom than in the fifties and sixties; nowhere are Molotov cocktails or even tomatoes hurled at Amerikahaus U.S. cultural institutions.

Differences and Divergences

What cannot be denied is something entirely different--the elitist criticism of the United States by a minority made up of young people, university graduates, church people and environmentalists. By its origin this minority is rather apolitical, nearly anti-political. It is primarily of a cultural revolutionary nature and is not particularly alliance-cracking. Three lines of motivation converge.

The first is an unequivocal antimodernism-- against the growth craze, against the throwaway society, against the technological civilization--in short, against everything that generally stands for the "American way of life."

The second line of motivation is antinuclearism. The followers of the new movement are against nuclear weapons and nuclear reactors alike. The United States, being the leading nuclear power in both fields, in this case automatically ends up in the line of fire.

The third line of motivation is pacifism. Willy Brandt recently said that the world has seen worse Germans than those adopting a pacifist attitude. It is not just the peace movement which regards the endless armament in the East and West as a bad investment; these funds could be put to better use, they could help turn the world into a place more worthy of living in and more likable to billions of hungry and miserable people. Many people are angered by the very idea that social benefits must be cut just for the sake of stepping up armaments. They also distrust disarmament negotiations in which, to begin with, further armament margins are negotiated.

To be fair, it should be pointed out that such thinking is not completely foreign even to the majority which supports defense, is loyal to the alliance and is inclined toward growth. Some 60 percent of the people consider the consumer and throwaway society of the Americans a bad example. Granted, 53 percent deem the centerarming decision to be a good thing, but 20 percent reject it and 29 percent are undecided. As many as 48 percent maintain that what matters most is to avoid war (27 percent: defend democracy even at the cost of nuclear war; 26 percent, impossible to tell).

At this point, a connecting line can be drawn to a phenomenon which is only too often passed off as anti-Americanism. This phenomenon also cannot be denied. There are differences and divergences at the governmental level between the United States and the Europeans. These differences and divergences likewise have nothing to do with anti-Americanism. They emerge from a number of world political developments which have destroyed the transatlantic consensus of the past. Consensus can no longer be ordered by Washington; it must be obtained in laborious discussions. There is no such thing anymore as an identity of interests from the outset; it can only be the result of consultation and harmonization.

Such divergences have been recurring all the time, and U.S.-European disagreements are nothing new. As the European partners grew more powerful and important, they demanded to be heard--and the Americans became increasingly cross. In economic issues, harmony ceased as early as in the beginning of the seventies. Disputes recurred at regular intervals over strategy and armament, and the extra-European world constantly provided cause for frictions in the Suez crisis, in Algeria and in Vietnam. The situation was worst under President Carter whose "government by epilepsy" drove the Eruopeans mad. But there are plenty of areas of friction under Ronald Reagan as well.

Different Mentalities

This begins with the fact that the mentality of the public is radically different in the United States and in West Europe: In the new world it reflects putting one's foot down ideologically and aiming at calculated confrontation; in the old world it reflects pragmatism, moderation and receptiveness to conciliation of interests. The different basic mentalities result in different political mandates, and the different political mandates entail divergent political objectives.

This is particularly true for the East-West relations. The Europeans will not dodge confrontations if the Soviets impose them on the Europeans; but otherwise they wish to keep the prospects of cooperation open which alone offer the chance of overcoming European partition. It is important to them that the dialogue between the superpowers be continued especially in difficult times. What they desire above all is continuation of the arms control dialogue between Moscow and Washington, and they regret that Washington time and again creates the impression that it is dragging its feet in this area and that it does have an arms policy but no disarmament policy. Europeans do not like the idea of arms-racing the Soviets to death. They also warn against regarding the Third World primarily as an arena where the great powers can settle their rivalries. In their view, the South of this world must be helped for its own sake.

Europeans continue to consider its problems as being of a domestic rather than geopolitical nature, and thus they prefer to support reforms instead of uniforms--like in El Salvador.

All these are not specifically West German Government views but widely shared general European assessments. What the Europeans also have in common is the suspicion that that it was the Americans rather than the Europeans who have lost their nerve. The chancellor reportedly said recently that he does not have any inferiority complex vis-a-vis the Soviets. Does Reagan have such a complex? He talks about Soviet communism being at the verge of collapse, but acts as if the Russians were 10 feet tall.

Not everything is anti that is criticism of America. The present world situation being what it is, alliance loyalty cannot mean everlasting loyalty. Unquestioned subordination without complaining has been replaced by a critical solidarity which alone makes real partnership possible. Europe has ideas and interests of its own which do not solely spring from holy egoism but which often enough can be an essential and necessary contribution to the American way of thinking and to the definition of U.S. interests--in short, to an integrated Western policy.

Keeping one's mouth shut and remaining steadfast is not the only proof of alliance loyalty. Arguing at times is the best way of getting along with one another. But even such arguments do not mean any "anti" attitude. Let us be careful in using the multipurpose label of anti-Americanism.

EDITORIAL CRITICIZES U.S. FOR FLEXING MUSCLES

[Werner Holzer editorial: "Cravens and Muscle Men"]

[Text] The relationship between Europe and the United States this year is like the weather. One Atlantic low is followed by another. And if a high-pressure zone suddenly slips in, it is mostly only short-lived. In the meantime, the transatlantic turbulences have been reaching a strength which harms the Western alliance even though nobody wants to see it called in to question.

Anyone who assumes that it is simply anti-American feelings which are behind the increasing European criticism is, however, badly mistaken. In the Federal Republic, for instance, the criticism is seldom based on a form of national animosity. What is alarming people is not "the Americans," but the policy of the Reagan administration.

It has become fashionable among U.S. politicians and military men to accuse Europeans in general, and the West Germans in particular, of having turned into well-fed cravens who are prepared to exchange their freedom for a slice of buttered bread or for Soviet natural gas.

Obviously, none of these critics has considered the self-evident idea that these Europeans as a whole--unlike the Americans--must live with the memory of a long series of murderous wars on their continent and that they have sufficient examples in their history which demonstrate that patriotic military muscle flexing often has terrible consequences and cannot be confused with a clear and even determined policy.

This much is definite: U.S. policy at the moment either is operating with inadequate knowledge about European affairs or is extremely clumsy in presenting its own political aims. In any event, despite Afghanistan and despite massive armament, in the eyes of many people in West Europe, the Soviet Union--definitely no model of arms limitation and international restraint--last year succeeded in presenting itself as less willing to take risks than the United States. This is attributable to Washington's constant threatening gestures as seen, for example, in the unilateral surprise decision to build the neutron weapon after all.

What is important in this context is not whether this weapon is particularly "perverted" because allegedly it only kills human beings while leaving material objects undamaged. Lethal weapons are perverted in any event, particularly so in the nuclear age. What caused the dissension between the two sides of the Atlantic--apart from the impossible American style--was the question whether certain new, smaller and more accurate nuclear weapons theoretically make nuclear war "practicable" and thus more conceivable.

In this decisive question, the nuclear hawks and the nuclear doves have developed oddly enough a certain parallel way of thinking. While some arms-racy military people seem to believe in all earnestness that even the massive use of neutron weapons against an armored attack would not trigger an escalation in the fighting, the nuclear doves are convinced that the use of these weapons is as good as definite if for no other reason than some military people are thinking about it.

To date, however, there are no indications either in Washington or in Moscow that either side would be prepared to simply tolerate any kind of nuclear first strike. The terrible, but hitherto effective, principle of mutual deterrence, therefore, continues to be valid. For this reason, a clear and unequivocal statement by President Reagan to the effect that as far as the United States is concerned, this principle remains valid without reservation, would be much better than the lot of talk about hardness and the constant announcement of new arms in the United States. Anything else is bound to arouse, in Europe at least, the suspicion that Washington is still pondering the question of how a potential conflict might be kept away from home.

Such thinking would be humanly understandable but also fatally illogical. No use of U.S. nuclear weapons in Europe could be so "insignificant" in the view of the Soviet Union that the response would not be a retaliatory strike with the next higher caliber nuclear weapon. Any hope for a different reaction on Moscow's part is nothing but a nearly suicidal illusion. Thus, if this is the case, the responsible people in Washington must not be surprised that an active antiwar movement is constantly growing stronger in West Europe.

The uninhibited arms race of the two world powers only creates new risks. Meanwhile, the economic and technological lead of the United States indeed is big enough to allow Washington to enter into serious arms control negotiations with self-assuredness even now. If this is done credibly, the transatlantic turbulences will disappear again.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ON REAGAN'S AWACS POLICY

DW271405 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 27 Aug 81 p 10

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Reagan and AWACS"]

[Text] Reagan's leadership style is patriarchal. When things become difficult, the President takes over like the father of the family. An example: Reagan informed Congress personally about the government's intention to supply AWACS aircraft to Saudi Arabia. Secretary of Defense Weinberger and Secretary of State Haig remain in the background. They just supply the negotiating material. So Reagan places many phone calls, involves many senators in talks on special subjects while simultaneously exchanging personal memories. And approaches representatives of Jewish organizations at a party. He will handle the ticklish issue with patience and charm, and he will not shy away from risking a defeat. To be sure, he has strong arguments for his initiative. Politics consist of give and take. He lifted the ban on the supply of modern fighter planes for Israel. Now something is to be done for Riyadh because the Saudis need AWACS. Important oil wells and installations of Saudi Arabia are located just 20 minutes by air from the borders. Every Middle East state maintaining connections with the West must reckon with surprises a la Al-Qadhdhafi.

JORDAN'S KING HUSAYN CONTINUES VISIT IN PARIS

Dinner Meeting With Mitterrand

JN271125 Amman PETRA-JNA in Arabic 0940 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] Paris, 27 Aug (PETRA)--French President Francois Mitterrand last night held a working dinner at the Elysee Palace in honor of His Majesty King Husayn during which they reviewed international issues and bilateral relations.

King Husayn asserted that Jordan and the other Arab states reaffirm their commitment to a just and lasting peace in the Middle East based on Israel's total withdrawal from Arab territories occupied in 1967, beginning with Arab Jerusalem and the recognition of the Palestinian Arab people's legitimate rights, including their right to self-determination under the leadership of the PLO.

His majesty affirmed that Middle East instability resulting from continued Israeli aggression against the Arab nation is directly affecting world peace and security. He added that France and the other European states are therefore called upon to consolidate their efforts and contribute toward developing prospects for peace in that sensitive part of the world.

King Husayn pointed out that Israel's resort to the logic of force in its attempt to dominate the region can only further aggravate the situation and lead to new dangers extending beyond the Arab world.

His majesty invited the French president to visit Jordan. President Mitterrand accepted the invitation and a date for the visit will be set later.

The meeting was attended by Claude Cheysson, French minister of external relations; the secretary general of the Elysee; Marwan al-Qasim, minister of foreign affairs; and Tahir al-Masir, Jordanian ambassador in Paris.

Meeting With Cheysson

[Text] Paris -- His Majesty King Husayn received French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson in his residence in Paris last night. Following the meeting, His Majesty King Husayn expressed hope that Europe and France would continue their efforts to seek a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

In a statement to French television, his majesty stressed that the peace process sponsored by Israel and Egypt through the Camp David accords would not help to solve the basic issue in the region; the Palestinian people's issue, which is suffering from an unforgivable injustice. His majesty added: The Palestinian people should determine their future and establish an independent state on the soil of their homeland.

His Majesty King Husayn expressed his belief that the Saudi peace plan is only one initiative among others to reach lasting peace in the Middle East. This plan will be included in the agenda of the next Arab summit conference.

In a statement to reporters, Cheysson asserted that Jordan enjoys an important status in the Middle East and is important to France in view of its stability and wise administration. He said that His Majesty King Husayn's talks with the French president have provided an opportunity to become acquainted with the Jordanian viewpoint on the situation in the region and to form a clear idea on what France can do in the field of bilateral relations.

Meets Qatar's Amie

GF271705 Doha Domestic Service in Arabic 1530 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] The amir, Shaykh Khalifah ibn Hamad al-Thani, met with Jordan's King Husayn in Paris today. During the meeting, they discussed Arab issues in general and the Middle East and Palestinian issues in particular. They also discussed measures to achieve the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people so they can determine their future and establish an independent state. The meeting also dealt with bilateral relations.

The amir and King Husayn met with President Francois Mitterrand yesterday. The French president held a working banquet in honor of the amir at the Presidential Palace. He also held a working banquet for King Husayn that evening. The Middle East and the Palestinian issue were the central issues of discussion at the two banquets.

Jordan Foreign Minister Interview

JN271845 Monte Carlo Radio Monte Carlo in Arabic 1725 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] Jordanian Foreign Minister Marwan al-Qasim is accompanying King Husayn on his visit to Paris, which began yesterday. Yesterday evening, the Jordanian monarch met with French President Francois Mitterrand. Our colleague Nabil Darwish met with the Jordanian foreign minister and had the following interview with him:

[Begin recording] [Question] Your Excellency Jordanian Foreign Minister Marwan al-Qasim: You are accompanying King Husayn on his current visit to France. Tell us about the talks you are holding with the new French administration.

[Answer] The first meeting was held in the Elysee Palace yesterday evening between His Majesty King Husayn and President Francois Mitterrand. It was a chance and occasion for His Majesty King Husayn to clarify the Jordanian and Arab stand toward the region's issues.

This particular time is one of the most important and serious times in the region. We are quite confident that if the dangers exacerbate in the region, they will certainly go beyond the Middle East region to other areas. Therefore, his majesty has reaffirmed that the Arab world and the Palestinian people are people who are demanding their rights, which are recognized by all the world's countries except the aggressor and those supporting him. Therefore, we (?think) that yesterday's meeting had positive aspects in clarifying this Arab stand toward the region's issues.

I believe that the main factors for a just and comprehensive settlement in the Middle East region, as communicated by his majesty the king to his excellency the president, are based on Israel's total withdrawal from all the occupied Arab territories, including Arab Jerusalem, and the Palestinian Arab people's right to self-determination under the PLO, their sole legitimate representative. By means of these factors, we believe that peace may be achieved in this particular region.

[Question] This, then, is some of what King Husayn said to President Francois Mitterrand yesterday evening. What was President Francois Mitterrand's reply?

[Answer] There was an understanding of this Arab stand as explained by His Majesty King Husayn. The king's words had a certain effect on the French president, especially since France is a state that has an old history and relationship with man and the peoples' national rights as well as a just way of viewing human rights.

[Question] Under your chairmanship of Jordanian diplomacy, you have been aspiring--at least as in your diplomatic activities--to see Europe exert pressure on the United States. Do you believe this is possible? What about the French stand in the European group?

[Answer] Jordan has always sought and is still seeking all possibilities for peace. Jordan has responded to the international efforts to establish peace in the region. This peace, as I said earlier, must be based on the principles which guarantee its continuation. In its constant moves since 1967 toward dialogue with Europe and other states as well as the United States, Jordan has wanted to achieve peace for the region and its people. We believe that Europe has vital interests and has important contacts and relations in the Middle East region that make it incumbent on it to play a role that may lead to or help achieve success toward the desired peace. Due to its proximity to the region, its historical, cultural and commercial relationship and its increasing dependence on dealing with the region's states, Europe must be aware or must have become aware of the repercussions entailed by the continued deterioration of the Middle East situation. Therefore, it had to (?adopt) a new stand, through which it must try to [word indistinct].

[Question] The Jordanian monarch has for some time been criticizing--sometimes very strongly--U.S. policy in the Middle East. Can one understand this criticism to be an invitation to the Arabs who can exert pressure on Washington to do so?

[Answer] In light of the recent Israeli attacks against some fraternal Arab states, there had to be contact with the U.S. administration to explain the Arab stand, particularly the Jordanian stand, toward the continuation of these attacks. The repeated Israeli attacks try to destroy any slight possibility for peace that may exist. Hence, there was need for contacts wtih the United States, which greatly helps and guarantees the prominent Israeli (?reply) in the Middle East region. For instance, Israel could not have been able to attack the nuclear reactor in Baghdad if it had not gotten sophisticated U.S. weapons. There was need to draw attention to the fact that the concept of Israel's security, which Israel has always pointed out, has become a justification for Israel to strike at any Arab installations, whether these are a nuclear reactor aimed at developing Iraq economically or whatever. What guarantee does any Arab country have to avoid a future Israeli aggression if Israel wills it?

[Question] Despite the attack against the Iraqi Tammuz reactor and the raid against Beirut, the United States resumed its aircraft shipments to Israel. How can the Arabs confront these U.S. measures and decisions?

[Answer] In fact, we must admit that the Arab world alone possesses the key to defend the Arab nation's dignity, character and honor. I must stress that regardless of any contacts with friendly states--whether Western states or otherwise--dependence must be first and last on Arab capability. Once the Arab capabilities, as I have said, are fully mobilized, there will be [words indistinct] in several stands of the states that may contribute to the process of peace in the Middle East region.

USSR TO BUY FRENCH OFFSHORE PROSPECTING HARDWARE

[Text] The maritime expertise company [Comex] has won a new commercial victory and will supply several pieces of underwater intervention equipment, particularly for offshore oil exploitation, to the USSR before the end of the year.

The contract is for the supply of a Moana IV observation submersible, a diving system for depths of less than 300 meters, an SM370 diving bell and a remote-controlled underwater device. The contract is worth a total of FR35 million. All the equipment will be placed on board a support ship now being constructed in Finland's shipyards. The contract also makes provision for training Soviet divers in Comex's hyperbaric installations in Marseilles and initial technical assistance in using the equipment.

Comex is one of the big companies which specializes in underwater work. It supplies both services and equipment. For instance, it constructed entire diving installations for the Swedish navy, supplied exploration submarines to China and so forth. Moana IV is a submarine for observation and work at depths of less than 400 meters. It has a three-man crew and can operate autonomously for 4 hours. It was [tense as published] brought to the diving area on board a support ship.

The system for diving to less than 300 meters is simply a pressure turret which is lowered to the indicated depth by cables played out from the accompanying ship. The turret enables three divers to operate under water for long periods since they have food, beds, sanitary equipment and so forth on board. It is constantly connected to the surface vessel by guide cables, electric and telephone cables, a pipe supplying the air and so forth. The SM370 diving bell with a crew of two pilots and three divers enables the latter to go out into the water for various operations on the heads of oilwells, pipelines or any other target. The submersible can operate autonomously for 8 hours. Finally, the remote-controlled device is a "fish" equipped with an electronic eye, in other words, a camera which permits observation at depths of less than 300 meters.

U.S. WARNING TO USSR IN GULF OF SIDRA INCIDENT

[Editorial: "Reagan's Twofold Warning"]

Be that as it may, looking back at the origins of the incident, namely the presence of units of the U.S. fleet in an area over which Libya claims sovereignty, Reagan's desire to challenge Libya's President al-Qadhdhafi can hardly be doubted. This is confirmed by the weekly NEWSWEEK, which disclosed last week that the U.S. maneuvers were designed precisely to counter Tripoli's claim to regard Libya's territorial waters as extending 200 miles, whereas the United States regards them as limited to 3 miles, in accordance with the old law, the only one that it recognizes. Moreover, Libya has recently been condemning what it regarded as a planned U.S. provocation. In short, even if the United States is not directly responsible for the incident, it clearly did nothing to avoid it.

The U.S. fleet's maneuvers in the Gulf of Sidra could therefore be interpreted as a show of strength designed to demonstrate that the United Sates is determined not to yield in anything, but doubtless this demonstration was not aimed only at Colonel al-Qadhdhafi. It is logical to believe that it was also aimed at the Soviet Union, whose relations with Libya have this year taken great strides forward with Al-Qadhdhafi's April visit to Moscow followed by Libyan No Two 'Abd as-Salam Jallud in June. On the former occasion, Leonid Brezhnev assured the Libyan head of state of the USSR's solidarity "in view of the blackmail and threats of the imperialists and their lackeys" and the final communique on the talks stressed the safeguarding of peace "in this sensitive area, the Mediterranean." On the latter occasion, when the Soviet press was talking in terms of a conspiracy against the Al-Qadhdhafi regime, the topic for discussion was greater aid from the Soviet Union, which planned to step up its arms supplies to Libya. This being the case, it seems clear that the missiles that brought down the Libyan SU-22's are also a warning to the Kremlin designed to dissuade the USSR from strengthening Libya's military potential...and thus its own presence in the Mediterranean. The second cold war is well underway.

COLOMBO DEFENDS U.S. ACTIONS AGAINST LIBYA

AU271548 Rome ANSA in English 1510 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] Rome, 27 Aug (ANSA)--The decision of the United States Navy fleet to conduct missile-firing exercises in the Gulf of Sidra last week, the maneuvers which led to the downing of two Libyan warplanes by American fighters on August 19, was a matter "exclusively up to the United States" Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo told the Milan daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO.

In his interview, published in today's edition of the Milan paper, Colombo covered much the same ground as that American position on the naval maneuvers and air clash.

He said that the procedure adopted by Wasington in dealings with Libya was normal and correct. He asserted that this conduct was, "identical to that of other occasions" and quickly added, "different, possibly, because of the main reasons for the changed climate in which the exercises were held due to the worsening relations between the United States and Libya, as between Libya and other Western countries.

The Italian diplomatic chief then referred to the Tripoli government's unilateral extension of Libyan regime and recalled that Italy has advanced reservations "on precise Libyan policy initiatives in Africa and in the Mediterranean."

In reply to a question on whether Italy had received advanced information on American intentions in the Mediterranean, the foreign minister said that, "there was no contradiction" between what the Washington government told Italy, and other countries, including Libya itself, and what happened afterwards.

Also the accounts of the two sides involved in the brief air clash, according to Colombo, substantially confirm that the aircraft carrier USS Nimitz, whose F-14's shot down the Libyan SU-22's, conducted maneuvers just as it had on earlier occasions with the single exception of the exercises held in 1980.

The foreign minister wound up by explaining that, "this has already been clarified in a Foreign Ministry note in which it was recalled that back in 1973 Italy referred to the problem of the Libyan extension of its territorial waters and that this unilateral extension had been challenged even by the Soviet Union.

PCI'S MINUCCI COMMENTS ON SUPERPOWER RELATIONS

[Mino Fuccillo interview with PCI Secretariat member Adalberto Minucci: "Yes USSR Has Erred Too, But Reagan Is Playing With Fire"]

[Excerpt] [Question] People are talking openly now about a war limited in both time and space, lasting a few weeks and with Europe as its battlefield. At other times the PCI would have organized massive demonstrations and filled the squares with people.

[Answer] Yes, there is an attenuation of the peace movements; the myth of an irreversible detente is lessening people's alarm, but it is not true that they are uninterested or indifferent. You do not get thousands of people gathering to talk in a city square 16 August unless it has to do with matters of profound concern to the people's interests. You do not witness the formation of a European pole of opinion in clear disagreement wtih the United States for the first time in 35 years unless the interests of peace are at stake.

[Question] And yet people maintain that there are weapons capable of averting a conflict or of making one unlikely.

[Answer] I want to be quite clear about this: [LA REPUBBLICA Editor] Scalfari is quite right to identify elements in a new military and political strategy that could lead to a war in Europe. Even under the Carter administration, broad dissatisfaction was apparent with the so-called bipolar balance whereby the USSR and the United States were the two interlocutors active on every chessboard on the basis of essential parity. Now limited areas have been identified in which one power could humiliate the other or dictate its conditions. It is a dangerous game because when it comes to the crunch nobody would accept the loss of even a limited military confrontation; rather they would resort to the strategic arsenals. It is cynical because it is played at other people's expense. However, there is one point on which I do not agree with Scalfari, and that is when he attributes a basically defensive and deterrent role to the neutron bomb. Indeed, the neutron bomb threatens to constitute the first opening to an extreme familiarization with nuclear weapons, the first in a long line of increasingly compact, sophisticated and usable devices, which increases the risk of war rather than diminishing it.

[Question] However, Reagan has broken the bipolar balance--which in any case has not seemed to constitute a panacea for the world's ills--after the Red Army's appearance in Afghanistan, Ethiopia, and following Angola and Nicaragua.

[Answer] The USSR has not managed to formulate and implement a disarmament and detente policy and has laid itself open to U.S. rearmament ambitions. We condemned [what happened in] Afghanistan. However, we cannot accept the logic that prompts the U.S. administration to describe all liberation movements as "international terrorism" irrespective of where and in what form they exist. Be that as it may, the USSR has displayed difficulties and shortcomings. For this very reason we want others, including Europe, to undertake to maintain peace, and not just the two superpowers.

[Question] This implies a European initiative in line with Mitterrand, Schmidt and Palme. What about the PSI?

[Answer] I have said that I do not believe that all Italian socialists can identify with the defense minister's positions. For the first few days after the Comiso announcement [to site new missile bases there], there was silence from the PSI, then a few voices of dissent, mainly from the grassroots. But what is important is the official party stance. If, when it comes to the crunch, this is the same one that Craxi expressed in a recent interview, namely "Yes" to the Euromissiles for the sake of the balance between the blocs, it would be a very serious stance, especially for the PSI, which would thus be eliminating a pacifist tradition for the sake of substantial support for rearmament. If so, the Socialists' "new course" would be undermining something very profound.

[Question] Is another rift about to open up between the PCI and the PSI?

[Answer] A few days ago some remarks by [PSI Directorate member] Claudio Martelli appeared in L'ESPRESSO, reflecting a clear desire to justify a rupture with the Communists. Martelli no longer invokes the state of emergency that prompts the PSI to keep the PCI out of the government because of the DC's unwillingness. Martelli theorizes and rediscovers in the two leftwing parties' history the reasons for a diversity which, I repeat, would supposedly justify the anticommunist discrimination. This is something more than the tacit DC-PSI agreement whereby the PCI has hitherto been excluded. The Communists are reproached for having been the ones most committed to the armed antifascist struggle. It is forgotten that in 1947, illegal discrimination was practiced in the factories and public offices. Berlinguer is attacked because he criticizes the parties, envisaging their possible regeneration; the argument is put forward of the opportuneness of surmounting this democracy of the parties in favor of a democracy of rights and interests, similar to a "democracy" of pressure groups. I hope that not all Socialists agree with [Defense Minister] Lagorio, and I hope that not all Socialists agree with Martelli.

COUNCIL OF STATE GIVES GO-AHEAD ON NATO PLAN

[Text] Madrid, 27 Aug (AFP)--The Council of State today gave the go-ahead to a government plan for the approval by the Cortes (parliament) of Spain's joining the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

The council, Spain's highest consultative body, said the government's procedure was constitutional. The way is now open for [word indistinct] expected to be submitted to [word indistinct] on September [words indistinct] an application by Spain for NATO membership.

If the bill is passed, as is expected, the 15 NATO members will then issue a formal invitation to Spain.

The Socialist and Communist Parties, which are opposed to NATO membership, want the question to be decided by a referendum.

Meanwhile, informed sources said talks on the treaty providing American use of five Spanish bases will probably be suspended for several months to give Spain time to join NATO and possibly reap higher compensation for the bases from the U.S.

Spanish negotiator Carlos Robles-Pique has suggested that Washington "would be more generous" if Spain were part of NATO. The U.S. budget calls for $159 million a year, up from $144 million during the previous agreement. Spain says the $159 million is not enough.

The treaty runs out on September 21.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON JOINING NATO. GIBRALTAR

PM270950 London AD-DUSTUR in Arabic 24 Aug 81 pp 32, 33

[Excerpts] AD-DUSTUR: What are the advantages and complications resulting from Spain joining the NATO alliance?

Oliart: I have already discussed the advantages and complications resulting from Spain joining NATO. In my view the complications are more imaginary than real, particularly if we presume that a nuclear war will take place. But, as I have already said, in view of the Spanish-U.S. treaty and of our strategic geographic position, as well as in view of the broadening of the terrestrial area of modern warfare, in which missiles, satellites and so forth are used--all these factors make it impossible for us to remain remote from any international conflict, particuarly if the future theater is Europe or North Africa. There are other complications as well, which is the restriction on the sovereignty of any country joining a multilateral alliance such as the NATO alliance.

Naturally, all the existing alliances, such as the alliance between us and the United States and between us and France, mean a restriction on sovereignty. This is an inevitable result of the desire of any state to ally itself with any party for a common objective.

One of the advantages of joining the alliance vis-a-vis this relative restriction of sovereignty is that decisions are taken unanimously in this alliance, which is a very important thing; as has happened in the case of France, which withdrew from the organization but remained within the alliance.

There are, of course, other advantages as well. Today we live under the danger of an attack on Europe. The NATO alliance is not now in a good position to confront an invasion of NATO European member states because of the imbalance of power in the nuclear weapons available to both camps. A balance which is in favor of the Warsaw Pact. Therefore, we consider NATO a defensive alliance to defend the systems of these nations, their economic and social systems which are the same as that which exists in Spain and which Spain chose for itself. More clearly, it is the democratic system.

AD-DUSTUR: What in your opinion will be the effects on Spain's foreign policy and what developments will occur in this policy after you join the NATO alliance?

Oliart: In my view Spanish foreign policy will witness something very positive because Spain will play its role as a European power, a role which it has not played since the war of independence in 1914.

This does not prevent Spain from playing roles in Latin America, North Africa and the Arab world--with the countries to which it is linked by common history, such as Morocco. This is another subject. But Spain cannot remain any longer without playing its European role. In Europe lies the secret of its strength as a state, as a society and as a nation.

AD-DUSTUR: How will Spain's membership of the alliance affect the question of Gibraltar in particular?

Oliart: It is a difficult question which today has become more complicated because of the desire of the inhabitants of Gibraltar to live as an independent society in the form of semiautonomy.

I believe that no Spanish Government, whatever its nature may be, can ever stop demanding the return of Gibraltar to Spanish sovereignty. This is a constant position to our foreign policy as well as our economic policy on which we cannot go back.

There is no doubt that there are some who believe that as a matter of principle we must link our joining the alliance to solving the problem of Gibraltar and returning it to Spanish sovereignty, but I do not share this view. This is a matter of dispute between Britain and Spain. I believe that the principles reached recently in Lisbon between Spain and Britain could lead to the problem being solved. These must be discussed at the same time as we discuss our joining the alliance.

In the event that we join the alliance we must discuss our final access to it in the light of what is happening in Gibraltar in exactly the same way as we discuss it in the light of what is happening in the European Common Market.

This is another issue: Joining the alliance is one thing and the form of joining it is another. For example, will the Spanish forces be placed under the command of the NATO armed forces and will NATO bases be established here and there? This is yet another matter.

I can say more than this: Spain's membership of the alliance will not be a negative factor hindering negotiations with Britain but rather could facilitate these negotiations and solve the problem of Gibraltar.

AD-DUSTUR: Is it likely that nuclear weapons will be deployed in your country when Spain joins the NATO alliance?

Oliart: No. As you know, there are European countries that have refused to have nuclear weapons on their territories and I am not a supporter of nuclear weapons in Spain.

PAPER REPORTS USSR SPY ACTIVITIES IN CANARIES

LD280230 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] The evening paper DIARIO DE LAS PALMAS today published an interesting investigative piece by (Sergio Gil Socorro) on Soviet espionage on the Canary Islands. The article says that on 17 December 1978 the Soviet oceanographic vessel Mikhail Somov arrived in the port of Las Palmas. One hundred and eight people on board the ship registered with the harbor police. However, there were actually 109 on board. It is understood that the traveler who did not register with the police was the captain, (Valentin Vladimirovich Lysenko), who disembarked on the island with false documents in the name of a German citizen, (August Manfred) from Bonn. This putative German settled in the tourist area of Grand Canary Island, and in December of the same year moved to Tenerife where he made contact in the (Plaza de Teget) with (Yuriy Bykov), the former director of Sovhispan who was later expelled for espionage. The purpose of this mysterious meeting was to obtain information on some military planes which frequently passed through the islands on their way to the Azores. The author of the article also adds that after the events of 23 February more than 100 KGB agents were detected in our country.

(Sergio Gil Socorro) concludes his report with the following: I have written and spoken on many occasions of the possible connection between the nationalist groups in the Canaries with the Soviet intelligence service on the islands. There is apparent confirmation of some cases involving people--individual sailors who are sympathizers and of militants who serve in ports within the state administration in the Canary archipelago--who have handed over political, economic and industrial documents to Soviet intelligence.

BASQUE GOVERNMENT NOTE REJECTS AUTONOMY PACT

PM270743 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 18 Aug 81 p 8

[EFE report: "Basque Government Rejects Autonomy Agreements"]

[Text] San Sebastian, 17 Aug--The Basque government today announced its rejection of the autonomy agreements signed in Madrid between the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], and expressed its desire to carry out all initiatives aimed at making clear the people's will which endorsed the statute of autonomy.

At the meeting held by the Basque government in San Sebastian today, the autonomy agreements were studied in depth, and a lengthy note explains the reasons for rejection, and describes the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process as antistatute and anticonstitutional.

The Basque government's note states that the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process is not an organic law or a law of harmonization. "It is not organic, since the concept of an organic law is limited and of restrictive interpretation. It is not a law of harmonization, because the autonomy statutes are not 'measures of the autonomous communities' but laws of the state. The recourse to the idea of an organic law or law of harmonization conceals a real evasion of the law, and renders the law anticonstitutional."

The Basque autonomous government criticizes the procedure used in the signing of the agreements, and believes that "it was desired to exclude those who represent the majority opinion of the autonomous community."

"In the Basque country it is obvious that, in view of the absolutely minority position of the signatories of the agreement, that agreement has no political force, apart from legal and other considerations."

The Basque government asserts that from a legal viewpoint both the agreements and the rules in which it is planned to embody them are in no way capable of amending the statute, whose manner of revision is specifically stipulated in it. "Any law, even an organic law, has legal status inferior to the statute and cannot validly contradict or alter it."

With respect to the economic aspects of the agreements signed by the UCD and the PSOE, the Basque government believes that they not only violate the statute and the [economic] agreement, but as far as the powers are concerned, even infringe a historical right whichthe Francoist regime itself respected on the part of the territory of Alava.

"The so-called economic and financial agreements openly contradict the concept of an autonomous treasury laid down in Article 40 of the statute."

The final section of the Basque governments's note cites the problems posed by the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process, including that of the reduction of the Basque parliament's legislative powers to interpreting unilaterally basic concepts, basic rules or basic legislation, conferring regulatory and even executive power on the central administration.

In the Basque government's opinion, the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process does not resolve the problem of the so-called national bodies of officials and disregards the autonomous community's powers in this matter, while the role of the joint committees becomes that of formalizing decisions by the sectional committees at state level.

"An attempt is being made," the note adds, "to justify the organic law's nature by the need to guarantee the supremacy of state legislation over community law. The aim is unconstitutional, when, as the organic law on the harmonization of the autonomy process does, an attempt is made to say that state law prevails even in matters which are exculsively the province of the autonomous communities."

Lastly, the Basque government's note emphasizes the Basque government's determined intention "to defend by all means within its power the broadest possible interpretation of the statute, opposing all unilateral rules or interpretations of it which contravene its potential autonomy content or clearly conflict with the spirit or procedure which governed its drafting."

OLESEN CONFERS WITH LUXEMBOURG FOREIGN MINISTER

PM271102 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 25 Aug 81 p 5

["Kjol" report: "Agreement between Denmark and Luxembourg"]

[Text] Denmark and Luxembourg are agreed that the fundamental principles in EEC agricultural policy should be adhered to in the coming talks on the EEC commission's proposals for structural changes in the Community published 2 months ago, Luxembourg Foreign Minister Collette Flesch said at a press conference in Copenhagen yesterday after talks with Foreign Minister Kueld Olesen.

Colette Flesch, who arrived in Denmark yesterday for an official visit, also discussed the international situation with Kjeld Olesen, and after the talks it emerged that Luxembourg does not share Denmark's tough condemnation of President Reagan's decision to begin production of the neutron bomb. After the meeting, Colette Flesch said that there are differences between the two countries' views concerning the bomb. Luxembourg's view is that the issue is primarily a NATO affair if there is any likelihood of deployment of the bomb in Europe.

SOGAARD EXPOUNDS DEFENSE PLANNING PHILOSOPHY

[Defense Minister Poul Sogaard "Viewpoint" article: "The Future's Defenses--Total Defense With Civilian-Military Cooperation"]

[Text] What do we want from our defenses? The negotiations covering the defense forces' economic framework for the next 3 years have now been concluded, but it still remains for the actual planning for the defense forces to be fixed. The point of departure for these plans is still a target which attaches importance to surveillance, warning, protection of sovereignty, collaboration with West Germany in the Baltic, and reinforcements. The structure of the defense forces must therefore be primarily concentrated on solving these tasks, which means that there will be changes and adjustments in a large number of areas in the next few years.

If anyone thinks that with the arrangements on which we have now reached agreement Denmark is rearming, then they are barking up the wrong tree; on the contrary, cuts are being made in the defense forces. For a number of years the defense forces have had excess capacity in their support structures (barracks, air bases, and so on). This excess capacity has been an economic burden, and it must be removed, but at the same time consideration must naturally be given to the personnel, civilian and military, who could find themselves in difficuly here. In addition we must also adapt the system--in both the personnel and materiel respects--to a slightly lower level but thoroughly better standard, if at the same time we take the question of training into consideration.

What still remains to be done is that a new bill for the defense forces' organization--to succeed the old bill for 1973 to 1977--needs to be drafted, and a Home Guard bill and a personnel bill. The political point of the bills must be the consideration not to commit Danish society to a future with a defense bill, including a Home Guard bill, which would be too inflexible and which would not leave any scope for development trends, which through normal social development and debate must form part of the thoughts and ideas about future defenses.

To a large extent our defense forces have been built up on the notion that they should have a preventive effect, and everyone knows that our principal defense objective must be to work for realistic detente initiatives, but also to admit the current demands made on us as a society with regard to our security.

Our military defenses are a part of this, but general developments now indicate that the traditional norms for a division into military defenses and civilian defense are in the process of changing.

No one should doubt that the future's defenses will not only be military defenses but must to a great extent be influenced by ideas of how civilian society could pull through a situation which would be the product of a war or a crisis. From the point of view of resources, future total defenses must be a field in which collaboration between civilian and military authorities must be shaped in the most effective way.

No country's military defenses would be able to survive for very long if civilian society broke down. This is one of the reasons why the next few years must in part be used to evaluate new courses to follow, including the course of nonviolent defense.

The extremes in the views of what Denmark might have to face in a war situation must be seen as extremes. Neither the prospect of total nuclear war nor the World War II situation well-known to Denmark can be any more than extremes in this connection when we have to evaluate our chances of survival.

Historically, we still live at something of a "geographical corner" in world military history, and our objective must continue to be to keep our country free from undesired situations which come from outside, so that we can preserve a social form embodying the right of self-determination to the greatest possible extent.

Those who consider that by disbanding our military defense forces we have found the patent solution to our security problems are very short-sighted. Unwanted political influences from outside and, in certain situations, acts of war could nevertheless come about, and would be even more probable without a total defense system, which partly has a preventive effect together with our allies, and which in part could deter acts of aggression.

The level of spending for such a system of total defenses will be able to be held at what we are used to today for our defense forces. Here it is important to involve civilian society in discussions and possibly in planning, and to see the resources we intend to devote to this end in the perspective of total defenses, which is often seen in a special light.

But it is a large step from discussing thoughts and ideas about the organization of Denmark's total defenses to seeing it implemented in practice. We can use the next 3 years for this, so that the lines for a revised policy in this field can begin to emerge in the eighties.

SHIPYARD CONTRACTS TO BUILD 13 SHIPS FOR USSR

PM270927 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 15 Aug 81 p 9

[Report: "Thirteen Special Ships from Valmet to the Soviet Union"]

[Text] In the next 3 years, Valmet will deliver ships worth a total of 800 million markkaa to the Soviet Union. The contract for the ship deliveries was signed Friday and will cover a total of 13 vessels. They will be built at the Valmet shipyard in Pansio and at Valmet's subsidiary of Laivateollisuus AB in Turku. A large part of the newly ordered ships are intended for the Soviet Union's Gas Ministry. They will be used within the framework of the Soviet program to exploit Arctic natural resources.

Laivateollisuus will deliver five specially constructed sea exploration ships, three of which will be at the disposal of the Gas Ministry, one at the disposal of the Estonian Academy of Science and one at the disposal of the Geology Ministry.

The ships will be based on a series of five hydrometeorological research vessels which are being built in the shipyard at present, but each will be specially equipped for its particular purpose. The vessels, which will be adapted for Arctic conditions, will be used in charting the continental shelf in the Arctic Ocean and will be equipped with considerable computer and measuring equipment.

Laivateollisuus' deliveries also include four so-called offshore maintenance vessels, which are used in maintenance work during oil drilling and also for the transportation of drilling equipment, water, cement and other materials. The vessels are somewhat larger than the maintenance vessels the shipyard delivered to Norway during the seventies. Their maximum length is 68 m, beam 15 m and draft 5 m. Their engines comprise two 1,800 kilowatt and 2,900 kilowatt diesel engines coupled to two adjustable propellors.

The Pansio shipyard will build four living-quarters vessels for 394 persons. The vessels are a direct continuation of the units which have already been built at the Helsinki and Pansio yards, 55 of which have already been delivered since the 1960's.

These new vessels will be so equipped as to meet the most recent international requirements for environmental protection and fire safety.

Valmet Director Rauno Ilves said that the order will have great significance for employment. It means that there will be full employment in the yards up to the middle of 1984.

SWEDEN

ULLSTEN VIEWS ON SECURITY, NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

PM261505 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 7 Aug 81 p 3

[Aake Ekdahl report: "Neutrality Must Not Be Endangered"]

[Excerpt] "Swedish neutrality must never be jeopardized for a treaty for a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries," Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten (Liberal Party) said on his return from Mexico Thursday. "The Swedish debate on a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries has in part been oversimplified, because no trouble is taken to put forward the difficulties that beset our path," Ullsten said, giving support to his parliamentary undersecretary, Inga Thorsson (Social Democrat) who shook the Social Democratic Women's Association the other day.

For the last week, Ullsten has been preparing the summit to be held in Cancun in Mexico 22 and 23 October and which is intended to breathe new life into the fading North-South dialogue, that is, relations between the rich industrial nations and the poor developing countries. There Ullsten met among 21 other foreign ministers U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, who expressed his intense disapproval of the debate which has flared up in Sweden on a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries.

"U.S. leaders are concerned about this debate because it could complicate the imminent negotiations with the Soviet Union on medium-range missiles," Ullsten said. Ullsten expressed clear support for Inga Thorsson's line, "She makes a distinction between what is politically desirable and what it is possible to achieve," Ullsten said.

When asked if an agreement with other states for a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries would have an effect on Swedish neutrality policy, Ullsten replied: "We would never put ourselves in a situation where we would be dependent on other states as far as the formation of our foreign policy is concerned. This is one of the limitations on the possibility of bringing about a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries. We would have to discuss security policy questions with countries which are part of difference security policy constellations from ours."

Ullsten asserted that there is no risk that Sweden would jeopardize its policy of neutrality for an agreement covering nuclear arms in the Nordic countries. The government and the Riksdag have no intentions of starting talks on such agreements. "But a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic countries would require a superpower guarantee. We must give serious consideration to the question whether we should enter into such negotiations with the superpowers at all. Today the main task is to investigate the political possibility of and the interest in a nuclear-free zone. This is part of the efforts to create disarmament. We could never enter any agreements which would reduce our freedom of action or undermine confidence in Swedish nonalignment and neutrality," Ullsten said. He also dismissed reports that permanent under secretary Leif Leifland would begin negotiations for a nuclear-free zone on his visit to Moscow. "Leifland will hold general security policy talks with the Russian leaders," Ullsten said.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS ISSUE CONSTITUTIONAL PROPOSALS

NC271350 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 24 Aug 81 pp 1, 9

[Izzet Riza Yalin report]

[Text] Nicosia--"The Constitutional Proposals," submitted to the Greek Cypriot side on 5 August 1981 by the Turkish Cypriot side, stipulates the formation of a "Federal Parliament" composed of a "Federal Senate" and a "Federal House of Representatives" with 10 Turkish Cypriots and 10 Greek Cypriots in the 'Senate' and 15 Turkish Cypriots and 15 Greek Cypriots in the 'House'. It is suggested that a "Federal Council," composed of three Turkish Cvpriot and three Greek Cypriot ministers, undertake the executive powers and functions of the Federal Cyprus Republic. In addition to their ministerial functions, Turkish and Cypriot members of the Federal Council will perform the duties of the president of the Federal Republic to be chosen alternately on a yearly basis.

At the end of the constitutional proposals, it is stated that the "1960 treaty of guarantees" and the "1960 treaty of alliance" to which it is said both sides can make amendments, will remain as indivisible parts of this constitution.

Before the concrete territorial proposals, submitted by the Turkish Cypriot side, can be considered as valid in a final agreement, the Turkish Cypriot side sets agreement on the constitutional and security problems as a prerequisite. Moreover, it is stated that these constitutional proposals which should be considered as linked with the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue are debatable.

"The Turkish Cypriot Draft Constitution" is 40 pages long and contains 52 sections. The introductory section states: "Before drafting the Turkish Cypriot proposals, we consider it useful to enumerate the main characteristics of the Federal Cyprus Republic's Constitution." It points out that this constitution is bound to be different from the constitutions of other countries and from the constitutional amendments implemented in such countries.

The first part of the constitution submitted to the Greek Cypriot side contains "General Provisions." The first section of this part states that the "Federal Cyprus Republic has been created with the free will and understanding of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities and that it is a federal state embodying the Turkish Cypriot and the Greek Cypriot Federated States in an independent, sovereign, bicommunal, bizonal and nonaligned system." Moreover, "the annexation of Cyprus to another state--either wholly or partially"--is precluded. It states that the "bicommunal character of the federation and the unity of the state" form the foundation of the independent republic.

The constitution also precludes total or partial union of Cyprus with another country or any option for an autonomous independence.

The official language of the Turkish Federated State will be Turkish and that of the Greek Cypriot Federated State will be Greek. Both language will be considered the official languages of the Federal Republic.

According to the Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals, "the Federal Republic will have its own flag and national anthem, which will be chosen jointly by the heads of the federated states. The Federal Republic authorities and public institutions or public service establishments created by the Federal Republic and its laws will be entitled to hoist the flag of the federal state. They will also be entitled to fly the Turkish or Greek Cypriot flag simultaneously."

The second part of the constitution contains "Basic Rights and Freedoms." Article 12 of the constitution and section 6 of the second part refer to "the freedom of entry, settlement and circulation in the island" for which the proposals stipulate that each federated state will be entitled to regulate itself. The Greek Cypriots are reported to have reacted strongly to this section.

Powers concerning such matters as A) foreign affairs; B) banking, foreign exchange and monetary affairs; C) customs, consumer goods, taxes and tariffs; D) federal budget; E) tourism and information; F) postal services and telecommunications; G) federal health and veterinary services; and H) weights and measurements, patents, copyright and trade marks; all come under "Federal Matters." These powers are vested in the federal state; all other powers and functions will be exercised by the federated states.

The Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals deal also with such matters as "federal economic aims and financial provisions."

One of the important sections of the Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals is the one devoted to the "Composition of the Federal Parliament." Subsequent sections are devoted to the "Federal Council," "Federal Administration" and "Federal High Court." The last few pages of the constitution deal with "Final Provisions" and "Provisions Concerning the Transition Period."

According to the "Federal Parliament" section, the legislative powers of the Federal Republic will be exercised by the "Federal Parliament" which will be composed of a Federal Senate and a Federal House of Representatives.

The "Federal Senate" will be composed of 10 Turkish Cypriot and 10 Greek Cypriot members. The members of the Federal Senate will be elected every 4 years by the legislative assemblies of their own federal state. The president and the vice president of the Federal Senate will not be elected by the same community. All the Senate committees will be composed of equal members from each community. All laws and decisions will be adopted by the majority of each communal group in the Federal Senate.

The Federal House of Representatives will be composed of 15 Turkish and 15 Greek Cypriots. Members of the Federal House of Representatives will be elected by each community separately for 4 years in accordance with the electoral law of the federal state concerned. The president and the vice president of the Federal House of Representatives will not be elected from the same community. All committees of the Federal House of Representatives will be composed of equal number of members from each community. All laws and decisions will be adopted by the majority of each communal group in the Federal House of Representatives.

The draft constitutional proposals stipulate that all disagreements between the Federal Senate and the Federal House of representatives should be resolved by a four-member committee.

Members who will represent both communities on the committees will be elected by the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot groups from among the members in the Federal Senate and the Federal House of Representatives.

[Text] President Denktas has said that he was doing all he could for the consolidation of democracy in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. The president was replying to a question from a correspondent of the TURKISH CYPRIOT NEWS AGENCY, TAK, that opposition papers in the federated state were claiming that he wanted a presidential system of government in the federated state. President Denktas said that the constitution had not been prepared by him but by a constituent assembly. He recalled that in the period prior to the acceptance of the constitution, the Turkish Cypriot community had gathered round the Turkish Cypriot vice president who had been elected in accordance with the 1960 constitution which granted the vice president certain limited rights.

Turkey appreciates Indonesia's policy which contributes to peace and stability in the area, Turkmen said, adding that he had no doubt talks in Ankara would further strengthen bilateral relations. "We will have a highly useful exchange of views," he said.

The minister is accompanied by Director General of Social and Cultural Relations (G. Rusli Noor) and head of the Department of African Affairs (A.G. Unadirdja).

GUNAYDIN QUOTES TURKMEN STATEMENT ON CYPRUS ISSUE

NC271254 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 24 Aug 81 p 3

[Resat Akar report from Nicosia]

[Text] Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has stated that the Turkish Cypriot proposals, with which the Greeks and the Greek Cypriots are so disenchanted, have reinforced Turkish foreign policy.

Pointing out that the proposals were "substantive and comprehensive," Ilter Turkmen made the following statement to GUNAYDIN on his views on the attitude of the Greeks and the Greek Cypriots: "With the proposals we have submitted we have proved that we harbor good intentions and that we want peace. The attitude of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has secured worldwide sympathy."

Commenting on Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis' words that "the problem of Cyprus has become an unbearable burden, and that the foreign ministers of all countries are exercising pressure on Turkey because of the Cyprus issue," Turkmen said: "We are not under any pressure whatsoever on account of the Cyprus issue. Moreover, by submitting our proposals we have fully convinced the world opinion that we are inspired by good intentions. Therefore, I do not share the view that the Cyprus issue has become an unbearable burden on Turkey."

PRESS REACTION TO U.S.-LIBYAN INCIDENT

NC261420 [Editorial Report] The Turkish language Istanbul press for 21-23 August comments on the U.S.-Libyan air clash.

On 21 August, TERCUMAN carries a commentary by Fahir Armaoglu, "The Mediterranean Crisis." Armaoglu refers to the already strained U.S.-Libyan relations, which resulted in the closure of the Libyan Embassy in Washington, and says: "Whether or not this will turn into a Mediterranean crisis depends on which attitude Al-Qadhdhafi will adopt and on his reaction. In any event, this incident will have legal and political consequences." Referring to Libya's unilateral extension of its territorial waters to 200 miles, Armaoglu adds: "This narrows down international waters considerable in this part of the Mediterranean and restricts the freedom of movement of the U.S. 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean." The writer then refers to a televised statement by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, saying: in a way, the event appears to have been planned by the United States. Haig stated that they were in fact expecting such an incident. This means that the maneuvers of the 6th Fleet of the coast of the Gulf of Sidra were expressly designed for such a development. This being so, it means that the United States has specific plans." The article concludes: "Let us not forget that this incident has occurred at a time when an anti-American agreement--the contents of which are not yet known--was signed in Aden between South Yemen, Ethiopia and Libya. The Sidra incident, on the other hand, has followed the Israeli attacks on Baghdad in June and on Beirut and Lebanon in July. Considering all this in a broader context, we cannot easily say that they contribute favorably to peace in the Middle East."

On 21 August, MILLIYET carries a commentary by Sami Kohen, "The Policy of Defiance," saying: "Disagreement on the air space and territorial waters issue is in fact the superficial reason for the air clash. At the root of it all are the everincreasing ideological and political frictions between the United States and Libya.

"Ever since Reagan came to power, the U.S. policy toward Libya has toughened. According to Reagan, Al-Qadhdhafi is behind international terrorism. He is having dreams of expansionism in the Arab world and even in Africa. He is one of the characters who could endanger Western interests. For this reason, Reagan has recently opposed Libya with a view to 'chastizing' Al-Qadhdhafi and he has supported Tunisia, Sudan, Egypt and Chad against Libya. Finally he expelled Libyan diplomats from the United States. Al-Qadhdhafi, on the other hand, has always looked upon the United States as an imperialistic state trying to place the Mediterranean and the Middle East within its sphere of influence."

The editorial continues: "Putting it briefly, there has been animosity between the United States and Libya which can actually be traced to national interests and political differences. This is the main reason behind the recent air clash." After stating that the Americans were aware of a warning by Al-Qadhdhafi, Sami Kohen writes: "But they ignored the warning. They either thought Al-Qadhdhafi was bluffing or they believed in its truth and they wanted to teach him a 'lesson.' There is no other explanation for deliberately holding maneuvers in the disputed area of the Gulf of Sidra. Looking at it from this angle, it cannot be argued that the Libyans are unjustified in considering this act as provocative.

"True, it can be argued that the arbitrary extension of the territorial waters to 200 miles is not 'legal.' But it should not be forgotten that there is not any international agreement on this matter."

Sami Kohen concludes: "The mutual policy of defiance being implemented by Reagan and Al-Qadhdhafi will undoubtedly become more heated after this incident."

CUMHURIYET on 22 August carries an article by Ali Sirmen, "Conflict over the Mediterranean." Sirmen writes: "It appears that the incident has occurred following an attack by Libyan planes on the planes of the 6th Fleet, but both Haig's statement that they had expected this attack and the fact that these exercises had been carried out by the 6th Fleet only 60 miles off the Libyan coast indicate that the Americans were involved in an act of provocation."

The writer then continues: "According to NEWSWEEK, in holding the Egyptian-U.S. maneuvers, the Pentagon and the State Department planned to test Libya's reaction. Had Libya remained indifferent to the Egyptian-U.S. maneuvers, Al-Qadhdhafi's decision on Libya's territorial waters would have become meaningless. With its latest action, the United States has cornered Libya and forced it to intervene." Ali Sirmen further writes: "As soon as Reagan came to the White House and hawk Haig entered the State Department, the United States decided to bully Libya and to subdue Al-Qadhdhafi after the continuous complaints of its privileged partner As-Sadat of Egypt--not only to subdue but even to do away with him. Through his policy of brute force and through the support of this submissive Middle East leader, Reagan is trying to establish a new equilibrium in the Middle East. In fact, Reagan has stated that he would act likewise in disputed waters, thus making it known that he would pursue his policy of brute force right to the end." "If Reagan keeps his promise, everyone will have a chance to see in the days ahead what serious consequences such a policy will entail."

Ali Sirmen concludes: "We understand from the statements made by both sides that neither side is willing to go any further for the time being. However, this does not mean that the Reagan-Haig duo have changed their intentions about Al-Qadhdhafi and Libya. The White House is determined to get rid of Al-Qadhdhafi by any means. On the other hand, both Al-Qadhdhafi and the Libyan people are aware of this plan by Washington and they appear to be prepared to resist the U.S. and Egyptian plans to the bitter end."

On 23 August, HURRIYET carries an editorial by Oktay Eksi "A Cowboy in the Mediterranean." After referring to faulty and arrogant actions by former Presidents of the United States at the Bay of Pigs in Cuba in 1961, in the Dominican Republic in 1965, and later in Kampuchea, Eksi says: "Just like Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin, who destroyed the nuclear station in Baghdad in order 'to secure more votes in the general elections,' and who organized attacks on the inner parts of Lebanon and killed hundreds of women and children just because they are Palestinians." Eksi concludes: "It is impossible to justify the shooting down of planes. The United States, which raises hell when it discovers even a small arms cache in Cuba, organizes military exercises 60 miles off the Libyan coast, which Libya claims to be its territorial waters according to the rules of naval law. This is 'sheer provocation for a quarrel.'

"The United States argues that the Gulf of Sidra is 'open sea' and no one can obstruct military exercises there. What would President Reagan say if the Russians decided to hold similar exercises in the Gulf of Mexico?"

READING OF INDICTMENT CONTINUES AT NAP TRIAL

TA271539 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1520 GMT 27 Aug 81

[Text] Ankara, 27 Aug (AA)--The trial of 587 members and affiliates of the Nationalist Action Party (NAP) continued today with the military prosecutor reading another section of the indictment. The prosecutor pointed out NAP ties with a number of legal and illegal rightist "Ulkucu" (idealist) organizations, party leaders' instructions to those subsidiary organizations, financial support for them as illustrated on NAP documents and half-burnt seals seized in the party headquarters following the Sep 12 military takeover.

During the search at the party headquarters, security forces found systematic lists of public officials, their addresses and their religious beliefs and political convictions as well as those of scholars, he stressed. He listed the names of schools which were dominated by NAP snd its affiliates from which even nonattending pupils wanted by the police were able to obtain diplomas automatically and referred to a test allegedly in NAP leader Alpaslan Turkes' handwriting telling his followers leftists should be knifed to death one by one silently at night on deserted streets. "Exterminating two or three communists a night should be an easy job," the text went on to say, according to the prosecutor.

POLICE NAMED ALLEGED ATTACKERS OF SYNAGOGUE

[Text] Vienna, 30 Aug (AFP)--Police today arrested a Syrian student at an address found on one of the three presumed authors of yesterday's attack on a synagogue here that left two dead and 18 injured. Police identified the man as Muhsin al-'Ashur, 35, but did not say whether he was suspected on involvement in the attack.

In another development, police said the alleged terrorist who was wounded in the attack had identified himself as 'Ali Yusuf, and said he was an Egyptian. But they reportedly were unconvinced by the statement.

Police said they had discovered few new elements in their investigation, but several newspapers reported that the attack was a new episode in a battle between the Palestinian group Al-'Asifah and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). The PLO has denied responsibility for the incident.

Six Arrested

[Text] Vienna, 30 Aug (AFP)--Six people, most of them believed to be Palestinians, were arrested here today at a flat said to be the home of 'Ali Yusuf, one of two Arab suspects arrested after yesterday's attack on a synagogue here, in which two people were killed and 17 hospitalized, police said. Police said 'Ali Yusuf had probably been living here for more than two months.

'Ali Yusuf, wounded in the attack, is now in hospital. Police said he claimed to be Egyptian, but acknowledged that his name was an alias.

Kreisky Comment

[Excerpt] Vienna, 29 Aug (AFP)--Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said he was convinced there was a link between today's attack at a synagogue here in which two people were killed and 17 wounded and the May 1 killing of a municipal councillor who headed an Austrian-Israeli friendship society.

"Now, we must be even more careful," the chancellor said on television in a phone interview from Spain where he is on holiday.

A radical Palestinian group in Damascus had claimed responsibility for the killing of Councillor Heinz Nittel and threatened to kill Mr Kreisky. According to television here, one of the two gunmen arrested confessed to belonging to the Al-'Asifah dissident Palestinian organisation.

Further Kreisky Remarks

[Text] Vienna, 30 Aug (AFP)--Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky said today that Israel's "intransigent policy" was netting "the grapes of wrath." Commenting on yesterday's attack on a Vienna synagogue by Arab gunmen, the chancellor declared that "this deed was committed by extremists seeking to jeopardize an evolution that has awakened the conscience of the democratic states and has led them gradually to understand the problems of the Palestinian people."

Such acts, the chancellor added in an interview with Austrian television, are "directed (against) the policy of the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has nothing to do with that sort of attack." Mr Kreisky gave his interview in Spain where he has been vacationing. He is scheduled to return to Vienna later today.

Israeli Envoy Summoned

TA301227 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1200 GMT 30 Aug 81

[Text] The Austrian Government today summoned the Israeli charge d'affaires in Vienna to explain the condemnation made in Jerusalem about Austria. This refers to the Jerusalem Foreign Ministry spokesman's statement that the attack on the Vienna synagogue is a result of Austria's conciliatory policy toward Palestinian terrorism.

Ambassador's Statement

TA301242 Jerusalem Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 30 Aug 81

[Remarks by Israeli Ambassador Yisakhar ben-Ya'aqov to correspondent 29 August--recorded]

[Text] I regret to say that Palestinian terrorists have felt quite comfortable in Austria because basically the policy of the Austrian Government has been conciliatory and appeasing toward them. To cooperate with an organization which is determined to destroy Israel cannot in any way help a peace solution in the Middle East, and this we shall explain here, certainly in view of what happened last night.

KREISKY AGAINST ANTI-AMERICANISM, FOR DIALOGUE

AU281341 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 28 Aug 81 p 3

[Chief Editor Manfred Scheuch interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Bad Woerishofen--date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] The opposition has attempted to use the events around the attempted arms smuggling and PLO representative Husayn for a propaganda campaign marked by bourgeois narrowmindedness and resentfulness. Have Austria's, and its chancellor's, relations with the PLO been affected by these events?

[Answer] What is involved is a question of principle, and that has long ago been answered. If one recognizes the fact that the Palestinians are a people with the rights of a people, then one will also have to recognize sooner or later its political representative, the PLO. Naturally such a movement cannot act in the same way as a government of a normal, consolidated state. And on the periphery of such a movement there are extremists. However, there are also extremists in the FRG, in Great Britain and even in such staunch countries as Switzerland.

Thus one cannot make the fact that there are various groupings within the Palestinian camp the reason for denying the central representation of this people the recognition it needs. And therefore I will continue to advocate recognition of the PLO as the political representation of the Palestinians, regardless of concomitant developments.

[Question] You received a letter recently from Egyptian President as-Sadat, which was said to be confidential. Could you nevertheless say whether it was on account of these PLO threats that As-Sadat canceled his visit to Austria, or were there other reasons?

[Answer] First of all it must be said that the visit was never intended as a political one, but As-Sadat wanted to relax for a few days in Salzburg on his way back from the United States. He loves Salzburg, and he expressed this wish. If someone expresses such a wish, one tries to comply with it as far as possible. Now he has changed his mind, because of certain events in his country but also because he felt that it was hardly worthwhile to take such security precautions as would have been necessary in the circumstances merely for the sake of 3 or 4 days' vacation. But his visit has only been postponed.

[Question] Do you regard the confrontation recently between the United States and Libya as actually endangering the Middle East situation or rather as a mere incident?

[Answer] I do not regard it as a danger.

[Question] How do you assess the situation between the two superpowers? Are there better chances for detente now that the Reagan Administration has taken over?

[Answer] One has to realize, above all, what one wants in politics. And if one knows that the two superpowers will eventually have to come to negotiations, which I am convinced they will actually do, then it is necessary to consider what prerequisites for that exist in the Soviet Union and what prerequisites exist in the United States. The Soviet Union is certainly worried, irritated about the attempt of a global encirclement, which begins in China and goes through Japan and the United States, and extending to Europe. This is quite a serious matter, especially now when a certain close relationship exists between China and the United States.

On the other hand the Americans have been irritated by the military defeat in Vietnam. It was a highly sacrificial war even for the United States and it ended with a military defeat, the first in U.S. history. Second, the American people regarded the taking of hostages in Iran as a severe humiliation. And now a turn has taken place in the American people's consciousness, whether we like it or not. The new U.S. President believes the best way to overcome this feeling of humiliation is to announce a policy of strength. I myself have declared repeatedly that such a policy can at best be expressed by certain symptoms, such as the downing of the Libyan planes or the autonomous decision on production of the neutron weapon. On a wider scale, however, the policy of strength has failed in the past. One can hardly make greater war efforts anywhere than those that were made in Vietnam, with more weapons or more people. And one cannot have more agents in any Latin American country than were in Iran, simply because there are no suitable conditions for that.

Ultimately, the superpowers will have to talk with each other because their potential for destroying each other and the world is so tremendous that there is no other way. And we must clearly realize what we want. We want Americans and Russians to come to the conference table. That cannot be achieved if one incessantly insults and abuses the Americans. This can only be acheived by holding a quiet, reasonable dialogue with the Americans using arguments which can convince even them. That is, at any rate, a method which I think preferable. However, by demonstrating against the Americans, by insulting and hurting them, nothing will be achieved apart from total destruction of any military equilibrium, without which peace in the world cannot be preserved.

[Question] Do you regard the fact that Social Democrats are in government in both large countries of the Western alliance system, the FRG and France, as a certain guarantee for such a European policy pursuing a course of its own?

[Answer] That is altogether the great event of our time. How does the democratic world look today? On one hand we have Reagan, who adheres to a kind of neoconservativism, an Americanism dating back far earlier than Roosevelt. This policy is at the moment meeting with the approval of the majority of the American people, and we have to accept that. And by his side, from the viewpoint of political ideology, we have Great Britain's prime minister, Thatcher, who, however, clearly no longer has the sympathy of the majority of her people. Her economic concept has led to impoverishment, unemployment, insecurity and revolts on a scale unprecedented in England. That is the one side. On the other side we have for the first time in history at the same time a Socialist president in France and a Social Democratic chancellor in the FRG. This political fact has touched off a dialectical process in the democratic world--as I believe, a highly desirable one--which will lead to the development of a dialogue, to a situation where no side can push through its policy alone but where one has to talk, negotiate, where one has to contemplate matters. This process between the two large world outlooks which are predominant in democratic Europe today, the democratic-socialist on the one hand and neoconservativism on the other--that is the reality.

[Answer] Here we have a typical example of what can be achieved by reasonable argument. In the past President Carter accepted an invitation only very reluctantly--indeed the invitation was never really accepted. The new President was certainly very skeptical from the very outset, and so were his advisers. But gradually we have managed to bring about a change of mind in that respect.

And in a letter President Reagan has sent me, he expresses views about what should be discussed in Cancun which, as formulated by him, could certainly provide a basis for the talks.

Naturally a world problem of this dimension cannot be resolved at such a conference in 2 days. However, we will certainly endeavor at least to somewhat narrow the wide gap existing between the views of the so-called southern camp and the northern camp, and perhaps to even build a moderate bridge. In that respect, I have certain hopes.

I repeat that here is unequivocal proff that despite all differences of our ideological prerequisites it was possible to convince the U.S. President of the usefulness of participating in that summit--even if it were only to serve the purpose of exchanging opinions on problems of such eminent importance.

That is why I regret most deeply that the Soviet Union does not make use of such an opportunity, if only for the personal contacts that develop at such meetings.

FOREIGN MINISTER REBUFFS IRANIAN THREAT

AU311235 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 29-30 Aug 81 p 2

[Georg Possanner report on interview with Foreign Minister Pahr in Vienna--no date given]

[Excerpts] Vienna--After Interior Minister Lanc, now Foreign Minister Pahr has also taken a stance on the threat of the Iranian charge d'affaires that there would be "difficulties" should Austria grant asylum to exiled Iranian President Bani-Sadr. "We might go to the extreme of asking for his recall," Pahr threatened in a talk with DIE PRESSE regarding consequences that would follow in case of a recurrence.

Pahr declared that the present Iranian charge d'affaires was received by the head of the Middle East Department at the Foreign Ministry, Tschofen, who "gave him an appropriate briefing." Asked whether he intended to make any reference to the executions in Iran in his speech at the forthcoming UN General Assembly, Pahr declared that to date such appeals have been avoided. "However, should others decide to broach the topic, we will certainly follow suit."

In the interview Pahr also specified his plans for visiting the United States: He will arrive in Washington for an official visit on 26 October. On the other hand, the visit to Austria by Secretary of State Haig, scheduled for the first half of September, will not take place.

SCHMIDT VIEWS PROTESTS AGAINST U.S. BASES

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 30 Aug (DPA)--Thousands of people have been demonstrating in several FRG cities against rearmament and for maintaining peace in European cities. At the same time, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl criticized biased sections of the peace movement and advocat a realistic security policy. In interviews on the Second German Television Program nn Perspectives," the two politicians today rejected the view that parties in the Fede l Republic acted slowly in initiating the discussion about peace and disarmament.

According to police estimates, some 5,000 people protested in Pirmasens on Saturday against the stockpiling of chemical weapons in U.S. depots in the Palatinate. The demonstrators demanded the closure of a U.S. poison gas depot near Pirmasens which, civic campaigners claim, are said to contain 2,000 tons of nerve gas. The demonstrators also rejected the deployment of new nuclear missiles in the Palatinate. At the final rally, ecologists' national chairman Petra Kelly said that the Federal Government is "untrustworthy". Although it had officially spoken out against the stockpiling of chemical mass destruction weapons in the Federal Republic, it is not doing anything against U.S. poison gas stockpiles. In Berlin, about 30,000 people Saturday attended a rally which demanded a ban on the neutron weapon and condemned the NATO rearmaments decision. Police said that about 3,000 mainly young people on bicycles demonstrated in Bremen on Saturday for maintaining peace in Europe. In Hanover, some 1,500 people demonstrated on Saturday against NATO armament.

Chancellor Schmidt, viewing the participation of communists in the peace movement, said that something cannot be wrong merely because it is supported by communists. The "Krefeld appeal," which the organizers claim has so far been signed by about 1.2 million FRG citizens, "is nevertheless biased against NATO and the Federal Government's policy. It contains not a single word of criticism about the Soviet Union." The greatest peace movement, Schmidt said, is probably the German Trade Union Federation, followed by the SPD. He underlined that peace goes with an approximate balance of the means of deterrence.

Kohl pointed out that in the Federal Republic peace and freedom have been maintained over the past 38 years through the Federal Republic's participation in the Western alliance. The CDU chairman said that the fear of any citizens is understandable, but a slogan such as "peace without arms" belongs in the (?realm) of dreams.

SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, on the occasion of the 42nd anniversary of the German attack on Poland on 1 September 1939, has affirmed the SPD's will for a policy of safeguarding peace. In a statement published in Bonn on Sunday, Brandt said that the SPD is directing "expectant and critical eyes" on forthcoming U.S.-Soviet negotiations on limiting Eurostragegic nuclear arms.

On 1 September, antiwar day, the German Trade Union Federation [DGB], for the first time, is to expound its ideas on "peace through disarmament" at a central rally in Dusseldorf. At the same time, the DGB has started a nationwide petition demanding immediate arms control negotiations.

COMMENTATOR CRITICIZES CONGRESSMAN LES ASPIN

[Commentary signed Ein: "Understatement"]

[Text] U.S. Congressman Les Aspin tends to make understatements. He finds the concern overstated that the Soviets could overrun central Europe with a "massive assault." Les Aspin's thesis is based on intelligence findings. According to this information the Red Army is said to have difficulties in mobilizing its reserve units. Les Aspin concludes that the Atlantic alliance would not have to immediately use tactical nuclear arms to stop an assault by Russian tank units. This argumentation is surprising because Les Aspin is considered an expert. It is not new that there are "differences in preparedness for action" among Russian divisions. Second, he ought to know that nuclear combat arms are an element of deterrence. One can only speculate about their military use. The threat regarding NATO does not emanate from the Soviet Union's ability to mobilize. The present active units bring strategic influence to bear on our security. These are 20 Russian spearhead divisions in the east of Germany and about 30 armored divisions in the European part of Russia. They can--supported by a modern air force--act almost without advance warning.

GOVERNMENT RELEASES 1982 BUDGET FIGURES

[Excerpts] Bonn, 30 Aug (DPA)--The 1982 federal budget will comprise expenditures of DM240.1 billion which is DM700 million less than was agreed between the SPD/FDP coalition on 30 July. This emerged from a federal Finance Ministry document published in Bonn on Sunday which will be discussed at the final deliberations of the Federal Cabinet starting on Wednesday.

According to this document, the incremental rate is just 4 percent compared with 1981, against the originally planned 4.2 percent. The net borrowing requirement of DM26.5 billion planned for 1982 is unchanged.

VIOLENT EXPLOSION AT PARIS INTERCONTINENTAL HOTEL

[Text] Paris, 29 Aug (AFP)--A violent explosion ripped through the Intercontinental Hotel here today, firemen said. First reports said several people were injured at the hotel across from the Tuileries Gardens in central Paris.

Firemen later said 14 people had been injured. Most of them were cut by pieces of flying glass in the restaurant. Witnesses said the blast was caused by an object thrown into a meeting room on the ground floor. A powerful blast knocked down many glass partitions.

Further Report

[Text] Paris, 29 Aug (AFP)--A bomb badly damaged the ground floor of the Intercontinental Hotel here tonight in the fashionable shopping district close to the Louvre and the Place de la Concorde. Fourteen people were sent to hospitals, mostly cut by pieces of flying glass in the restaurant. Four others had very slight cuts.

None were in serious condition, firemen said, although the powerful blast knocked down many glass partitions, caused several false ceilings to collapse, and pulverized chandeliers. A fire broke out and burned some furniture, but was quickly extinguished. Several witnesses said the blast seemed to come from a package that a man left in the hotel lobby, though there was an initial report that the bomb was thrown into the lobby. Police experts found some fragments of an explosive device.

The hotel is in the Rue Castiglione just a few steps from the arcaded Rue de Rivoli and the Place Vendome, where the Ritz Hotel is located. Before being purchased by the Intercontinental Hotel chain in 1968, it was called the Continental Hotel. Inaugurated in 1878, it is the oldest of the luxury hotels in Paris. A majority of the clients are affluent foreigners.

The explosion took place shortly before 10 p.m. (2000 GMT). Guests clustered outside for a while discussing the puzzling attack. But by 11 p.m., most of them had retired to their bedrooms. Police said nobody staying at the hotel was likely to have been the intended target of the bomber, judging by initial scrutiny of the guest register. None of them [word indistinct] police protection, a reliable source said.

The injured people [words indistinct] leave the hospital shortly after midnight following treatment, police headquarters announced. Some of them had not been cut but were momentarily deafened by the blast.

CHEYSSON HOLDS MEETING WITH AS-SADAT ENVOY

PM281053 Paris LE MONDE in French 23-24 Aug 81 p 12

[Text] Usama al-Baz, Egyptian first secretary of state for foreign affairs, had a meeting with Claude Cheysson on the afternoon of Friday 21 August. The Egyptian diplomat said that this interview was not "directly connected" with the trip which the French minister for external affairs is to make 28-31 August to Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, or with his projected meeting with PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat. (LE MONDE 20 August).

Al-Baz also gave Cheysson a message from President as-Sadat for Mitterrand. After the meeting, the number two of Egyptian diplomacy said that he had stressed the need to consolidate the cease-fire in southern Lebanon, and to "very rapidly" make "substantial progress in the search for a solution to the Palestinian problem." He said that the Saudi "peace plan" must be "encouraged" by Europe.

Claude Cheysson made a point of preserving the official character of his visit to the Middle East; this is why he refused to go to PLO headquarters.

ISLAMIC HUMAN RIGHTS CONFERENCE TO MEET IN PARIS

[Text] Paris, 29 Aug (AFP)--An international conference on human rights in Islam countries will be held on September 19 at the headquarters of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Paris, it was announced here today.

The conference, sponsored by the Islamic Council for Europe, will lead to the proclamation of a so-called universal Islamic statement on human rights, Islamic Council for Europe Secretary-General Salim 'Azzam (Egypt) said. The document would serve as a "spiritual guide to contemporary Moslems in their struggle to preserve the rights that were given to them by God," Mr 'Azzam said.

The statement, which has already been composed, presents human rights "as they are clearly defined in Islam," in the Koran and the "traditions of the Prophet Mohammed," Mr 'Azzam said. Its contents were not released.

Participants in the conference will include former Algerian President Ahmed Ben Bella, Saudi Arabian Prince Muhammad al-Faysal, former Sudanese Prime Minister Sadiq al-Mahdi and Mohammed Tofil, the head of Pakistan's Islamic League, Mr 'Azzam said. The London-based Islamic Council for Europe, created five years ago, has observer status in the Islamic Conference.

[Text] Paris, 29 Aug (AFP)--Forty-five per cent of the respondents to a poll for a major French news magazine have approved of President Francois Mitterrand's performance in his first 100 days in office, it was announced here late today.

Thirty per cent of those contacted disapproved, and 25 per cent did not express an opinion in a poll commissioned by LE POINT, a weekly news magazine, and conducted by the French Institute of Public Opinion (IFOP).

Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy registered a higher approval rating than Mr Mitterrand, with 47 per cent of those interviewed happy with his performance.

Fifty per cent of the respondents believed that the left would remain in power for a long period, while 30 thought it would not. Twenty per cent did not express an opinion.

Valery Giscard d'Estaing remained in the public eye, with 31 per cent of those interviewed saying they felt "close" to him. Some 55 per cent felt "far" from him.

LE MONDE INTERVIEWS PLO REPRESENTATIVE AS-SUS

PM281044 Paris LE MONDE in French 25 Aug 81 p 22

[Text] The PLO believes that the European peace initiative in the Near East is "over" and from now on it is only interested in "the stance of each European country separately."

This is the PLO's stance vis-a-vis France as given in an interview with the central press agency by the PLO's representative in France, Ibrahim as-Sus, a few days before the possible meeting in Beirut between Claude Cheysson and the PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat. "This is to be confirmed by the French," is all the PLO, which is putting on a show of indifference toward such a meeting, is saying.

"France's position has been encouraging at times, but we notice that there is a slight regression," Ibrahim as-Sus said before enlarging on this "regression." According to him, "the French authorities talk too much about Israel's security and no longer respect the priority of the principles for a settlement in the Near East, the priority of the Venice and Luxembourg summits." Moreover, "Cheysson said in some statements that the PLO is the representative but not the sole representative of the Palestinian people." "These two stances are a retreat from what we expect from France."

"Having said that," Ibrahim as-Sus nonetheless recognized, "the picture is not so black." The PLO representative in France cited in particular the official welcome given to Qaddumi, chief of the organization's political department, in Paris in July. According to him, Cheysson said on this occasion that France is very anxious for there to be an independent Palestinian state. There is another encouraging aspect: "We know," As-Sus says, "that President Mitterrand is anxious to play a balanced role in the search for a political solution to the Palestinian problem. Because of his friendship for Israel, this will perhaps be easier for him than for Giscard d'Estaing."

"So," he intimated, "We expect that in a short while France will shift in this area, because it is time that it recognized the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. I can see no obstacle to this, and the form does not matter; a public statement or a change in the status of the PLO office in France. In short, something concrete. We believe that this must be clearly defined.

"But," the PLO representative continued, "we are not prepared to wait indefinitely. Earlier, the prospect of a possible European initiative was held out to us. Let's have no more talk about that, it is over.

"Now we are interested in the stance of each European country separately," he added. "The Council of Foreign Ministers of the Arab League countries is going to meet in Tunis on 5 September. We are going to ask that the Arab countries judge the European countries separately according to their stances vis-a-vis us."

Finally, on the international level, Ibrahim as-Sus believed, the PLO's position is "good" and "it is in the process of gaining ground. One thing which would be useful now," he concluded, "would be to broach the Palestinian problem at the level of the UN Security Council in order to get a resolution adopted that speaks in precise terms of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people."

L'UNITA: 'WORRYING' RUDE PRAVO ANALYSIS OF 1968

PM271513 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 22 Aug 81 p 13

[Text] Prague--The Czechoslovak Communist Party [CPCZ] organ RUDE PRAVO has commemorated in worrying terms the 13th anniversary of the military intervention that put an end to the "new course." According to agency reports, the commentary is based on three points. First, the "international assistance of the USSR and the other socialist countries saved Czechoslovakia from disaster from the bloodbath planned by domestic and foreign counter-revolution." The second point concerns the present: "The enemies of socialism are not abandoning their plans to eliminate or at least weaken socialism and are trying to implement them wherever favorable conditions occur throughout the world. The destabilization process in Poland is further proof of this." The third point is particularly worrying, since it can be interpreted as an indirect reference to Poland; the 1968 events and the lessons drawn from them by the CPCZ "have an international validity acknowledged by many communist and workers parties."

Clearly the parties referred to by RUDE PRAVO do not include the PCI, which since 1968 has never ceased repeating and developing its assessment of the "new course" and the military intervention.

PCI'S PAJETTA RECEIVES JAPANESE PARTY LEADER

PM271514 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 21 Aug 81 p 11

[Text] Comrade Tomio Nishizawa, deputy chairman of the Japan Communist Party [JCP] Central Committee and JCP foreign policy chief, has met with Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta of the PCI Directorate. Tomio Nishizawa is starting a visit to Europe which will take him to Yugoslavia, Romania, the Scandinavian countries and the EEC countries, and during which he will have meetings with the leaders of communist and leftwing parties. During their conversation, Nishizawa and Pajetta briefed each other on JCP and PCI positions, noting significant convergences of opinion on the international situation and on the need for contacts and good relations with all communist parties, bar none. At the same time, confirmation was given of both parties' commitment to the detente and peace struggle and of the need for broader mobilization of democratic forces in view of the dangerous resumption of the nuclear and missile arms race.

Within this framework, the need was expressed to surmount the obstacles that exist in Japan, too, to more solid relations among leftwing forces--a precondition for the advance of the processive and peace-loving forces.

DENMARK

FRG'S SCHMIDT, PRIME MINISTER HOLD TALKS ON ARMS

[Text] Copenhagen, 29 Aug (DPA)--Following a political exchange of views with Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen on Saturday, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt sounded a warning about exaggerated talk of fear in Europe. Speaking to journalists at Marienborg Castle, the chancellor said that he considered this to be dangerous. "Fear is also a dangerous counsellor for a politician." Following his talks with Jorgensen, Schmidt reiterated his assurance that without the unanimous agreement of European allies the neutron weapon would not be sited in Europe. The Federal Republic only tolerates this weapon on its soil if other countries also site the neutron weapon on their soil.

Schmidt was opposed to agreeing to a moratorium in the arms debate. Every week the Soviet Union is installing a new SS-20 missile. About 200 of these missiles with a total of 700 warheads are now in position. Even if one were to vote for a moratorium now, there would be no equilibrium of any kind, the chancellor said. This equilibrium has to be established. The deterrent potential in the West is, nevertheless big enough to deter Moscow from taking injudicious steps. And on this account too fear is without foundation, Schmidt said.

His greatest concern at present is for world economic problems, in particular for the unemployed whose number is growing everywhere. Schmidt and Jorgensen during their 3 hours of talks also discussed the subject of a nuclear arms free zone in northern Europe. His view was, Schmidt said, that this could be an interesting proposal. But it stems from a power which, for its part, has not met its obligations so far. As opposed to the Federal Republic and Denmark, Moscow for instance has not signed the nuclear nonproliferation treaty. On the contrary, the USSR is a power which continually increases its nuclear weapons and therefore, is not qualified to call upon others to do even more. The entire discussion about a nuclear arms free north is, in Schmidt's view, premature at present. What is at stake now is that Eurostrategic weapons in central Europe be brought into a state of equilibrium.

The federal chancellor who came to Copenhagen from Oslo after talks with Norwegian Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland, will leave Copenhagen after a dinner with Jorgensen and return to Hamburg tonight.

NORWAY

FRG'S CHANCELLOR, BRUNDTLAND HOLD TALKS 28 AUG

[Excerpt] Hamar, Norway, 28 Aug (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland today discussed European security policy and questions of European cooperation with Norway, which is not a member of the EEC. Schmidt was received for a working visit by the Social Democrat head of government at the state-owned estate of Staur near Hamar, north of Oslo. The chancellor stressed the routine nature of these annual consultations, which contrary to Norwegian press reports should not be seen as having any connection with the parliamentary elections in mid-September.

Government circles said the detailed talks would also include discussion of plans for intensified bilateral cooperation, including technology transfer, particularly in the energy sector, and the submarine project. The techniques and procedures for Norwegian supplies for a possible series of 10 submarines to be build in German shipyards are still not clear.

The chancellor prepared a briefing on the Ottawa world economic summit and German policy at the forthcoming 22-nation North-South summit conference at the end of October in Mexico. Joint discussions and assessments of the situation in the Baltic region and in Poland were also on the agenda.

It was noted in Hamar that the Soviet offer on the creation of a nuclear-free zone in northern Europe was hardly mentioned, in contrast to the important topics of economic and political cooperation. It was said that the chancellor has a negative attitude toward the project.

The small German delegation, in which Schmidt was accompanied by the head of the foreign policy department in the federal chancellor's office, Ministerial Director Otto Van der Gablentz, also expected the Norwegians to show a clear interest in prospects for the continuation of the German policy of East-West detente.

29 Aug Meeting

[Text] Hamar, 29 Aug (DPA)--A "strong interest" in close economic cooperation was stressed today by Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at the end of his talks with Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland. At a press conference at the state-owned Staur estate near Hamar, Schmidt referred to the promising areas of energy, military development and joint research. The Norwegian prime minister too, emphasized her great interest in deepening these economic talks in "close cooperation".

At the end of his 2-day working visit in Norway, the federal chancellor welcomed the Norwegian parliament's decision to lay a natural gas pipeline to Emden. In the field of military development, the construction of 10 submarines in German shipyards is under discussion; however, the extent of the Norwegian contribution still has to be settled.

Federal Minister of Research and Technology Andreas von Bulow will travel to Oslo this autumn for further talks on cooperation. The wideranging talk on international issues also resulted in complete agreement between Schmidt and Mrs Brundtland.

On the U.S. decision to build neutron weapons, both the social democratic heads of government stressed that the stationing of this weapon was not vital at the moment, and could only be considered if all NATO members reached a unanimous decision on this. Schmidt added that stationing the weapon in Germany alone was out of the question.

The second important political discussion on the Soviet offer of establishing a nuclear arms free zone in northern Europe also led to agreement; first, not to negotiate separately with Moscow; second, to wait for details; third, to let such talks, as Schmidt said, become part of the arms limitation talks. In any case, he was "not enthusiastic" about the suggestion.

The chancellor acknowledged that the new U.S. Government under President Reagan had given the American people a new "feeling of self-confidence" during the first 7 months of being in office. "I hope that this will continue", Schmidt said. In this connection, he rebuked the Soviet Union for saying in its propaganda that the willingness to negotiate on Eurostrategic weapons had always been part of its policy when, in fact, it had just begun negotiations this year.

The federal chancellor left Norway after lunch at the state-owned Staur estate and flew to Copenhagen for talks with the Danish prime minister. Schmidt would like to return to Hamburg this evening.

VENIAMIN WARNS AGAINST TURKISH PROVOCATIONS

NC311037 Nicosia I DHIMOKRATIKI in Greek 31 Aug 81 p 1

[Text] Yesterday, Interior and Defense Minister Khristodhoulos Veniamin warned the UNFICYP [United Nations Force in Cyprus] that today National Guard vehicles will drive through Mikhalakis Karaolis Street in the Ayios Pavlos quarter in order to take supplies to National Guard posts even though the Turkish invaders try to prevent them, and he warned the United Nations to take measures.

This [warning] follows serious provocations by the invaders (who are manning posts there) who, last Saturday morning, fired shots in the air and prevented National Guard vehicles from taking supplies to posts in the area as they used to do. The UNFICYP failed to persuade the Turks to change their mind and to withdraw, and asked for time until this morning in order to try to settle things.

Interior and Defense Minister Veniamin has conferred with the National Guard command and it was decided that today National Guard vehicles should cross as they have been doing until now, regardless of the Turkish reaction. Mr Veniamin told us: "We cannot allow such a prohibition because it would be tantamount to conceding more of our rights."

The Mikhalakis Karaolis Street in the Ayios Pavlos quarter touches on the buffer zone; the southern side of the street is inhabited but there are only a few houses on the northern side which borders the invaders' positions. Following last Saturday's incident, the UNFICYP blocked the entrance to the street with barrels and thick barbed wire. There is tension in the area and it appears the Turkish action is probably connected with their exercises.

KIPRIANOU AFFIRMS REJECTION OF TURKISH PROPOSALS

[Text] Cyprus President Kiprianou has reiterated that the proposals recently submitted by the Turkish side cannot become the basis for a solution of the Cyprus problem.

Speaking last night at Stroumbi where he opened the fourth regional "Dhionisia" festival, Kiprianou stressed, however, that we will exhaust all limits and that we will continue a dialogue with good will but not an unproductive and endless dialogue. "I hope," President Kiprianou continued, "that very soon it will become clear whether there is a possibility for progress." Kiprianou mentioned that every possible effort is being made to guarantee some sort of progress toward the discovery of an honorable and just solution of the Cyprus issue based on the summit agreements and the UN resolutions, which include all necessary prerequisites for such a solution.

"Our side," he said, "is ready for a speedy solution provided it is honorable and restores true freedom, the unity of the state and the just cause of our people. If," Kiprianou continued, "we cannot manage this soon, then neither time nor difficulties can bend our determination to continue our efforts and our struggle to the end for restoration of our peoples' just cause." In his speech, Kiprianou also referred to local problems and assured that the government will continue every possible effort within the framework of the state's economic possibilities for the development of all regions and particularly the agrarian regions, with the goal of solving the farmer's problems in the best possible way.

Further Comments

[Excerpt] This afternoon, President Kiprianou inaugurated the new Theletra settlement and handed the house keys to their new owners.

Speaking during the ceremony, Mr Kiprianou said that the government's goal is to improve living conditions in the countryside in order to stop urbanization.

Referring to the national question, Mr Kiprianou said that we are seeking an honorable solution which will be based on the summit agreements and the UN resolutions. He added: For this reason we have been exerting continous efforts in this direction. The Cyprus problem, he said, is passing through a crucial phase these days with regard to the course of the inter-Cypriot dialogue. Sometime ago the Turkish side submitted proposals for a Cyprus solution. However, these proposals in no way can serve as basis for the solution of the Cyprus problem. The president said: These proposals are of a partitionist nature; they run contrary to the summit agreements and the UN resolutions; they violate human rights and basic freedoms, and in fact provide for the establishment of two separate states and not of a united federal state, as envisaged by the summit agreements.

President Kiprianou stressed: Despite the Turkish side's attitude thus far, national interest requires that all dialogue limits be exhausted, because if there is possibility for substantive progress, so much the better, but if not, Turkish intransigence would be uncovered in an indisputable way and this would assist our efforts for the internationalization of the Cyprus problem. He added: We will systematically continue our efforts until we weigh the procedure of the dialogue; however, we are not inclined to hold a fruitless and endless dialogue. I believe that in the near future it will become obvious whether there are prerequisites for substantive dialogue. The actions on the national question are the ones that are dictated by developments and the national interest.

NORTH'S CAGATAY CRITICIZES GREEK CYPRIOT VIEWS

TA281214 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 28 Aug 81

[Text] The prime minister, Mr Cagatay, has said that the Greek Cypriot views on the comprehensive Turkish Cypriot proposals constituted another proof that the Greek Cypriot side intended to continue its usual intransigent attitude.

Commenting on the Greek Cypriot views submitted to the Turkish Cypriot side at the last session of the Cyprus intercommunal talks, Mr Cagatay said that the whole world had believed that the Cyprus problem and reached a positve stage for a solution by the submission of comprehensive proposals by the Turkish Cypriot side, but the intransigent approach by the Greek Cypriots had created disappointment. He stressed that at every stage of the efforts for a solution of the Cyprus problem, the Turkish Cypriot side had adopted a peaceful attitude in good faith to meet its commitments and that this had gained the Turkish Cypriot side the praise of world public opinion.

Mr Cagatay pointed out that the Greek Cypriot intransigent attitude was so inflexible that it could adversely affect the national communities in the island, who were yearning for peace and security, and the motherlands of these communities, as well as world peace. He stressed that the Turkish Cypriots, who were peace-loving, were finding the Greek Cypriot attitude difficult to understand.

Mr Cagatay said that a dialogue could only be continued if the two sides made proposals and that agreement could be reached only then. Mr Cagatay said that the meaning and context of the Greek Cypriot views did not only form a negative reply, but was also adversely affecting the continuance of a dialogue. He stated that the interested countries patiently awaiting a peaceful solution of the Cyprus problem could not assist if the interested sides did not make counterproposals.

Mr Cagatay concluded by saying that the Turkish Cypriot side would continue its efforts in good faith in spite of all difficulties for a solution of the Cyprus problem, which would guarantee a life in peace and security to the future generations in the island. He added that he was expecting all countries to give the necessary advice to the Greek Cypriots to change their intransigent attitude.

PLO SPOKESMAN INTERVIEWED ON SYNAGOGUE ATTACK

AU010835 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1950 GMT 31 Aug 81

[Alfred Stamm telephone interview with PLO Spokesman (Mahmud Labadi) in Beirut--in German, recorded]

[Text] [Question] As to those who pulled the strings of the dreadful attack on the Vienna synagogue, we are dependent here in Austria only on conjectures. Your organization declared in a statement on the attack that it had nothing to do with the attempt, but the two terrorists have claimed to be PLO members. Now it seems reasonable to assume that the perpetrators come at least from the periphery of the PLO.

[Answer] I have to tell you that we in the PLO had nothing to do with this attack. We already issued a communique on the first day which sharply condemned it.

[Question] Then how do you explain the fact that the terrorists declared after their arrest that they were PLO members?

[Answer] I really cannot say anything about that. All I can say is that these perpetrators have nothing whatsoever to do with us. They have nothing to do with the PLO as a PLO organization, nor do they do not come from PLO circles.

[Question] Don't you think there are certain splinter groups and organizations within the PLO which do not want to have anything to do with official PLO policy?

[Answer] These people do not belong to PLO splinter groups either.

[Question] Do you actually believe the people in Europe, especially at a time like this, show that they understand the need to distinguish between PLO splinter groups and official PLO opinion?

[Answer] The Europeans, the European peoples, and here specifically the Austrians, are perhaps having some difficulties in understanding this problem. Many do believe the PLO is against such attacks and that the PLO is opposed to attack on synagogues, churches and mosques, and that we as the PLO respect all religions. It is not our policy to attack any religion or religious community, be it in Europe, the Middle East, America or wherever. We respect all religions and all religious communities. Our resistance is not directed against synagogues but against the occupation of our fatherland, and the people who commit such attacks perhaps have an aim--namely, to discredit the face, the true face, of the PLO--in other words, to harm the PLO.

[Question] Austria has now been the scene of attacks for the third time. What is your organization actually doing to ensure that there is no recurrence of such attempts, to prevent such attempts by Palestinians?

[Answer] We are doing our best to prevent such attacks, and we had already established contacts with the Austrian authorities, actually long before this attack, to bring about cooperation and to prevent such actions.

[Question] The PLO calls itself an umbrella organization of the Palestinians, from which again and again splinter groups emerge. This gives rise to the question: What power does PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat still have today? Is he more or less a chairman without power within the PLO's own organizations?

[Answer] Well, you might like to see it like that, but it does not apply. The chief, Yasir 'Arafat, is chief of the PLO and elected leader of the organization and is respected and so on and so forth. But of course he cannot control all secret services in the world. That cannot be done by the Austrian Government either. I believe the Austrian Government cannot control all Austrians, and there are many Austrians who cooperate with one or the other secret service.

Thus, I can say that the Austrian Government does not control all Austrian people, either. But of course you cannot come to us with such arguments.

[Question] These were only questions, Mr (Labadi).

[Answer] Well, these were only answers, Mr Stamm.

KREISKY: NO CHANGE IN ATTITUDE TOWARD PLO

AU010655 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 1 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] Vienna (AZ)--After his arrival at Schwechat Airport on Monday afternoon, Chancellor Kreisky again declared that the irreconcilable attitude of the Israeli Government was one of the causes for the attack on the Vienna synagogue on Saturday. In the Arab camp a strong polarization is taking place at present, he said, and Austrian policy will not change, "certainly not now, when the world is recognizing the problems of the Palestinians."

"I cannot imagine that a cabinet minister with a sense of responsibility can make such a foolish statement," Kreisky declared after his arrival from Bad Woerishofen regarding the reproach by Israeli Foreign Minister Shamir that the terrorist attack was made possible because the Austrian Government had adopted a "conciliatory attitude" toward Arab terrorists. Kreisky drew attention to the fact that terrorism exists in other countries as well: "One can hardly adopt a tougher attitude than in Israel, and there terrorism is virtually an everyday affair." Kreisky rejected criticism by the Austrian People's Party as "evil demagogy."

Kreisky said he did not want to make the same mistake as the Israeli Government and generalize, but it was a fact that Israel did not do anything against the injustice that has been done to the Palestinians. He added that he made his statement about the partial responsibility of the Israeli Government for the terrible terrorist attack only after Israeli media had blamed him in an unseemly manner for the attack.

Austria will continue to serve as a transit country for Soviet Jews, Kreisky said in conclusion, "but the decision where they go from here must be left to them. We will not tolerate endeavors to alter that." In reply to the question whether he meant by that the "Jewish Agency": "If you ask me directly, yes."

Pahr Rejects Israeli Criticism

TA311431 Jerusalem Domestic Service in Hebrew 1400 GMT 31 Aug 81

[Text] Austrian Foreign Minister Pahr today rejected Israel's protest about Chancellor Kreisky's remarks. Speaking to our envoy in Vienna, Tzvi Lidar, the Austrian minister said this constituted interference in Austria's internal affairs. He expressed the hope that relations between the two countries, which are currently undergoing a deep crisis, would soon improve. He said Austria's policy is aimed at bringing about peace in the Middle East and that Austria does not agree with Israel's position that the accomodating [noha] policy toward the PLO encourages Arab terrorism in Vienna. The minister said he could not yet reply to a question about whether the PLO office in Vienna would continue to operate.

DETAILS OF SYNAGOGUE ATTACK, KREISKY REACTION

AU311530 [Editorial Report] All Vienna dailies and the domestic radio on 30 and 31 August carry extensive reports on the attack by Arab terrorists on the synagogue in Vienna on 29 August.

According to KURIER of 31 August, on pages 11-12, the two arrested terrorists had never met before the attack but had received instructions separately from an unidentified "control officer." According to KRONEN-ZEITUNG of 31 August, page 5, this "control officer," whom "police believe to have already left the country," is "a member of the ultra-radical Al-'Asifah Palestinian group based in Syria."

KURIER says the two terrorists first met at a corner near the synagogue, where they expected some 200 persons to emerge at 1130 after the regular service. They were not aware that a bar mitzvah was scheduled for after the service and that no one left the building. When one of the waiting terrorists--who later gave his name to police as 'Ali Yusuf from Egypt--was accidentally addressed by a passer-by, he lost his nerve and hurled a handgrenade toward the building entrance, which wounded one of the two Austrian policemen on duty there. The second terrorist--subsequently identified as 21-year-old Iraqi student (Husham Mohammad Rajih) immediately opened fire with a submachinegun, hitting the second policeman. A driver-bodyguard of a local businessman, who was in the synagogue, returned the fire and hit Yusuf, who collapsed and was arrested. (Rajih) tried to escape, emptying his Polish-made PN-63 submachinegun and throwing another two handgrenades before he could be arrested. Two persons were killed and 20 injured, including the two policemen.

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 1000 GMT on 31 August says police released six Arabs who lived at the Vienna apartment of one of the terrorists at 51 Engertstrasse and who had been detained after questioning them and checking their alibis, since no connection with the attack could be proved. According to a police official interviewed by the radio, the two terrorists are still being questioned but so far police have not been able to establish who was actually behind the attack. A ballistics test to establish whether one of the terrorists' submachineguns was used in the assassination on 1 May of Vienna councilman Heinz Nittel is still underway, the official said.

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0500 GMT on 31 August carries a recorded telephone comment by Chancellor Kreisky from Bad Woerishofen, where he was on vacation. Kreisky said: "The attack is an action committed by extremists who want to prevent and stop a process which leads to growing understanding in the democratic states for the problems of the Palestinian people. They do not want that; it is to be prevented. This is precisely directed against the policy of the PLO." Kreisky goes on: "I am firmly convinced the PLO has nothing to do with this." Asked about MA'ARIV's contention that there is no reason for Kreisky to distinguish between the PLO and the Abu Nidal group, Kreisky said: "Well, all that does not matter to me, because it is Israel's policy that is to blame for such excesses, do you hear? The irreconcilable policy of the Israelis toward the Palestinians has led to such excesses." Vienna Domestic Television Service in German at 1730 GMT on 30 August carries an additional passage from the same Kreisky interview, in which he adds that Israel "is harvesting the grapes of wrath of its attitude toward the Palestinian people."

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0500 GMT on 31 August carries a recorded interview with Interior Minister Lanc, who answers in the negative a question as to whether he believes there are other potential terrorists who, like (Rajih), are living apparently peacefully and inconspicuously in Austria and could be "activated" for acts of terrorism at any time by their organization.

DIE PRESSE on 31 August, page 1, quotes Kreisky as having told the paper in an interview that it was "tremendously mean" of Israel to link the terrorist attack with Austria's Middle East policy. "That is the thanks Austria gets from having taken upon itself the burden of making possible the emigration of Russian Jews to Israel." On the other hand, he added, according to the paper, "it is quite clear that Austria cannot under any circumstances tolerate attacks by radical Arabs, and that Austria will, with all the means at its disposal, seek to prevent such radical activities on Austrian soil."

DIE PRESSE on 31 August, page 10, reports that a third Arab, Muhsin al-'Ashur, a 26-year-old Syrian, was arrested at an apartment whose address had been found on Yusuf. Police do not yet know if or to what extent he was involved in the attack on the synagogue.

VAN AGT EXPLAINS RESIGNATION AS PARTY CHIEF

[Excerpt] The Hague--On Monday [24 August] Prime Minister Van Agt resigned his post as leader of the Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA] parliamentary group. In a letter to the CDA group in the second chamber, Van Agt wrote: "In the present situation I am unable to function meaningfully and properly as party negotiator [in government formation talks]." In his letter Van Agt emphasized that he is still available for the post of prime minister in a CDA-Labor Party [PVDA]-Democrats '66 [D'66] cabinet, provided that the coalition "is based from the start on aggreements which offer a clear prospect of economic recovery, industrial resuscitation and the consequent maintenance of social welfare facilities and the expansion of employment opportunities. At present no such point of departure exists."

Deputy parliamentary group chairman Lubbers is the obvious choice of successor to Van Agt. In his letter Van Agt stated emphatically that Lubbers was in fact prepared to say "yes" to the question from former government formation team Kremers and Van Thijn whether the government formation process could be rounded off on the basis of the existing texts.

Last week Van Agt advised the group to say "no." However, 12 group members decided to say "yes," although Van Agt had announced that he would resign if the group decided to say "yes." Sixteen other group members, including Lubbers, were prepared to say "yes" but finally decided not to do so because Van Agt would draw conclusions from this.

In his letter on Monday to the CDA group Van Agt stated: "...In the publicity surrounding this affair the overwhelming impression has been that 28 members of our group were in favor of a 'yes' to the government formation team's question and only 19 supported a negative reply. Parliamentarians from other parties are turning this impression to their own advantage. In short, my position as negotiator in possible future talks with the PVDA and D'66 has been greatly weakened. This fact is of great political importance."

After thus asserting that Lubbers' vote last week at the group meeting had contributed to the weakening of Van Agt's position as negotiator, Van Agt also touched on the position of government formation negotiator De Gaay Fortman. Van Agt did not want to "subtract a syllable from" the respect he has for Mr W.F. De Gaay Fortman or from the friendship he has had for him for years. But he wished to attach "great importance" to the fact that De Gaay "last Tuesday expressed strong criticism of the actions hitherto of our group and especially of its chairman." In addition, the negotiator had "clearly adopted a position in favor of the formation of a coalition between the CDA, PVDA and D'66.

In his letter, a copy of which has been sent to the party's executive committee, Van Agt defended his actions in the last few weeks by referring to the criticism the group had always voiced, particularly of the socioeconomic paragraph in both the final report of negotiator Lubbers, De Koning and Van Thijn; and that of formation team Kremers and Van Thijn. Last night the CDA Party executive and parliamentary group were facing the question of how far Van Agt's arguments with regard to the context of the government accord are to be taken into consideration when appointing a new CDA parliamentary group chairman and negotiator.

The CDA parliamentary group will meet today to decide what is to be done now.

Lubbers Replaces Van Agt

PM281109 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 25 Aug 81 p 1

[Excerpt] The Hague, 25 August--Former government formation talks coordinator Lubbers will be the new Christian Democratic appeal negotiator in the cabinet formation negotiations, now that Van Agt has informed his parliamentary group that he is resigning as group leader. This afternoon the group appointed Lubbers as negotiator.

Van Agt would have preferred to see De Koning as the new negotiator, but both the CDA executive committee and De Koning himself were opposed to this proposal.

In their next meeting the CDA parliamentary group will also elect Lubbers as their new leader. He has been proposed by the party executive as the only candidate. De Koning had little inclination to succeded Van Agt, because he had not been informed in advance of Van Agt's decision to resign as parliamentary group leader.

Van Agt reached his decision after having concluded that he "could no longer function meaningfully and properly as negotiator in the present situation." However, he will remain available for the post of prime minister in a new cabinet "provided there are sufficiently clear agreements reached on the policies to be pursued."

LATEST DEVELOPMENTS IN GOVERNMENT FORMATION BID

[Excerpt] The Hague--Negotiation coordinator De Gaay Fortman will today ask the parliamentary group leaders of the Labor Party [DVDA] and Democrats '66 [D'66] whether they are prepared to start new policy negotiations, which would lead to the formation of a center-left coalition. The Christian Democratic Appeal [CDA], which stated Wednesday [26 August] through its new negotiator Lubbers that it was willing to work toward a cabinet comprising the CDA, PVDA and D'66, wants new talks, especially on the socioeconomic conclusions which were reached in an earlier phase of the government formation process.

Depending on the outcome of today's talks De Gaay will draw up his strategy in greater detail. It is still possible that he might call together the three negotiators for talks, but it is also possible that he will want to hold separate talks with parliamentary group leaders Den Uyl and Terlouw, and CDA deputy parliamentary group leader Lubbers.

During the government formation attempt by formation team Kremers (CDA) and Van Thijn (PVDA), the PVDA and D'66 have consistently rejected the proposal that the whole of the section of the government accord covering financial, social and economic policy be renegotiated. However, they were prepared to discuss the addition of corrections in minor areas.

Lubbers, who was received by Le Gaay Fortman on Wednesday, has been instructed by his parliamentary group that the advice of the Netherlands Bank and the Central Planning Bureau must be included in the draft government accord. In addition, he must also see to it that "clear and easily understood" agreements are reached on the 4.5-billion-guilder cuts in the 1982 budget. If he does not succeed in doing so, the CDA second chamber parliamentary group's and CDA party executive's desired candidate for the post of prime minister, Van Agt, is not available for this position.

SCHMIDT ON NEUTRON ARMS DEPLOYMENT IN COUNTRY

DW311109 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1800 GMT 29 Aug 81

[Text] Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stated today that deployment of the neutron weapon only on FRG territory is out of the question. On the occasion of his visits to Norway and Denmark, Schmidt discussed arms limitation in particular with Prime Ministers Brundtland and Jorgensen. He said in a Norwegian television interview in Hamar that he was not an advocate of the neutron weapon. Production is a matter for the Americans, he said. Schmidt went on to say:

[Begin Schmidt recording] Second, we were of the opinion, and I am of the opinion, that if such weapons exist, they must be incorporated in arms control negotiations and this must be done seriously.

Third, if all this should fail, such arms can be stationed in Europe only if this is preceded by a common unanimous decision of the alliance we both belong to. I must say for my own country that we do not intend to deploy such arms only on German territory. We do not want to maneuver ourselves into an isolated position. [end recording]

CHANCELLOR VIEWS DOMESTIC OPINION ON MISSILES

[Text] Hamburg, 31 Aug (DPA)--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has once again expressed his concern that the fear of nuclear weapons in Europe could spread. In an interview for HAMBURGER ABENDBLATT (Monday edition) the chancellor said he is worried "that so many people are frightening each other." Schmidt repeated what he already said on Sunday in Copenhagen: "Europe is too timid." The threat from the Soviet medium-range missiles is "no reason to talk oneself into the idea that war is breaking out next year." The chancellor thought that there was an unfortunte craze during the past few months when "some people who fear such developments did everything to communicate this fear to as many people as possible."

Schmidt emphasized that the "balance of deterrance" is "functioning well," inasmuch as the Soviet side takes seriously the "defense possibilities of the Americans and the entire NATO alliance" and "nobody in the West" is "mad enough" to attack the Soviet Union. "This is not the best kind of peace, but it is the peace which we have known since 1945," the chancellor said. "A clear word must be spoken," he said, referring to his contribution made in a televised discussion in a Hamburg church. "I shall undoubtedly also repeat this in the German Bundestag," Schmidt said.

CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT COMMENTS ON PEACE MOVEMENT

DW311259 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1710 GMT 30 Aug 81

["Bonn Perspectives" feature: Hans Joachim Reiche interview with Chancellor Schmidt; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, the parties are paying increasing attention to peace movements. The SPD discussed this issue just a few days ago. Has the peace movement become so strong that it has possibly slipped away from the influence of the parties and maybe even by the parliament or cabinet?

[Answer] No, I don't think so, Mr Reiche. I see no danger at all for the sovereignty of the Bundestag or the federal government's freedom of decision.

My own party, the SPD, debated and discussed for a whole day at a federal congress in late 1979 the concrete reasons which form the bases of various peace movements today, specifically the concrete reason of the so-called NATO dual decision which is, on the one hand, based on the great superiority of the Soviet Union regarding medium-range weapons, while offering negotiations to the Soviet Union on the mutual limitation of such arms. This decision, on the other hand, contains the intention of catching up with the arms lead of the Soviet Union.

[Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, the peace movement emanating from the Krefeld appeal is numerically the strongest. A great number of communists are involved there who exert considerable influence. Do you think that this casts a certain shadow on the peace movement, and reduces its moral quality?

[Answer] Basically, nobody can be stopped, for example, from rejecting the death sentence because it is also rejected by the communists. A matter cannot be all wrong simply because the communists support it. Speaking of the death sentence, it would be very good if the communists were to eliminate the death sentence everywhere in the world where they are in power. Regarding the Krefeld peace appeal, it was preformulated by the German Peace Union, which is one of the many groups around that are established with strong communist influence. Many people are members of the Peace Union as well as of the Communist Party. I have great reservations about taking this too seriously. Just look at the text of the Krefeld appeal: It is unilaterally against the North Atlantic Alliance and against the policy of the federal government. There is not a word of criticism against the Soviet Union. It is clearly an instrument that is most pleasant for the Soviet Union. It comes in very handy and is being treated in a friendly way by the Soviet Union.

[Question] This peace movement has gained considerable significance in the country and exists in various organizational forms. What influence, Mr Federal Chancellor, can emanate from this movement with regard to German foreign policy, as well as foreign assessment of the federal republic's reliability and its loyalty to the alliance.

[Answer] Judging by the number of members, I would say that the DGB is the greatest peace movement. Then comes the SPD. It is not just by chance that I am a member of a DGB trade union as well as of the SPD; I have always considered myself as an exponent of the efforts aimed at or the movement toward peace. However, that must not be misunderstood or viewed very onesidedly. Peace cannot be established by rendering yourself defenseless with regard to the arms or threats of others.

[Answer] Peace and freedom belong together, and peace and balance also belong together. We need an approximate balance. That was confirmed to us by the Soviet general secretary when he was here in May 1978. We will resume the talks we continued later on in Moscow; we will resume them on German territory. Peace and balance thus belong together. There must be an approximate balance also with regard to determent possibilities.

Since nuclear arms exist and since they have not been abandoned so far although both superpowers committed themselves in the nonproliferation treaty to reduce their nuclear armament--and we have a right to demand that this commitment implemented--it is inevitable that if one side adds arms to its potential, the other must do the same, unless a common lower level is agreed on.

Cooperation and talking to each other are the second important components of peace. When the SPD held its great discussion at the 1979 congress, which I already mentioned, I predicted that the Soviet Union would be prepared to negotiate although it strongly refused to at that time. I predicted that the Americans would be prepared to negotiate, although a new president 1 year later stopped to take stock of the situation. But I will be right on that point too.

Naturally, we Germans will not only bring the strongest influence to bear, as before, for negotiations to take place; we will also bring strong influence to bear regarding the material content of the negotiations.

We want the content to lead to a decrease on both sides. We believe that the current level of armament, including nuclear armament, is being carried much too far in Europe and that this level is not necessary for maintaining peace.

CDU OFFICIAL ON POSSIBLE SCHMIDT-HONECKER SUMMIT

[Text] Kiel, 31 Aug (DPA)--In the opinion of the deputy chairman of the Inner-German Committee, Olaf von Wrangel (CDU), a possible German summit meeting between Schmidt and Honecker ought "to be prepared in such a way that agreements are ready for signature." He expressed this opinion through his party's press service in Kiel today following a 3-day tour of Mecklenburg by CDU members of the Bundestag from Schleswig-Holstein.

He said that in talks with official representatives in Rostock and Schwerin, "all topics affecting the intra-German sphere had been discussed frankly and plainly." He said that these included "the Soviet arms drive as well as the compulsory exchange amount [of foreign currency for visitors], the inhuman demarcation line, the neutron bomb and nuclear energy." If the federal government now wants to set the inner-German dialogue in motion it must "persistently link all future economic and financial agreements with humanitarian concerns."

REPRESENTATIVE SUMMARIZES DISCUSSION WITH HONECKER

[Text] East Berlin, 31 Aug (DPA)--GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker today presented to State Secretary Klaus Boelling, head of the FRG permanent mission in East Berlin, (?his reply) to the letter from Chancellor Helmut Schmidt. Boelling said after the 75-minute talk that questions of mutual interest were discussed during the meeting.

He assessed the exchange of letters as confirming what the two sides believe is the need for the two German states to try for a constructive dialogue even in difficult times. Boelling is to hand the letter to Chancellor Schmidt. No details were given about the confidential talk between Honecker and Boelling.

GENSCHER ON ANNIVERSARY OF NONALIGNED CONFERENCE

[Text] Bonn, 31 Aug (DPA)--On the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the first conference of nonaligned countries in Belgrade, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, in Bonn on Monday, has paid tribute to the objectives of that movement. "The nonaligned states rightly resist any attempts to communicate East-West antagonism to the Third World," Genscher noted. The foreign minister underlined the principles of German foreign policy which determine Bonn's relations with the nonaligned states: respecting the autonomy and independence of these states as well as a willingness to cooperate on the basis of equal partnership.

JORDAN'S HUSAYN CALLS FOR NEAR EAST CONFERENCE

PM011122 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Aug 81 pp 1, 4

[Eric Rouleau 28 August interview with King Husayn of Jordan in Paris: "Europe Could Encourage the Convening of an International Conference Leading to a Definitive Solution to the Israeli-Arab Conflict"]

[Text] "I came to meet President Francois Mitterrand to find out what possibilities France has--along or with its European partners--for taking practical initiatives to promote a just and lasting peace in the Near East," King Husayn told us immediately. He added that, although he has not had time to tackle this subject in detail, he would like to see the Paris government make approaches in at least two directions:

"Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 are clearly incomplete and ineffectual," he stated. "First Europe could propose an amendment or a new resolution which would complete the earlier ones by explicitly confirming the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. In addition, Europe could take action to convene an international conference to draft an all-embracing and definitive settlement between Israel and all the Arab parties involved in the conflict without exception. Around this roundtable there would of course be the Palestinians, but also representatives of the United States, the USSR, Europe and the Third World. Indeed, the conflict concerns not only the Near East countries but the entire international community, in that it constitutes a threat to world peace. Europe would be the first to suffer the consequences of an explosion in view of its proximity to our region and the traditional close links it maintains with us. In my opinion, only an international conference of this kind could lead to peace."

[Question] However, a similar conference which was to be held in Geneva in the fall of 1977 did not take place....

[Answer] It had every chance of succeeding, but it could not take place because of President as-Sadat's unexpected visit to Jerusalem, which resulted in an Israeli-Egyptian agreement.

[Question] It was explained at that time that the Egyptian head of state took that initiative to prevent the USSR, which he deeply distrusts, taking part in drafting a settlement.

[Answer] President as-Sadat said nothing about that to me during my visit to Egypt a few days before he took that initiative. Moreover it is ridiculous to try to exclude the USSR from the peace process. The Soviet Union is a great power which ought to shoulder its responsibilities in maintaining world peace; in any case, it is present and involved in Near East affairs. Furthermore, its attitude to the Israeli-Arab conflict is positive and is similar to that of most West European countries.

The Dispute Over Camp David

[Question] In this connection, do you not think that France's wish to guarantee Israel's security "within secure and recognized borders" coincides with your own concept of the terms of a possible settlement?

[Answer] Israel's repeated attacks, particularly the recent attacks against Lebanon and Iraq, clearly prove that it would be necessary to include provisions likely to guarantee the security not only of the Jewish state but also, and more especially, of its neighbors. Moreover, borders in themselves do not constitute a guarantee of security. No country in the world can aspire to lasting peace if it imposes its desire for expansion on its neighbors. In this respect, the international community should remind Israel that Security Council Resolution 242 bans any acquisition of territory by force.

[Question] You rejected the peace process outlined by the Camp David agreements which the French Government, for its part, has accepted. Do you not think that such a difference of opinion might be an obstacle to Franco-Jordanian agreement?

[Answer] Whatever assessments are made on this subject, the facts will ultimately prevail: It is now obvious that the Egyptian-Israeli treaty has not solved the fundamental problem of providing a homeland for the Palestinian people. The talks between Mr as-Sadat and Mr Begin on the subject of autonomy for the West Bank and Gaza are doomed to failure. It is quite impossible to exclude the PLO from the peace process.

[Question] Although the French Government agrees with this last assertion, it nonetheless thinks that Mr 'Arafat's organization alone cannot represent the Palestinian people.

[Answer] Who else could speak on the Palestinians' behalf? I do not see anybody else. Even Mr Begin has failed to name any interlocutor who would find favor in his eyes. I hope that the French Government will realize that the PLO has been recognized worldwide as the Palestinian people's sole legitimate representative.

Mr Mitterrand's "Political Intelligence"

I have drawn President Mitterrand's attention to the urgent need for a solution. The aggressive policy followed by Mr Begin's government, the support of a broad section of Israeli opinion for this policy which the recent election showed, the increasing number of faits accomplis in the occupied territories, and the humiliation and despair felt by the Arabs, are creating an explosive situation and threatening the very stability of the regimes in the region. We are in danger, I told him, of quickly reaching the point of no return, and it will then be too late to speak, as we are now speaking, of Israel and the PLO recognizing each other, of peace and peaceful coexistence between the Jewish state and all its neighbors. [answer ends]

King Husayn then paid tribute to the "political intelligence, sensitivity, understanding and friendship" which President Mitterrand showed during their 26 August talks.

"We were already acquainted somewhat through correspondence," the king stated, "but our meeting enabled us to gain a better understanding of our respective positions. We have decided to have frequent contacts in future. President Mitterrand has accepted my invitation to visit Jordan as soon as he has time."

King Husayn will visit the United States next November, but he clearly does not expect President Reagan to show as much understanding.

"The American leaders are mainly concerned with their domestic problems and do not understand that by giving Israel unlimited support in all spheres they are merely encouraging the Begin government's aggressiveness and intransigence.

"Furthermore they do not understand that we are not primarily worried by what they describe as the Soviet threat but by the persistence of the Palestinian conflict which, I repeat, threatens the existence of the Arab regimes and world peace. Hence, I think that the Americans should not regard us as insignificant or think that we are forced to follow their policy. . . ."

Additional Husayn Remarks

JN281944 Amman Domestic Television Service in Arabic 1800 GMT 28 Aug 81

[Text] His Majesty King Husayn has expressed the hope that France and Europe will continue their efforts to attain a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

In a statement to French television in Paris yesterday, His Majesty King Husayn said that the Palestinian problem is the Palestinian people's cause and their right to their own soil. His majesty expressed the belief that Israel has no desire to reach an agreement with the Palestinian people. When we say that the Palestinian people may choose between two things, his majesty added, we mean that this choice is dependent upon the existence of a free atmosphere and the respect of UN Resolution 242's principles.

His majesty added that the Palestinians must determine their own future and that this cannot be achieved by resorting to the logic of force. As for Jordan's stand, his majesty added, we support the Palestinian people and their just cause. His majesty asserted that neither Israel nor any other side can dissuade the Palestinian people from bringing peace to their own land.

His majesty said that a state of instability exists in the Middle East because of the continued Israeli occupation of the West Bank, Jerusalem, the Gaza Strip and the rest of the occupied Arab land. His majesty added that the Palestinian people are suffering from an injustice which should not continue any longer, and that if nothing is done to bring about a comprehensive peace based on the recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination over their own soil, then the entire issue will remain pending.

Husayn Concludes Visit

[Text] Paris, 31 Aug (AFP)--King Husayn of Jordan and French Defense Minister Charles Hernu agreed in talks here today to work toward strengthening bilateral relations.

Jordanian Ambassador Tahir al-Masri said after the meeting that the talks had centered on means of improving Franco-Jordanian relations. In particular, Jordan would continue to "ask for and obtain new military equipment" from France, he said.

In 1979, Jordan ordered 36 Mirage F-1 fighters, the first of which were scheduled to become operational this year. King Husayn arrived in Paris last Wednesday on a private visit. He previously met with External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson and Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert.

Mr Hernu said the meeting was "extremely friendly." King Husayn and his wife later left Paris by air for Las Palmas in the Spanish Canary Islands.

ISRAELI, PLO REACTIONS TO CHEYSSON-'ARAFAT MEETING

LD311536 Paris Domestic Service in French 1400 GMT 31 Aug 81

[Text] After the Cheysson-'Arafat meeting, two reactions are to be noted. The first one is that of Me'ir Rosenne, the Israeli ambassador to Paris, who says that Francois Mitterrand is still Israel's personal friend, despite the displeasure caused by this meeting. On the other hand, Ibrahim as-Sus, the PLO representative in Paris, is of the opinion that France must override every legal obstacle to recognize the PLO.

Claude Cheysson is still in the Middle East, in Syria now, where he is due to be received by President al-Asad this afternoon at his summer residence. He already had two working meetings with the Syrian prime minister. Political dialogue between France and Syria is possible even if their positions differ, the French minister of external relations said.

PREMIER MAUROY INTERVIEWED ON ECONOMIC POLICY

PM281100 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 25 Aug 81 p 2

[Richard Liscia 24 August interview with French Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy: "Mauroy: 'For employment, we are preparing measures which will cause surprise'"]

[Excerpts] Question: In banking circles, people are wondering why credit must be nationalized at any price, since in any case, these circles say, interest rates are determined by the Banque de France. Do you think, Mr Prime Minister, that this observation could persuade the government to postpone or to give up the nationalization of credit?

Answer: No. Once again, I repeat, we will stick to our committments. In particular, the nationalization of credit. What is it really a question of? First of all, it is a question of the implementation of a reform which was intended, since the Liberation, by General de Gaulle. The deposit banks had been nationalized, but it was planned to do the same with the investment banks which were, for instance, authorized to accept deposits.

As for credit, you cannot think solely in terms of interest rates. It is at least equally important to know which activities credits are oriented toward. And it is impossible to conduct an economic policy without having control of this aspect.

How can we ensure the country's development and support agriculture, business and industry if the necessary financial flow results only from the sum of fragmentary decisions and if the state, as guarantor of the national interest, does not express its will? The money saved by French people should be utilized in the best possible way in productive investments. Since we intend to restore the French economy, ensure its revival and launch real planning, we must give ourselves the means of acting. The industrial nationalizations which we are going to carry out would be illusory if we did not take control of credit.

Question: We have been told so often that the Western economies are interdependent that today everyone is wondering how the French Government's economic policy--which is diametrically opposed to that of the U.S. administration--can succeed?

Answer: The interdependence arises from the growing commercial exchanges between different countries. This interdependence does not imply similar political and economic options for each country. Otherwise, you could not have relations between, for instance, East and West, or between the industrial countries and those in the process of development.

On the other hand, it is true that if one of our chief partners is the victim of a recession, we suffer from the repercussions, and vice versa. It happens that our policy is based on revival. I note that certain U.S. experts are afraid that their new President's choices may result in recession. Time will tell who has chosen the best path. For the present, it must be noted that liberal experiments have failed. If they had turned out well, we might have doubts. But look around you, particularly in Western Europe, and you will see societies ravaged by unemployment, undermined by inflation, and incapable of planning for the future; their crisis is that of the liberal system. What our experiment is intended to find is new paths, a future.

It is true that liberal policy is continuing to do damage, and I deplore that fact. Thus U.S. monetary policy is helping to prolong and accentuate the current disorder in economic and trade relations and is weighing very heavily on all West European countries. Similarly, the European Community appears incapable of organizing and protecting its market and is submitting passively to attacks. France will seek to modify this situation, in particular, with respect to countries which are flooding us with their products without a thought, in trade exchanges, for a rule of reciprocity.

We are not protectionists. But Europe must protect itself, on our common borders, from the international economic disorder. If it fell down seriously on this duty, France would be justified in taking its own steps to safeguard itself. We do not accept the free exchange of disorders.

Question: We have a very general idea of that the 1982 budget will be like; a substantial deficit, an ambitious growth rate, a high inflation rate. But we do not know what impact such a budget could have on employment. Do you not think, Mr Prime Minister, that under this plan many sacrifices are made for the sake of employment, without the least guarantee that these sacrifices will be useful?

Answer: I will talk more fully on this subject next month, when Parliament is in session again. For the present, I can tell you that we do not intend to be satisfied with a high inflation rate. The minister of economy and finance has said so, and I confirm it.

The concept of a budgetary deficit is worth clarifying. We expected to find a deficit of the order of FR30 billion, but it has proved to be about twice that. And, I will say, this deficit is passive. It results, in effect, from the very slow--not to say negative--growth in France during the first half of 1981. We have decided to implement a policy of revival. We have therefore turned this passive deficit into what I will call an active deficit, which will permit us to speed up investment and thus create jobs.

Moreover, I will recall that in recent years Western countries with high achievement levels, like Federal Germany and Japan, have tolerated deficits higher than the one we foresee with a view to revival.

When the draft finance law is published you will see that the budgetary priorities resulting from the judgements I have made tend to permit the relaunching of economic activity. Substantial efforts have therefore been authorized in research and technology, energy-saving policy, industrial investment and the construction and modernization of housing. All these sectors create jobs, and are therefore priorities for us.

Many other, still more specific, measures are under preparation and will be announced later. Some will cause surprise. We have, in fact, inherited 2 million unemployed; and a number of enterprises were artificially kept alive before the elections and are necessarily disappearing today. Everyone can understand that it is not enough just to wave a magic wand to reverse the trend. It will take us 12-18 months to stop the increase in unemployment and start reabsorbing it.

Everyday we do something more to win this supreme battle, which is at the center of the debate between the liberal society and the society we wish to build. Indeed, if our predecessors failed in the sphere of employment, it is certainly because their choices implied unemployment. They saw it as one more means of regulating the economy. A means which failed, moreover, not only because inflationary pressures were not reabsorbed, but above all because the production machinery became dormant and investment dried up.

We do not accept the view that technological evolution, systematically replacing men by machines, is implacable. Such an evolution, if not controlled, would simply lead to a false prosperity, regained for a few people, being staked on the marginalization of several million unemployed. We do not agree to pay such a human price or to impose such a financial burden on French society. The left intends to make the right respect labor, which is the only means of giving everyone autonomy within society. So we have oriented our entire economic policy toward reabsorbing unemployment.

Let us add that in France today unemployment is not only the result of the economic situation, of a means of organizing the production machinery. It is also the consequence of social changes characteristic of our society. First, demographic disruption, with the arrival on the labor market of whole classes born in the years following World War II.

In recent years, the influx of these young people into the educational machinery has already swamped educational establishments and universities. Today, they are older, and are causing the job market to burst at the seams.

Women's legitimate desire to gain a new form of independence through work is also intervening. This means that a policy of combating unemployment cannot be implemented solely in the economic sphere. This justifies the measures we will announce in the next few weeks.

Question: You are aware of the general criticism of the government's initiatives in the sphere of the media: People might think that the government has replaced the old leaders of radio and television networks, who, rightly or wrongly, were regarded as friends of the old regime, with new journalists who seem to be entirely in favor of the present government. Do you not think it would have been right to place at the head of television and radio networks people chosen solely for their professional qualities and not for their personal political orientation?

Answer: I do not know what the newly appointed heads of radio and television networks wuld think of your question. You seem to know more than I do about their political views. I do not want to answer in personal terms, but it seems to me that the women and men chosen have had opportunities, in the past, to prove their strength of character and independence French people still remember, for instance, an attempt made 11 years ago to put new life into television news.

In the media, we asked confirmed professionals and independent figures to help us make successful changes. We gave them no political directive. They can testify to that. The only government instructions are to create radio and television services which respect pluralism, democracy and freedom of expression; good quality radio and television, encouraging creativity. In the law on the media now in preparation, we will take care to ensure that the link of subordination which we have just broken cannot be revived, and that the country's radio and television will finally grow up, that is, that government officials wll no longer have to answer this kind of question.

Question: What are your relations with the communist ministers? Do these relations conform to a special protocol arising from the sometimes stormy relations which the PS and the PCF have had in past years? Or, on the contrary, are they really relaxed and do you feel there is no distinction, within the government, between Communist ministers and Socialist ministers?

Answer: There is only one government, with one policy. All its members are in agreement, and I can make no distinction between them. When you see ministers and secretaries of state at work, do you feel some are less autonomous than others? Of course not. All exercise their functions without restriction, in full and with complete responsibility. It would be inconceivable for things to be otherwise.

True, Socialists and Communists are different. Everyone knows that. But we have made a contract together to serve the country's working people, to serve France. During the first 100 days of the 7-year term, this contract has been scrupulously respected. The same will be true, I am convinced, in the future.

EL PAIS INTERVIEWS FOREIGN MINISTER CHEYSSON

PM261600 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 23 Aug 81 pp 4-5

[Feliciano Fidalgo 21 August interview in Paris with French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson: "There Have Been Unacceptable Excesses in France in Affair of Spanish Truckers"]

[Excerpt] Question: How is French diplomacy taking shape, 100 days after the Socialists' accession to power, which is regarded as a symbol? Is it possible to speak of a French model?

Answer: I do not like the word "model." The French are already vain enough by nature. Moreover, you cannot speak of a model in foreign policy. Diplomacy today is simply an external translation of policy. What I would speak of is what is, let us say, characteristic of our diplomacy.

First, I would emphasize our desire for independence. It is a French tradition. We French are rather like our national Asterix [allusion to cartoon character]. We have our customs, our shortcomings or virtues, our towns or villages, our civilization, and we wish to preserve them. A Frenchman will tell you that he likes you, but if you tell him what he must do, he will not accept it. The Spanish people are also like that, and that is why we are sometimes so unbearable for our friends. Second, our diplomacy recognizes that same right for all peoples of the world. Third, we take into account the fact that there is no clear separation between domestic and foreign policy. The current internationalization of the economy demonstrates this fact. Medium- and long-term planning taking only French interests into account is no longer possible. And last, all this means that our diplomacy is not solely the task of diplomats and foreign affairs experts; it concerns the entire population. There is no longer a foreign policy; there is an external translation of our policy and an external impact on our policy.

Question: What do you understand today by a modern, progressive diplomacy with respect to the Third World, in particular, and taking into account the existence of the two blocs led by the United States and the USSR?

Answer: A modern diplomacy today is one which brings into play all the state's forces; that is, one which is not solely a matter for diplomats. As a result of this, our diplomacy is inspired directly by our needs. We are bound to the United States by a common underlying conception of society, of man's place in society and of the human--humanist--aim of the development of society. That is, we are bound by a common rejection of all forms of totalitarianism. For the rest, we have different interests, even for objective reasons, such as the different geographies, potentials and geographical areas. And we are not a great power. For this last-mentioned reason, in order to maintain our independence, we must support that of the other countries which strengthen our independence within the Atlantic alliance. But concerning this issue, the Americans should accept diversity. This is the gravest matter at issue with the United States. For some people, the alliance means a column of twos, and everybody must move in the same direction, with the same uniform and at the same pace. That is when we say: "That does not interest us."

For us, the alliance means the joint defense of some essential elements with some--also joint--means of defense. After that, everybody proceeds as he pleases. We have our specific nature, and the American cannot represent us. For instance, the United States is the most important military power, and this gratifies us. But they must accept that we have our own capabilities and our particular interests.

As far as the USSR is concerned, it is a continental neighbor. That is a fact. And it is allied with European countries with the same political orientations. But we feel that those countries are close to use through their history, for religious reasons, through their origins--sometimes, linguistic origins--and through their way of life. Hence, our capacity for contact with these countries and the fact that we should support their desire for independence. I am referring to cultural, not military, independence. That is their affair. This action of ours in East Europe cannot be the same as U.S. action, either. An instance: The United States cannot be moved as we are at the survival of Polish Catholicism under the Red flag.

"In Third World Not Even 10 People Believe in Marxism-Leninism"

Question: How do you analyze the international communist movement today?

Answer: That is an exciting topic. I am old enough to remember how Marxism-Leninsm meant everything to tens or hundreds of millions of people at the end of the resistance.

Communism was the driving force of the USSR--one of the great world powers--and represented a form of social organization which brought rapid progress. Communism was the method of liberation for the weakest peoples and people. Over the last few years, I have traveled throughout the Third World as an EEC commissioner, and I have found not even 100 or 10 people who believe in Marxism-Leninism. There are indeed people who are convinced of the advantages of an alliance with the USSR for defending their peoples. I believe that throughout the world there are no longer many people alive who believe in Marxism-Leninism as a method of economic takeoff. I would like to know how many believers are left even in the socialist countries.

Question: Despite attempts to create other world focuses, East-West relations--that is, the dialogue between Washington and Moscow--dominate the world's future in almost the same way as they did the day following the Yalta shareout. Does French diplomacy accept this situation?

Answer: East-West relations are our survival, our condition of existence. If there is no balance between East and West, we are certain of nothing. But when there is a balance, when stability is achieved, whether through detente or through cold war (I prefer the former), East-West relations are no longer the central issue of diplomatic life. Currently the sectors in motion are the protagonists, but for some time attention has been centered so much on East-West relations that some people are forgetting those sectors, which for their part are continuing to move [sentence as published].

Is there really an imbalance in the present-day world? I do not believe so as yet. But I believe that there are threats of imbalance, and for this reason we are adopting firm stances on the East-West issue. What I do believe is that a change in the nature of the balance is now taking place as a result of certain Soviet initiatives, such as the introduction of a new generation of theater nuclear weapons (the SS-20 missiles), and also as a result of brutal interventions--specifically, one brutal intervention. This worries us in France. Otherwise, there is stability in East-West relations. That is not the case in the North-South issue. There everything is continuing to move.

"France Will Have To Model Itself Largely on Spain"

Question: What impression did you receive during your recent tour of Central America, and, in addition, do you regard any kind of Franco-Spanish cooperation in that region of the world as feasible?

Answer: First of all, I must say that I am something of a novice in Latin America; I scarcely know it. And concerning what must be done in Central America, it would be better for the French to ask the Spanish, who have always maintained an intelligent view of this matter. The Spanish have been repeating for a long time that countries must be judged not by their political language but by their culture and personality. France will have to model itself largely on Spain. I will summarize my impression following the tour: In the first place, I was surprised by the diversity of those Central American countries. That diversity is creating disputes. And the danger of linking up those disputes with the East-West conflict seems to me to be dramatic. This is what some people currently desire in Central America, exaggerating the threat which each country represents to its neighbor. A disturbing increase in the stakes is occurring in the field of the weapons with which each is threatening the other. That is how interventionism, illustrated by the United States on several occasions, comes about.

This is my great fear in that region. My strategy? To encourage these countries to work together among themselves and to turn toward the outside world--toward the EEC, for instance--and, second, to create a zone of peace, exchanging information of every kind, beginning with that concerning arms. And the countries in the best position for achieving this are those of the region. That is why I first of all visited Mexico, which I informed of our readiness to take part in any project devised by a country of the area.

Question: You also visited the Maghreb a few days ago. What is France's policy in that region? And, more precisely, does it intend to intervene in the West Sahara conflict, as the Polisario appears to desire?

Answer: France wishes to adopt no stance on the Sahara, because we are bound to those peoples by many ties, and any stance would be important. If the parties concerned want our help, they can rely on it in advance, but they must seek it formally. There was an important problem--that of self-determination--and this has been approved by the OAU. For the rest, the most important visit was that to Algeria. Henceforth, all the bilateral problems with Algeria are in the process of being resolved. President Mitterrand will visit Algeria; France will contribute to Algeria's development. Second, Algeria has some authority in the North-South problems, in the Arab nation and in Africa. And so we are presented with a field of cooperation with Algeria which previously did not exist. In the case of Morocco, continuity has been confirmed, but with considerable prospects of development if the Sahara problem is resolved on the basis of the prospect of self-determination outlined by King Hassan II in Nairobi.

Question: How do your coming meeting with 'Arafat and your tour of several Near East countries next week square with pro-Israeli French Socialism?

Answer: I personally have more friends in the Arab world than in Israel. With other Socialist comrades, the reverse is the case. France has relations and interests with the Arabs and with Israel, and that is positive. As far as the basic problem is concerned, I would recall the right of peoples to a fatherland, to a state. It is the right of the Israelis and the Palestinians. But pending a comprehensive solution, it is important to make progress, such as, for instance, at present, by helping to maintain Lebanon's unity.

"I Want France To Cooperate in Guinea's Development"

Question: It is suspected in Spain that France is not very interested in consolidating the state of Equatorial Guinea. If it came to be dissolved into the French-speaking area, this would suit France economically. What would you say?

Answer: Your question makes sense, because I have not heard of Guinea since I became a minister. As a Frenchman, I want France to cooperate in Guinea's development. There is a terrible lack of skilled personnel in that country. And those whom they have were trained by the Spanish, so they understand each other better. But there is no objection in principle to France's taking part in Guinea's development.

Question: Let us now leave world issues and consider the Franco-Spanish conflict in the light of recent statements by your Madrid counterpart Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca. According to him, "the French authorities' passivity with respect to the attacks on the Spanish truckers verges on the intolerable, not to say criminal." He added that "France must recognize that antiterrorist cooperation must be achieved and that we are entitled to join the Common Market."

Answer: First of all, I reject the word "conflict." There are disputes and differences, but "conflict" is something very strong. Let us now consider all the rest. "Spain is entitled to join the Community." It is a positive sign that Spain wishes to join the EEC. This proves that that difficult exercise of the Community has considerable political value.

As far as I am concerned, I want Spain to join, and to join as soon as possible. But the EEC must deal with problems of its own to ensure that Spain's entry will not immediately create a dangerous situation. The EEC must deal with certain agriculture matters to prevent Spain's membership creating insurmountable problems, both within the Community and in other countries with which there are agreements, and with this I am referring particularly to those of the Maghreb.

The issue of terrorism: We are as committed as anybody else--that is, as the Spanish--to the struggle against terrorism. I believe that my colleagues Defferre and Badinter have impressed their Spanish counterparts to that effect. This is absolutely categorical. What has complicated matters is the fact that for some time our stance on extraditions of refugees for what we regarded as political reasons and the struggle against terrorism were confused. But, I repeat, cooperation against terrorism must be enhanced as far as possible.

Question: Mr Minister, your antiterrorist firmness seems to contradict to some extent the categorical statement by Interior Minister Gaston Defferre, in whose opinion the struggle of Basque Homeland and Liberty's military wing "is political." This would alter the description of the actions which are the consequence of that struggle.

Answer: Terrorism brings characteristic problems: The organization of gangs, possession of weapons, clandestine action. And all this must be combated in every possible way.

Question: Please, you were going to speak about the issue of the Spanish truckers attacked by the French.

Answer: There have been excesses in France; that is true, and that is unacceptable, you are right. There is a problem in organizing the fruit market which must be dealt with, which has not been tackled so far and which the two ministers of agriculture will attempt to resolve. In my opinion, the fruit producers are those who are most responsible, but, I repeat, this does not justify the attacking of the trucks.

Question: Mr Cheysson, when you recently visited Spain, your statement in favor of Spain's entry into NATO caused surprise, especially bearing in mind that the Spanish Socialists are opposed to that initiative on the part of the Madrid government.

Answer: I am not a Spanish Socialist. I am a minister of the French Government. I believe in the unfortunate need for the Atlantic alliance. I believe that it is necessary in order to defend a certain kind of civilization. And in the interest of the alliance, as it now exists, it is necessary for Spain to join it. As soon as Spain so decides, it will enjoy France's warm support.

Question: In conclusion, what is your opinion concerning two current issues which have caused a certain sensation in world political and strategic circles--that is, the manufacture of the neutron bomb by the Americans and the incident between Libya and the United States?

Answer: I do not really understand the neutron bomb business. There was a U.S. statement which I deem neither opportune nor necessary. All of us already presumed that the Americans are manufacturing the bomb. Then they say that they are manufacturing it for themselves, but I cannot understand how they are going to use it on their territory. I do not understand very clearly, and for the present the matter does not concern us.

The incident of the Libyan and U.S. aircraft makes me wonder, what happened? How did they come to open fire? This is what seems to me to be deplorable. When the point of violence is reached, I become alarmed. Were there ulterior motives on either side? I do not know, and I wonder who could know. For the rest, international reaction is restrained for the present, and there is a desire to limit the incident; that is, there is a desire to see only an incident and not a political demonstration. I will also take it as an incident.

[Text] Rome, 31 Aug (ANSA)--The situation in the Mediterranean and efforts to make peaceful coexistance prevail in full respect of laws and rules of international relations were the central topics of talks here today between Maltese Prime Minister Dom Mintoff and Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio in La Valletta, an Italian Foreign Ministry communique announced here.

"In the course of the long and cordial talk, the state of implementation of the recent Italo-Maltese pact for technical, military, economic and cultural cooperation was examined.

"An Italian military mission has been in Malta since the end of July and contributes to carrying out civilian public works and training of Maltese Armed Forces personnel," the communique concluded.

RADICAL PARTY LEADER FRANCESCO RUTELLI ARRESTED

[Text] Rome, 30 Aug (AFP)--Francesco Rutelli, the general secretary of Italy's Radical Party, was arrested yesterday on charges that he incited soldiers to disobey orders to take over an area near a nuclear power station, political sources said today.

Mr Rutelli surrendered to authorities after several hundred people demonstrated yesterday in Foceverde, 60 kms (36 miles) south of Rome, to protest the use of a part of the coast near Anzio as an artillery firing range. Expropriation proceedings for the land, which is near a functioning nuclear power plant, are to begin on Tuesday.

To protest the military plans, Mr Rutelli allegedly distributed leaflets asking troops to "disobey the laws that oblige them to defend with their arms the illegal work of the Defense Ministry," the sources said.

The same leaflets, distributed outside a military barracks, acknowledged that "according to the fascist penal code in effect, whoever incites a soldier to disobey is subject to heavy penalties." The Radical Party has a small contingent in the two houses of Parliament, with three per cent of the vote. It has led an increasingly vocal anti-nuclear campaign for several years.

PCI'S NAPOLITANO VIEWS RELATIONS WITH SOCIALISTS

PM271431 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 21 Aug 81 pp 1, 12

[PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano article: "Why Togliatti's Example Is Essential"]

[Excerpt] Ferments and Contradictions

In view of the combination of difficulties and negative factors, one can understand the spread within our ranks of indiscriminate reactions, attitudes of mere condemnation, pessimistic outlooks and even forms of bewilderment--especially when one witnesses increasing maneuvers aimed at a prejudiced exclusion of the PCI from the government area, while putting the blame perhaps on the PCI itself and systematically distorting its stance. But in fact the Italian situation now manifests other aspects and a great complexity of ferments and contradictions--even on the strictly political plane. There is a possibility of broad unitary movements and major convergences, chiefly on the delicate and crucial issues of the defense of peace, negotiations and agreement on a balance at the lowest possible level between the two blocs in Europe and worldwide. As far as political alignments are concerned, it is a fact that a new and more serious crisis has opened up within the DC; that significant shifts have taken place among the electorate; that almost 3 years after the negative conclusion of the democratic solidarity experiment the need for a change in the country's political leadership arises again, though several forces translate it into ambiguous or petty formulas. Therefore, the building of an alternative is not merely a vital necessity for imparting a new impetus to the democratic political system, but a real possibility, however weighty the resistance to be surmounted and however arduous the problems to be resolved.

To exploit and improve these possibilities, it is of decisive importance to proceed in accordance with the method taught us by Togliatti; the method of "differentiated analysis," which averts the serious error of "the inability to distinguish among different things" or of placing or forcing into the same context forces that should be "kept separate." It is also of decisive importance to put to advantage, under present conditions, the major Togliattian option of the "new party," as a party that "does not restrict itself to criticism and propaganda" but which puts forward solutions, promotes combative and constructive mass involvement and action, and carries out a "political initiative" capable of modifying negative stances and factors.

This applies in particular in relation to issues such as the regeneration of the parties. As far as we are concerned, apart from condemnation--and the same applies to all forces with a sense of state and of public morality and an awareness of the gravity of the defects corroding Italian democracy--we can and must formulate precise reform objectives and commitments, seeking and indicating solutions even to the most delicate problems of relations between the parties and the state and of the administration of public affairs.

Our criticism of other parties' modes of conduct, political activity and government is motivated by a most keenly felt anxiety prompted by the scope created for what Togliatti called "clearly reactionary" trends aimed at indicating and eliminating the role of the political party so as to replace it with "a system of pressure groups." In view of the deteriorations that have occurred in public life, we do not merely stress our dissociation from those phenomena and forms of conduct; we do not isolate ourselves in a haughty reaffirmation of our "diversity," but intend to use our party's "special characteristics" to contribute to a correct restoration of the role of the parties as a whole as an indispensable element in the continuity and development of democratic life. Moreover, we know that the crisis of relations between the parties and society and the crisis of democracy are connected not only with degenerative phenomena but also with very complex problems and processes with which our party too is struggling to come to grips.

We discussed all this as the January Central Committee session, but differing opinions and tendencies persist which should be discussed more openly.

Unitary Outlook

The necessary polemic with other parties and anxiety regarding their dubious conduct must not, however, obscure our unitary outlook, especially with regard to the quest for an understanding with the parties that represent social forces wanting change and committed to the need for a new and progressive leadership for Italian society. One acute and enthusiastic scholar of Togliatti's works, our dear Comrade Ernesto Ragionieri, has pointed out how difficult it was for Togliatti, before the creation of the "new party," to reach the "recognition of the need for this alliance in political, and not only social terms;" and how the origins of this difficulty should be viewed "in relation to the radical critique of all the other Italian parties"--from the old Socialist Party to the Catholics' new political organization, the Popular Party, under which banner the Communist Party emerged in Italy--"and in relation to the long duration of a situation which seemed to justify rather than confute that critique." It is necessary to reflect again on this lesson of the past, too, to avoid backtracking on that fundamental gain of Togliatti's.

Elucidative Dialogue

A harsh rivalry is under way at present within the Italian left, prompted mainly by the PSI's legitimate desire to secure a more prominent and autonomous role, together with increased strength. However, we feel that we must express--and we must not omit to do so--serious reservations concerning the forms and aims of this rivalry; hence our polemics and, in any case, the objective need for an elucidative dialogue. A dialogue that will proceed from the problems and needs of the workers movement and the country, from the most pressing Italian and international political issues, looking ahead to the future; that will proceed from the current experiences of cooperation among Communists, Socialists and other leftwing and secular forces, especially from those whose full political potential has not yet been realized in the government of the regions, major cities and local authorities. It is essential that we succeed in encouraging and conducting this dialogue with the same untiring unitary persistence, with the same impetus of a major national political force and with the same open attitude to change which Togliatti evinced with respect to the advent of the center-left. The Togliatti who urged the party to "enter and act within the reformist context" instead of trying to combat reformism with "mere verbal opposition" or "empty invective" and who ratified our adherence to an outlook of gradual development toward socialism and extolled the Yugoslav Communists' "fortunate error" of "having introduced innovations into the doctrine and practice of the struggle for socialism." This is the example that must inspire us, in the presence of unprecedented problems and necessarily ambitious objectives such as those now facing us, so as to establish ourselves still more as an essential force of the Italian and European left and to contribute to its regeneration.

AVANTI Reaction

PM271450 Rome AVANTI in Italian 22 Aug 81 pp 1-2

[Silvano Labriola article: "Isolation and Dialogue Among Communists"]

[Text] Not often has a commemorative political article such as Giorgio Napolitano's on the anniversary of Togliatti's death seemed so little concerned with the past and so much more so with the present and (maybe) the future. It is an interesting and significant fact.

To talk right away in terms of a split within the PCI leadership group could doubtless be an exaggeration and inaccurate. The various policies pursued recently by that party have not given rise to any substantial debates within its leadership group either when first announced or when subsequently implemented.

However, it is necessary to acknowledge two important new elements in this article. This must be done by the Communist Party, to which the signal is principally addressed, and it can be done by anyone else, especially us, because of our specific interest as a leftwing force.

First, there is a realization of the sterile nature of the current line prevalent in the PCI, and an implicit demand for its elimination is issued by invoking the political and cultural visor possessed and imparted by the Togliatti leadership.

If a major leftwing force with a sizeable popular following continues to shut itself off in splendid isolation--still less credible following the most indiscriminate overtures of the historical compromise--its prospects are a withdrawal from politics and a loss of contact not only with the other political forces, especially of the left, but also with the country's new emergent realities.

A leadership group that no longer addresses the outside world and whose internal dialogue is apparently steadily decreasing--and this, moreover, at a time of crisis of ideologies--neither ensures itself any real driving force nor strengthens its own political representation and that of the party that is leads.

So much so that the new policy initiated in a speech by the PCI secretary general has remained in mid-air, the logical and inevitable outcome of an alternative proposed in the most harsh and obstinate polemic toward the future necessary allies in such an alternative.

The pointer to a way out of this isolation by autonomous initiative embodies some significant points which we acknowledge as such, particularly since they correspond to opinions that we have held for some time, with at least as much steadfastness as Comrade Giorgio Napolitano now urges, in general.

These are two essential points, albeit presented in oversimplified form.

The first concerns a different attitude toward the Socialist Party, with regard to its image, its policy and the role that it plays. This implies an innovation of tone, perhaps of awareness, with respect to a leftwing force and what it represents and expresses within the leftwing social and cultural area and with respect to the policy that it pursues which is not forced on it by anybody -- only by the real situation that it consciously represents.

The left is composed of its differing manifestations, all of which have an equal right to represent it. Among them, dominance will be achieved not by the one convinced that it will prevail but by the one that carries shared social interests furthest forward by means of its policy.

The second element is the one that invokes the need for a dialogue on specifics, on specific issues, on political convergences, albeit partial.

Quite right, too, we have been demanding this for a long time, in the belief that it will benefit the sector in favor of the country's regeneration, and that it is the only way to attenuate the conflicts within the left, or at least to confine them to the context of a civilized dialogue, which has too often been abandoned when, as a result of errors of political leadership, a free hand has been granted to saboteurs. If these are roses, they can start flowering in September.

PCI'S INGRAO ON N-BOMB'S IMPLICATIONS FOR ALLIES

[Commentary by PCI Directorate member Pietro Ingrao: "Do Sovereignty and Independence Still Have a Meaning?"]

[Text] The argument used by the Reagan administration is the following: The decision to manufacture the neutron bomb concerns the United States alone since the neutron bomb will not be "exported" but will always remain on U.S. territory.

The argument seems to be officially accepted. But is it really true? I would like to deliberately leave aside the serious doubts put forward regarding the credibility of the pledge to restrict a bomb like the neutron bomb to U.S. territory--a bomb which is known to have been desigend and made specifically for "export" to European territory and to other possible similar theaters of war. This is not the only point at issue. There is another one, a more fundamental question.

Italy is linked to the United States by military ties which are today reflected in the extremely practical and material presence on our territory and in our waters of the U.S. armed forces. Should we have forgotten it, we were reminded of it by an impressive and curious coincidence on the eve of Reagan's announcement, with the decision to deploy cruise missiles in Comiso. In these circumstances, how can anybody fail to see the vast implications which the U.S. decision to manufacture the neutron bomb has for Italy now? How can anybody say that the matter does not concern us?

The assertion that the USSR already has the neutron bomb was attributed to French [Defense] Minister Hernu (by television newscast No 1). If this were the case, it certainly seems strange that neither Carter nor Reagan should know it, or that, knowing it, they refrained--for some unknown reason--from revealing it when they could have used it to justify the U.S. decision to manufacture the bomb.

But there is a more credible interpretation of Hernu's statement: In other words, that the USSR might be capable of producing the neutron bomb now. But in such a case, would the implications of the U.S. decision not be even more serious, since it is capable of immediately drawing this kind of response from the Soviets? Is it not even more surprising that this decision was taken without any consultations with allies, who act virtually as the outpost of the NATO military network? And does this not make a decision like the one taken for Comiso even more serious since it involves us even more deeply in such a race, such a spiral? In short, for those who act as the outpost in such a terrible confrontation, any action which, instead of slowing down, speeds up the race, is even more serious in its implications. Some people argue that these risks are necessary because otherwise we would be at the mercy of the Soviet superpower, of its decisions and its weapons. But what does this argument mean in the age of nuclear weapons?

Let's examine the question for a while. Passively accepting its logic, it means that a growing range of countries, big and small, developed and underdeveloped, cannot do anything but accept dependence on the decisions of one of the two nuclear superpowers; or rather of both nuclear superpowers, since the possible movements of one now strongly influences the decisions taken by the other. What decisions they are! We have seen them in the past few days; the terrible revival of the nuclear arms race, the construction of weapons which raise the techniques of destroying life to a new level, the adoption of tools and strategies which make it even more possible and "practicable" to instigate nuclear war, and even to overcome what has been called the balance of terror. Thus, according to the argument which I have cited, billions of human beings (this is the figure which must be mentioned) would be able to note the implications of actions which now call into question the very future and duration of life on this planet.

When Reagan asserts that the neutron bomb decision rests with him, in other words with the United States, he is making an outrageous statement. He is throwing this fact in our faces; that terrible decisions concerning the nature of life, the fate of the environment, the use of colossal resources, the course of decisive scientific sectors are increasingly likely to be controlled by a limited number of top people who never even have discussions with the allied countries which serve them as an outpost.

What meaning do words like democracy and the people's power have in this context? In what do the independence and sovereignty of states consist if they exclude any influence on such important decisions? What meaning do concepts like equal rights, alliance, and Europe's atonomy have? How will we define these words in the future? Nobody wants to walk around with his head in the clouds or to ask the impossible. But in the face of the U.S. action, it is terrifying to read statements by Italian politicians which do not contain so much as a hint of these questions. I know how difficult it is to give an answer. But do these questions exist or not? Do they or do they not relate to the real and profound things in our lives, the country's real future? Is it possible that DC leaders, who talk of finding "Christian inspiration" again, are not horrified at such developments, on these essential questions and the course this world is taking? What does "Christian inspiration" mean in that case?

But I am broadening the question: What point is there to politics today unless they are capable of tackling such questions? I am not saying it should be possible to solve them all but at least to start to identify them, become aware of them and assess their scope.

I do not know how many young men and women were clearly aware of Reagan's announcement on the neutron bomb. I know that there is reason to be ashamed of the way in which the public radio and television stations informed them of this fact. But what crude stupidity it is to think that all this does not have a heavy price: for Italian democracy, for all the problems raised, for everybody! How irresponsible it is to think that it is then possible to call for effort and sacrifices (in the name of the "common interests" or the "future") from young people who see that a few powerful people can decide how and if to change the way of life in the world with nuclear weapons! Why express surprise, weep and put on mourning because there is a bloody trail of violence through so many of our cities?

Some experts are now questioning the right and legitimacy of taking "majority" decisions like those relating to nuclear questions which attack future generations. Is this humbug? Is it a doctrinaire attitude? I know that there are cries of alarm about the crucial questions raised; these are signs of growing awareness.

How irresponsible it is to turn a blind eye to these questions. Is it possible that the new rise of pacifist movements in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Britain are insignificant? Is it possible that people do not realize the urgent need, not to accept everything the USSR says (nobody is asking such a ridiculous thing), but to try any possible path of negotiation, every possible germ of deceleration in the dreadful race?

Take care; because in a nuclear race between the two it is not just peace which is at stake but ideas which form the basis of modern history--democracy, independence, equality, the possibility for the ordinary man to rely on true and decisive things. Is it conceivable that ideas like this, which are most instilled in the hearts of billions of men and women, can be trampled underfoot and destroyed without devastation, dreadful disunity and revolts? Is it conceivable that this complex world, in which whole continents are painfully making their entrance on the stage, could calmly allow itself to be strangled in the hands of a few "supermen?" These are the difficult questions raised by the recent news. It is a good thing to know that for those who are not prepared to bow their heads these are questions which call for struggle.

PAPANDREOU INTERVIEWED ON ECONOMIC SOCIALIZATION

NC291720 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 29 Aug 81 p 8

[Interview with PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou by EXORMISI; date not given]

[Text] Question: Will PASOK encourage private initiative and in what ways?

Answer: PASOK not only does not intend to discourage private initiative but, on the contrary, aims at directing it to serve national development strategy--with credits, a new policy of incentives and, of course, public investments as levers. The harmonious integration of private enterprise within the framework of the national development program constitutes a necessary prerequisite and a guarantee for private enterprise's unimpeded development.

As we have repeatedly stressed, special attention will be paid to the utilization of the enormous productive potential of small and medium-sized businesses which New Democracy had essentially elbowed out through its credit policy, thus causing huge damage to the national economy. In Articles 138 and 139 of the [PASOK] declaration, we have defined the role of small and medium-sized businesses in the country's economic development.

138: To serve the goals of industrial policy, small and medium-sized businesses will play a decisive role to give a new dimension and renewal to entrepreneurial activity by utilizing new forms of organization and cooperation.

Small and medium-sized professional and artisan enterprises, together with farmers and workers, constitute the backbone of the country's economic system. Although they are basic factors for economic and social development, they are currently being abandoned to their fate, and they are seeking an alternative solution for their survival. In many cases, small and medium-sized businesses have a high degree of effectiveness in the production of a great number of products. To successfully deal with their problems, a number of measures of active support by the state will be taken.

139: A decisive measure will be the opening of the banking system for the supply of capital for investment and turnover. However, in addition to capital, small and medium-sized businesses need help to be able to use it productively.

Our program for social strengthening and economic and technical support of the small and medium-sized businesses and of craftsmen is based on:

--The promotion of various forms of cooperation, like cooperatives, unions and so forth. We attach special significance to the establishment of supply cooperatives for the purchase of goods and raw materials at lower cost.
--The guarantee of the necessary modern technology.
--The training of entrepreneurial and cooperative cadres by common advanced training centers.
--The establishment of artisans' associations for the standardization and sale of products.
--Facilities for the preparation of technical and economic studies for new projects or extentions [of existing projects].

Question: How will PASOK deal with the issue of public enterprises, their operation and their deficit balance sheets?

Answer: Currently, public enterprises operate inefficiently, offer a bad quality of services and have huge deficits that foster inflation. PASOK will implement radical structural and functional changes in public enterprises. These changes presuppose a flexible administrative machine that will follow private economic yardsticks for effectiveness and abolition of inefficient state interventions.

(Wherever a departure from private economic yardsticks is necessary, a procedure for compensation by the state budget will be provided for.) However, regular checks will be implemented both preventively, by linking the enterprise with national programs, and as a restraint on the basis of accelerated results. The establishment of democratic administration, that is the decisive participation of the working people in the administration, planning and operation, will decisively contribute to an increase in effectiveness and to the purge of public enterprises. (Declaration, Article 115, subparagraph H).

Question: What measures does PASOK intend to take for many large enterprises with debts of many million drachmas that are not able to meet their obligations?

Answer: An extremely significant category of large enterprises exists that is described as "overindebted." Overindebted enterprises are those where the capital itself is only a small percentage of the total capital and which, at the same time, are in no position to meet their obligations to the banking system.

PASOK will take the following measures for these businesses:

A) Investigation of their viability on the basis of evidence regarding cost structure, productive potential, market prospects and number of employees regardless of the finance structure of the enterprises' credit.

B) Radical reorganization and reorientation of production for those businesses that will be judged viable.

C) The capital such businesses have borrowed from banks will be converted into shares either completely or partially.

Question: What procedure would be followed in the case of the socialization policy, particularly in the banking field?

Answer: The PASOK socialization policy aims at securing social control over basic fields which could be described as key fields (or fields of economic infrastructure) to safeguard the policy of change and to more effectively mobilize all the productive forces of the country. This policy is of antimonopolistic and antidependent character. Not only does it not affect private initiative as a whole, but it also strengthens it by promoting the interests of small- and medium-sized enterprises which are being undermined by the immunity of the big monopolistic capital.

Within the framework of this policy, PASOK will proceed with the immediate taking of measures for effective control (socialization) and for the developmental orientation of the entire banking system. To a considerable extent, the goal is to render more substantive the present typical state control over the largest part of the banking system. An important factor for rendering more substantive the social control over the banking system would be the participation of working people in the administration of banks.

There will be strict control over foreign banks so that their operation may not negatively affect the country's credit, monetary or exchange policy. The socialization of the banking field will provide the most decisive lever for the implementation of the country's development program. The insurance companies belonging to banks will be merged into a unified insurance organization which will be under strict social control to reduce cost and decisively to improve the quality of services.

Question: Which concrete fields of the economy will be socialized?

Answer: The envisaged socializations include energy; public utility enterprises; mass transportation and communications; major enterprises for the exploitation of the mineral wealth; big shipbuilding yards; the steel, cement and fertilizers industry; and the pharmaceutical industry, as well as units that directly concern national defense.

The criterion regarding the goals, organization, operation and administration of the fields--which will be socialized and which are already nationalized or under national control--would be to serve the society as a whole and not the big private interests as is the case now.

The element which would make a decisive contribution to the carrying out of the development goals would be the participation of the working people and the representation of local self-government and of social organizations in the administration of the enterprises.

In most of the fields, the socialization procedure will be advanced, following a careful study of the special conditions in each case. It must be noted that this procedure is being followed today by the Socialist government of France. It would be necessary to establish and operate special committees for the evaluation of property data and for compensation, for the holding of deliberations with professional organizations and with interested enterprises, and for defining the capital of parent and affiliated enterprises.

The question of compensation will not be arbitrarily dealt with, but, on the contrary, in accordance with the provisions of Article 17 of the constitution. As it is concluded from its provisions, this procedure is very strict; decisive legal guarantees are provided for the enterprises to be socialized. Of course, there is an alternative solution: The conversion of bank loans into shares--when the amount of these loans is higher than the capital itself--in which case there would be decisive bank control over the operation and structure of enterprises.

Question: What measures will PASOK take concerning the import trade and the medicinal industries?

Answer: 1) Regarding the import trade, to bring it favorably and immediately under social control, a social agent should be established capable of direct intervention in the commercial procedure when conditions for the supply of the market dictate this and to protect consumers from arbitrary cost increases.

2) The following procedure will be followed for the socialization of the medicinal industry: At the first stage, a national industry will be established which will obtain essential raw materials through direct agreements with international firms for the manufacture of brand preparations and other pharmaceutical products, while at the same time, the technological foundations will be laid to guarantee the supply of essential raw materials from local production. The national medicinal industry will be combined with the establishment of a national medicinal depot and the establishment of a national prescription index.

Concerning existing medicinal industries which, as a rule, essentially occupy themselves with the mere packing [of preparations], their role, position and usefulness will be examined in conjunction with the speed of development and prospects of the national industry. It should be noted that the PASOK policy in this field consists of the full guarantee of the quantity and kind of pharmaceutical products at such price that will guarantee the function of the new health system to be implemented by PASOK.

Question: Does PASOK accept foreign investments and under what prerequisites?

Answer: PASOK accepts that foreign investments can contribute to the country's development under the following prerequisities:

A) They should concern true industrial units, not commercial enterprises using an industrial cloak.

B) They should import advanced technology from which the economy can benefit by correctly assimilating it.

C) The economic administration should be transparent and the outflow of capital should be impossible.

D) They should be under substantive Greek control (Declaration Article 119).

Question: How will the agricultural-industrial cooperatives, which PASOK has announced, operate?

Answer: The basic means for the achievement of the goals, the cornerstone of PASOK agricultural policy, is the productive agricultural and agricultural-industrial cooperative. It will provide new employment opportunities to the people of the countryside, will unite the farm with the factory and will give an impetus to regional development. We shall proceed with the immediate liberation and purge of cooperative organizations, with the first step being the promotion of a new law that will protect democratic structure and operation.

Two basic principles will govern cooperatives:

--the farmer's ownership of his land.
--voluntary participation.

State and quasistate usefulness controls will be abolished. Legality control will be made only judicial authority. Cooperatives will essentially undertake the entire task for the supply of resources, processing, production, transport and trade.

A decisive cooperation between cooperatives and local administration of all levels should exist for the simultaneous promotion of the broader interests of villages and provinces and to aid cooperatives with the necessary infrastructure work.

The Greek economy's enterpreneurial structure--as we presented it above--aims at the achievement of a decentralized, independent economic development within the framework of a democratic decentralized planning, that is, aims at formulating a development course that will serve not the interests of the economic oligarchy but of the working Greek people.

Government Spokesman's Reponse

NC291817 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 29 Aug 81 p 1

[Statement by the Greek Government spokesman on PASOK chairman's interview; date not given]

[Text] We understand the difficult position to which the PASOK chairman has been led because of the prime minister's disclosures on what the country and the people would be subjected of it what Mr Papandreou calls "socialization" were ever to be carried out.

As for the claim about distortion of the PASOK chairman's positions, the issue is very simple: New Democracy always makes use of Mr Papandreou's written statements which he has never denounced as yet. And, of course, New Democracy is not to be blamed for Mr Papandreou's repeated inconsistency and "changes."

MINISTRY DENIES INVOLVEMENT IN ANTI-IRAN ACTIVITIES

TA282025 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 28 Aug 81

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has stated that a report in a U.S. daily that Turkey, in cooperation with other countries, has engaged in activities against Iran is unfounded. The Foreign Ministry Information Directorate General statement on the issue says:

It has been learned that an article in the Washington POST today by Jack Anderson claimed that the CIA--in cooperation with certain other countries--is planning secret actions against Khomeyni. The article also mentioned Turkey, saying that Turkey and Egypt will be used in these activities. From the viewpoint of Turkey, this report is totally unfounded. Turkey has traditionally never permitted its territories to be used against other countries. It has been stated on various occasions that our policy toward Iran is based on friendship and fraternity.

TERCUMEN CRITICIZES REAGAN ATTITUDE ON LIBYA

["In the Light of Day" column by Ahmet Kabakli: "Digesting Grandeur Is Difficult"]

[Excerpts] President Reagan is reported to have said: "I was informed of the shooting down of the two Libyan planes over the Gulf of Sidra by U.S. planes 6 hours after the incident. Had the planes shot down been American, I would have been awakened soon after the incident. But since it was the Libyan planes that were shot down, why should I wake up?"

These are rude, unintelligent and merciless utterances which do not befit a strong leader and a world state. If big states do not act and speak out prudently, world peace suffers setbacks. Apart from the fact that this is bad for their own state and nation, it makes finding a reliable and truthworthy power in the world difficult.

Reagan says: "I ordered that Libya be taught a lesson." Apart from not showing the slightest remorse, he says: "I do not know why they refrained from entering these areas before. I specifically ordered maneuvers to be held in the Gulf of Sidra and fire to be opened on any intervening force. We won't leave that gulf to Libya." In other words, he seeks to assert his valor against Libya--a small and developing country of only a few million people--on behalf of the United States, which is the greatest power in the world, with a population of 250 million.

This bragging proves that Reagan, like some other state leaders, have not yet attained moral maturity, because true leaders do not behave like wrestlers. Neither excessive valor nor cowardice befits them. The world expects them to exercise dignity and care. Although it is natural for them to have the interests of their state at heart, the world expects them to be impartial, fair and trustworthy. As al-Gadhdhafi put it: If Libya now continually attacks the 6th Fleet with all the planes at its disposal, and shoots down a few U.S. planes, even at the risk of starting World War III, we wonder what the consequences will be. Responsibility for World War III will belong to the United States, and no one will blame a small country for it.

I repeat, digesting grandeur is difficult. The leaders of the big powers must not attempt to lead the world before they have digested this grandeur. Those who attempt to do so should be warned against it. In the same way that the Soviet Union, bearing the stigmas of Afghanistan and Poland, cannot talk of peace and order, and is not entitled to dictate peace to the world, neither can the United States--which attacks Libyan planes and shoots them down without first exploring ways of coming to an understanding--claim world leadership. Like the pot calling the kettle black, how can the United States inspire either the Afghani fighters to fight for their religion and state or the oppressed Poles, who seek justice and welfare?

INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER CONCLUDES CONTACTS

[Text] Ankara, 28 Aug (AA)--Indonesian Foreign Minister Dr Mokhtar Kusumaatmaya flew to Istanbul Friday morning after completing his visit to Ankara with a call on Head of State Gen Kenan Evren.

Foreign Ministry (?sources) in Ankara said the talks held with the team accompanying Dr Kusumaatmaja would be followed up by a session in Ankara of a joint trade committee set up under a trade agreement dating from 1959.

The Indonesian team had received favorably a draft economic cooperation agreement submitted earlier by Turkey. The actual signing of the agreement would probably take place during the future visit of Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen to Indonesia at the invitation of his Indonesian colleague.

The two foreign ministers had also conferred on several international issues, including East-West relations, the north-south dialogue, the Iran-Iraq war and Cyprus, the same sources added. The visiting foreign minister will leave Turkey Saturday.

MINISTRY CONDEMNS SOUTH AFRICAN ACTION IN ANGOLA

[Text] Turkey has condemned the South African attack against Angola. Foreign Ministry spokesman Nazmi Akiman has made the following statement on the issue:

We view this attack as an incident which might have grave consequences and which might lead to developments endangering peace and stability in the South African region. We condemn this attitude by South Africa.

The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus has also condemned the attack by the South African Republic against Angola. The interior, foreign and defense minister of Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Kenan Atakol, in a statement in Lefkosa condemned the apartheid and colonialist policy pursued by the South African Government in the region. Atakol called on the apartheid white minority administration in South Africa to withdraw as soon as possible from Namibia and Angola.

INVESTIGATION OF SYNAGOGUE ATTACK CONTINUING

[Summary] Vienna (AZ)--The two terrorists arrested in Vienna last Saturday have already been transferred to the custody of the Vienna provincial court pending trial. Their "control officer," however, is probably far away by now. That emerged from the interrogation which continued on Monday. According to police, it has been established that 'Ali Yusuf, whose real name is now believed to be (Hasan Marwan), had a second hideout in Vienna, in the Meidling district. He told police he had lived for some time in Spain, Portugal and Switzerland before he came to Austria 2 and 1/2 months ago.

Police are now trying to put together a complete picture of his contacts in Vienna but are faced with great difficulties: At present more than 4,500 Arabs of various nationalities are living in Vienna, including several hundred Palestinians. It is difficult to establish the actual number of them, as many of them have come to Austria with other citizenships, being displaced persons.

The third detained Arab, 26-year-old Muhsin al-Ashur, who was arrested in terrorist (Husam Mohammad Rajih's) apartment at 10 Gablenzgasse in Vienna-Ottakring, is now being detained pending deportation because he has no valid visa. To date police have not been able to find any evidence he was involved in the attack.

[Summary] Over 2,500 people participated in yesterday's memorial ceremony for the victims of the attack on the Vienna synagogue, which passed without incident. KREISKY REAFFIRMS POSITION ON JEWISH EMIGRES

[Report on press conference by Chancellor Kreisky following 1 September cabinet meeting]

[Excerpt] It was an Israeli radio and television journalist who induced Chancellor Kreisky today to take another stance on the political dispute following the bloody attack of last Saturday. The journalist asked whether it was true that Austria had threatened to shut down the transit camps in Austria for Jews emigrating from the Soviet Union. Kreisky's clear reply:

[Begin Kreisky recording] That is an impudent lie. It is not the first time I have heard such things, but it is part of the atrocity propaganda obviously put out by the Israeli media. All I said was that I will not allow, and that the Austrian Government will not allow, Jewish emigrees from the Soviet Union to be forced to proceed from here to a particular country. From the moment they arrive in Vienna they have the right to choose where they want to go. Please take note of that.

[Question] Has there been any pressure in this respect?

[Answer] We know certain things are wanted in this respect by the Jewish Agency, and it has again and again been demanded of us that we channel emigration in a particular direction, but we are not ready to do so under any circumstances whatever. They will have to cope themselves with the problem that the number of emigres in the past 10 years has exceeded the number of immigrants. [end recording]

Kreisky defined his position that it was a consequence of Israel's attitude toward the Palestinians that such attacks occurred at all. But the impression that he only criticized Israel while sparing the other side any criticism is not correct, the government chief said.

[Begin Kreisky recording] I would like to say here expressly that on Saturday, only to give you an example, when inspecting the camp in Seville--no, on Friday actually--I called especially on the Histadrut youth, and had a very pleasant talk there--just as I have very good relations with many leading Israeli personages, and they know that themselves, too--only I am an opponent of the current intransigent policy. However, in that respect I am not alone; I have many colleagues in other governments. That is the reason. But of course I am not against Israel--quite the contrary. This Abu Nidal group--to which the two perpetrators clearly belong and as followers of which they have declared themselves--this Abu Nidal group actually holds it against me that I am, so to speak, indirectly acting for Israel. Thus I am under attack from both sides, which under normal circumstances need not be unwelcome but in this case is unpleasant. [end recording]

Austria's, or his, policy vis-a-vis the PLO, the chancellor said, has at any rate brought the following results for the country: First a high reputation in the Middle East, second international recognition also in Europe, and third the best relations with the Arab countries, better than those of any other country.

PAHR REGRETS 'POLEMICS' OVER SYNAGOGUE ATTACK

[Excerpts] Vienna (AZ)--Continuing the Israeli Government's sharp criticism of Austria's Middle East policy in connection with Saturday's attack, Israeli Foreign Minister Sh[illegible] reiterated the view that the attack on the Jewish community center in Vienna became p[illegible]ible because the Austrian Government adopted a too "conciliatory" attitude toward terrorists. On Monday Foreign Minister Pahr received the Israeli ambassador and rejected Jerusalem's criticism. The Arab ambassadors in Vienna sharply condemned the attack.

In a talk with Ambassador Ben-Ya'aqov, Pahr declared that he regretted the fact that an abominable crime which led to the tragic deaths of two persons had been made the cause of "unpleasant political polemics" by Israeli politicians. A protest by Jerusalem against statements by Chancellor Kreisky was rejected by the foreign minister as an attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of Austria.

Interior Minister Lanc separately will inform the security spokesman of the three parties represented in Parliament. Like other political figures, Lanc conveyed his deep-felt sympathy in a telegram to the Vienna Jewish religious community. The Arab ambassadors in Vienna condemned the attack as a "criminal act" and stressed that the synagogue was repsected by the Arabs as a place of worship. At the same time, however, the ambassadors warned against an intensified campaign against the Arabs. They declared that the attack obviously served the aims of those who are opposed to the objective policy regarding the Palestinian cause that is pursued by the Austrian Government under the leadership of Chancellor Kreisky.

On Monday, various opposition spokesman protested the statements by Chancellor Kreisky, who had drawn attention to the Begin government's partial responsibility for the radicalization in the Palestinian camp. Austrian People's Party Deputy Schwimmer even called for the closing of the PLO office in Vienna.

On Monday the Iraqi Embassy in Vienna very sharply condemned the attack. Moreover it announced the start of a thorough investigation to establish how one of the two perpetrators--who is now known at the embassy as an Iraqi citizen--obtained an Iraqi passport.

POLL REVEALS MAJORITY OPPOSES CRUISE MISSILES

[Text] The Hague, 15 Aug--A 55-percent majority of the population of the Netherlands thinks that the small-scale use of nuclear weapons in a war in Europe would lead to a world war. Forty-nine percent think an increase in the number of nuclear weapons in Europe makes the chance of a war greater (while 32 percent disagree with this view). Fifty-eight percent of the population is opposed to the deployment of nuclear-tipped cruise missiles in the Netherlands.

These figures appear in the results of an opinion poll the Amsterdam firm Veldkamp and the Institute for Sociological and Economic Research (ISEO) conducted in May, around the time of the most recent elections, with a sample of around 2,500 persons above the age of 15. The poll, whose results were presented to an international conference of market researchers in the capital at the end of last week, has the title "Opinions of Nuclear Arms."

One of the results of the poll was that 48 percent of those interviewed agreed with the slogan "Free the world of nuclear arms, beginning with the Netherlands." Thirty-two percent disagreed. Around one-third of those interviewed (36 percent) seemed to be totally opposed to nuclear arms, no matter where they were deployed. A 60-percent majority thought no nuclear arms should be allowed in the Netherlands.

On the possible deployment of cruise missiles in the Netherlands, 58 percent of those interviewed thought it was out of the question, with 14 percent in favor. Twenty-one percent would be able to accept the deployment of fewer than the proposed 48 cruise missiles, while 6 percent had no opinion.

Finally, those interviewed were asked what they thought the Second Chamber would finally decide about the missiles. The answers showed that 55 percent thought such a decision would be different from their personal views. The investigators concluded that a majority of those interviewed were against the deployment of cruise missiles in the Netherlands, but that a majority assumed that the Second Chamber would agree to the deployment of fewer missiles than the 48 proposed. Thirty percent would change their vote if the party they voted for in May adopted a position on the nuclear question different from the personal views of the interviewees; 61 percent would not change their vote. In other words, for almost two-thirds of those interviewed the nuclear arms platforms of the different political parties was not an important consideration when voting, the poll stated.

NATO MUST DISCUSS N-WEAPON BEFORE DEPLOYMENT

[Excerpt] The Hague--"It is clear that the Netherlands Government does not want the introduction of the neutron bomb," Foreign Minister Van der Klaauw stated Thursday morning in the Second Chamber in response to questions from chamber members De Vries and Ter Beek of the Labor Party and Walmans of the Radicals. However, Van der Klaauw did not think it reasonable to state that The Hague would accept the neutron bomb "under no circumstances." That would be "blocking everything," the minister said.

The Netherlands Government's point of departure is that at the present moment the United States bears sole responsibility for the production of this weapon. But it is The Hague's opinion, in accordance with the view of West German Chancellor Schmidt, that discussion and consultation are necessary within the Atlantic alliance before any future decision can be made about the possible deployment of neutron weapons in Western Europe.

FOREIGN MINISTER CALLS BERLIN AGREEMENT 'DECISIVE'

LD021016 Hamburg DPA in German 0908 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 2 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said in Bonn today that the Berlin agreement signed 10 years ago is "decisive for the stabilization of the situation in and around Berlin." He stressed that "in the interests of Berlin's flourishing development the possibilities created by the quadripartite agreement must continue to be exploited, and this includes strict observance and full application of the agreement." He said the agreement proves that the realistic policy of detente has withstood the test in Berlin, especially in difficult times.

PRESS COMMENTS ON RAMSTEIN BOMB EXPLOSION

DW011059 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 1 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Text] In connection with the Ramstein bomb blast, STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN points out: Many things indicate that successor organizations to the Baader-Meinhof gang were involved. These are terrorist groupings which are heavily involved in reorganizing and in planning new acts of violence. These are the groups that tried to become involved in the occupation of houses in Berlin so as to recruit new members there. Many things now indicate that a similar motivation of Red Army Faction successors was the background of the Ramstein blast. The bomb attack would be part of a terrorist plan to lead one segment of the disarmament movement through acts of violence so as to create new sympathizers.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen notes: Terrorism is not dead in our country. The repeated warnings of the Federal Criminal Office may have been considered by some people as a routine matter. However, the bomb in the Volkswagen in front of the Ramstein headquarters speaks its own bloody language. Some 20 people, Americans and Germans, were severely injured--victims of senseless violence. Bombs are no arguments. This is part of our country's basic convictions and goes beyond all party boundaries. It would be, therefore, absolutely wrong to somehow link the bomb in the VW in front of the American headquarters with the current political discussions on German-American relations. The bomb planters have no support in our country. They bombed themselves out of our society long ago. The bomb in the VW, however, is a warning as well as a reminder to maintain the highest vigilance.

WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster stresses: The Ramstein bomb explosion cannot be simply discarded as the first dangerous sign of a new anti-Americanism which uses violence after a campaign with arguments failed to castigate America as an alleged arsonist of the world, as a rearmer and as a peace preventer. There are enough blind fanatics, crazy peace supporters and ideological radicals--including those who let themselves be misused through a new dimension of violence. An offensive against America is for them the defense of peace. In doing this, they do not notice that Moscow is smiling in the background.

SCHWARZWAELDER BOTE of Oberndorf states: A bloody trail stretches from Vienna via Paris to Ramstein. The aims of a series of attacks against U.S. installations in the Federal Republic is not quite clear at present. But there is probably something to the experts' speculation.

In view of the increasingly louder campaign against American armament policy, the terrorists believe they can count on a certain understanding or even secret agreement with acts of violence against U.S. military installations. We can only hope that those who are currently criticizing the United States will clearly dissociate themselves from this. Being against the neutron weapon or NATO's dual decision is one thing; throwing bombs at American soldiers is something completely different.

SUEDWEST PRESSE of Ulm concludes: Those now claiming that the pacifists want to achieve their aims through bombing are acting out of ignorance or at least negligence. It seems that such claims simultaneously discriminate against the many forms of the peace movement. Instead, indications are that members of the terrorist world of revolutionary cells want to cling politically to the peace movement. It is part of the strategy of these cells to associate disputed issues with their own actions to achieve acknowledgement and to mobiliz sympathizers. An hysterical reaction to the Ramstein attempt would suit the bomb planters.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE

[Commentary signed J.B.: "Environment Conditions"]

[Text] The bloody bomb attack in Ramstein stirs memories--even though it is not clear who the culprits are--of an earlier phase of terrorism in the Federal Republic. At that time, there were spectacular, murderous actions against American military installations in Frankfurt and Heidelberg. Unfortunately, however, a differentiation was made later on between generations of terrorists, with the crimes of the so-called first generation being graded differently because they were aimed against the Vietnam war. The recent action suggests an attempt to create a linkage. The hysterical verbal argumentations of the leftists, reaching as far as the Bundestag, are an attempt to monopolize progress and humanity by means of accusations against U.S. policy. This encourages the terrorists by showing them--although unintentionally--a supposed way back to a kind of support. Such uncontrolled fanning of moods has its consequences. Whoever speaks of "an occupied country" or a "terrible president" must realize with what changes of surrounding conditions he is now involved. The surrounding conditions were always named as mitigating factors during the first trials of terrorists, and nobody contested it.

DIE WELT Commentary

[Friedhelm Kemna editorial: "Ramstein"]

[Text] The bomb in Ramstein holds a special position in the balance of terrorism. This statement is valid regardless of the identity and motives of the still unknown culprits or culprit. Whoever claims the sad glory of this action for himself can be certain to receive repercussions far beyond the place of the crime. That is because of the timing of the explosion. It was not just any kind of bomb and its size in any event makes it more than routine. There have been quite a few terrorist attacks against American institutions and military installations on German territory--and not just during the time of the anti-Vietnam demonstrations. But the effect of this explosion points to the embarrassing proximity of something which some people like to call the spirit of current times.

It would be naive or malicious to maintain that democratic criticism of U.S. foreign and security policy has intentionally fanned a climate where anti-Americanism can develop. It is a natural democratic right in this country to consider the policy of Ronald Reagan and his country to be wrong and to fight it politically, if one wishes. However, there is a great difference between using this right and using the "argument" of violence, even if the demonstration of terror claims for itself the emotional field of political confrontation.

It is obvious, however, that statements of democratic politicians have an effect on changing this field of emotions and thus the political climate. Whoever implies that the U.S. President deals with the German allies as if they were "Helots" or "ascarids" must know that he is fanning a mood—a mood that after all can be easily taken advantage of by those who want to bomb America out of Europe.

There is no bridge from the democratic forces of this country to the shores of violence. One ought to consider, however, that for the first time since the early 1970's violence against America seems to be escalating.

DIE WELT VIEWS SCHMIDT REMARKS ON PEACE MOVEMENT

[Manfred Schell commentary: "Obviously Very Pleasant"]

[Text] As a comment on the "peace forum" of his party, in which he did not participate, Federal Chancellor Schmidt gave some appreciable clarifications. He objected to "fear" slogans and he clearly stressed the Soviet influence brought to bear on the "Krefeld appeal".

In doing this, he tried to strengthen one of his cabinet members. Defense Minister Apel was abused by former Gen Gerd Bastian on the occasion of the "peace forum" because one of the booklets of his ministry impressively outlined Moscow's influence exerted on the Krefeld appeal participants. Apel cut a rather poor figure when he replied.

"This is obviously an instrument that is most pleasant for the Soviet leadership. It comes in very handy and is being treated in a friendly way by the Soviets." What Schmidt said about the "appeal" naturally is also valid for such prominent persons as Bastian. But it does not explain why these kinds of people are being upgraded by the SPD as discussion partners as if they had access to reasonable and honest arguments.

The deputy party chairman did nothing against it. That is more than a matter of style. The party is slipping from the control of the chancellor. If he does not want to be forced to announce his resignation under shameful circumstance, he must launch a much tougher counteroffensive--regardless of how appreciable his message Sunday night was.

OFFICIALS COMMENT ON CENTRAL AFRICA EVENTS

Defense Minister

[Interview granted by French Minister of Defense Charles Hernu on 1 September to special correspondent Henri Vincent on events in the Central African Republic--recorded]

[Text] [Hernu] First, what happened in the Central African Republic is purely a Central African affair; second, French troops are confined to their quarters; and third, French troops would only have to intervene if there were a risk to French citizens in the republic. It is purely a Central African affair.

[Question] I believe there is a French expeditionary corps (?in) Central Africa.

[Answer] Oh, an expeditionary corps--how rash you are. There are troops there under the leadership of Colonel (?Legaine). These troops are assistance troops carrying out major services for the population, for example, looking after children. These troops are in the Central African Republic with the full agreement of that government. But these troops are not an expeditionary corps; France no longer has any expeditionary corps to my knowledge.

[Question] Are the (?French people) in the Central African Republic currently in danger?

[Answer] According to my information, absolutely not.

Cooperation Minister

NC020808 Paris AFP in English 0757 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 2 Sep (AFP)--The coup in the Central African Republic was an "internal political problem" and France should not meddle in it, Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot said here today.

Mr Cot, in a radio interview, added however that "it does concern us, and a takeover by the military is always an admission of defeat--defeat for the Central African Republic and defeat for the process of democratisation which was underway."

The minister said that President David Dacko, who was forced to resign by his Chief of Staff General Andre Kolingba yesterday, had fallen ill and "withdrew in circumstances which are not yet clear to us. The constitution, which allowed for him to be replaced by the prime minister, was not applied. The constitution has been suspended. We always regret it when a democratic process has been interrupted."

MITTERRAND ADDRESSES UN DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

[Text] Paris, 1 Sep (AFP)--French President Francois Mitterrand opened a United Nations conference on the least developed countries here today with a call for aid aimed not merely at ensuring the survival but also the development of the world's poorest nations.

France, he pledged, would take specific steps to that end and would, by 1988, devote 0.7 percent of its gross national product to public aid, in line with UN recommendations.

Not limiting himself to the agenda of the conference, Mr Mitterrand evoked the North-South dialogue and proposed "concrete help" to the least favored nations in dealing with the "acute problems" they encountered in covering skyrocketing energy costs.

He stressed the need for "more stability and more continuity" in income for poorer countires, saying: "To be able to anticipate income is the sine qua non of development."

But efforts to promote a better life, he cautioned, "should be accompanied by an attempt to preserve the identity of peoples and to promote communication."

"Solidarity for development with the whole of the Third World is, to me, both the key to our common future and a necessity for us. Helping the Third World amounts to helping oneself emerge from the crisis," he said. To this end, he said, France intended to pledge "a non-negligible share of the total of public aid to the least developed countries."

"The war against poverty is bogged down in the trenches," he said. "On the one hand the rich are managing their crisis with the faint-heartedness of eternal convalescents, going from setback to slight improvement before coming down with a new ailment.

"On the other hand, the poor must, each day, tame their distress and wrench from the earth enough merely to start all over again tomorrow."

He expressed the hope that the conference would signal "the beginning of true hope."

At least five heads of state, including those from Nepal, Rwanda, Kenya and Cape Verde, were among the some 2,000 people from most countries of the world attending the meeting.

The conference is intended to decide and adopt a program of action for the LDC's for the next 10 years, with money the main issue.

The French president asked the distinguished assembly: "How can we build for all an international economic order both equitable and efficient, which makes development a top-ranking priority for all?"

Growth, he stressed, was a necessary condition to conquer unemployment and poverty, and it depended on "joint prosperity." New markets and exchanges were needed, "for who can survive today without exporting," Mr Mitterrand asked.

Referring to the October summit scheduled in Cancun, Mexico, Mr Mitterrand said he hoped those talks would promote a commitment toward global negotiations leading to concrete action. "A spirit of shared responsibility," he said, "should replace mistrust and indifference" in North-South relations.

Report on First Session

[By Ann Duncan]

[Text] Paris, 1 Sep (AFP)--The first-ever United Nations conference on the world's 31 poorest countries opened here today with appeals from French President Francois Mitterrand and UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim for greatly increased aid to those countries.

Saying that the "war on proverty is bogged down," Mr Mitterrand promised a five-point plan of action that included a pledge to allocate 0.7 percent of France's gross national product to aid by 1988. The promise, in keeping with UN recommendations, would about double France's current level of aid and Mr Mitterrand said a "significant share" would go the least development countries (LDC).

"For 10 years, the less developed countries have been marking time and watching their economic growth barely keep up with their population increases," Mr Mitterrand said in his first speech in a UN forum. "We must furnish them with the outside aid which will enable them not only to survive but to develop, in other words, reason to hope," he said.

Mr Waldheim warned that the "intolerable" situation in the world's poorest countries "ultimately poses a threat to world peace and stability."

He called assistance to the world's poorest "very disappointing so far," saying it had only at best checked the continued deterioration of the economies of the least developed countries.

Developing and under-developed countries immediately heralded Mr Mitterrand's speech as a pace-setter for the conference and a major step in the right direction.

"The speech couldn't have been better," Bangladesh Finance Minister Saifur Rahman, head of his country's delegation, told AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE.

"Inspiring," said a Sri Lankan delegation member. The speech showed that the French Socialists would stick to their campaign promises of becoming a spokesman for the Third World, he said.

UN sources and observers also said the speech was highly significant because it contained four pledges which are opposed by the administration of U.S. President Ronald Reagan.

These are French support for a common fund to provide stability to about a dozen basic world commodities, support for the proposed energy affiliate of the World Bank, a firm commitment to global negotiations in reshaping relations between the world's rich and poor countries and the specific target for aid.

American officials have recently indicated that the U.S. is not fully committed to global talks.

The U.S. position at the conference is seen as key if a concrete programme of action to help the about 280 million poorest of poor is to be developed and have sufficient funds to make it work.

The "Group of 77" developing countries want aid to LDC's to be increased from 6,000 million to 24,000 million by 1990 to implement a new programme of action that is to be negotiated at the conference.

Neither Western industrialized countries nor socialist-bloc nations have proposed any figure for increased aid, and conference sources expect that the U.S. is not prepared to greatly increase its multilateral aid to the LDC's.

Peter McPherson, head of the U.S. delegation at the conference, was recently photographed by an American paper holding a 28-million-dollar cheque, which was to have gone to aid programmes but was not spent and went back to the U.S. Treasury.

Following the opening speeches, French Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot was elected by acclamation as conference president. Mr Cot called for a minute's silence to mark the deaths of Iranian President Mohammad 'Ali Raja'i and Prime Minister Mohammad Javad Bahonar, who were killed Sunday in a bomb blast in Tehran.

Mr Cot, who was nominated by Peru, said that the 31 LDC's must leave the conference knowing that something would be done to help their desperate plight.

Mr Mitterrand today honoured four fellow heads of state attending the conference with a lunch at the presidential Elysee Palace.

The four were King Birendra of Nepal, President Juvenal Habyarimana of Rwanda, President Aristides Maria Pereira of Cape Verde and Kenyan President Arap Moi, also chairman of the Organization of African Unity.

Twenty-one of the 31 LDC's are in Africa.

TECHNOLOGY MINISTER VIEWS NUCLEAR POWER PROGRAM

PM270815 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Aug 81 p 20

[Text] The sixth international conference on the mechanism of structures applied to the technology of nuclear reactors opened at the Paris Palace of Congresses on Monday, 17 August, with a speech by Jean-Pierre Chevenement, minister of scientific research and technology. Some 1,100 people from some 30 countries are expected to participate.

The minister wanted to "dispel some false ideas which may still be rampant here and there" with respect to French policy. Recalling that choices have to be made which must be democratically discussed and denouncing the "authoritarianism of the previous government," he justified the recent decision to continue construction of power stations now being built and not to proceed with the construction of others--the latter decision not being irreversible--by asserting that "democracy is indeed worth a few months of delay."

According to Chevenement, the main problem is not the debate between the supporters and opponents of the nuclear program but the question of the nuclear program's role in the sphere of energy production, which will change as certain resources are exhausted and new sources of energy are developed. Quoting Pascal, he asserted that the government was not tempted by angelism ("whoever wants to become an angel becomes a beast") and explained that he "would assume the human condition, which involves risks which are limited as much as possible but are nevertheless accepted."

Referring to some more precise points, he stated that any decision on breeder reactors has to be postponed since none can be made prior to a study of the functioning of the super-Phenix, which will become operational in 1984. As far as the question of reprocessing is concerned, he stated that research will be continued, that the installation already existing at La Hague will be improved if the debate in the assembly shows that this is necessary, and that "France will abide by its international commitments, both those which it was assumed in the past and those which it may assume in the future."

FRANCE LAUNCHES SECOND NUCLEAR ATTACK SUBMARINE

[Text] Cherbourg, north France, 1 Sep (AFP)--France today launched its second nuclear attack submarine le Saphir (Sapphire), which will enter active service in 1984.

It is to be armed with (?four) torpedo tubes, for mine-laying or for launching weapons of 533.4-mm calibre against surface targets, and an underwater-launched missile with a range of 50 kilometres (32 miles).

The Saphir, weighing 2,670 tons and powered by a 48-megawatt nuclear engine, will be able to stay under water for 40 days.

France plans to have five strike submarines by 1988. The first, le Rubis (Ruby), should be operational next summer.

Defence Minister Charles Hernu was present at today's launching.

IRANIAN STUDENTS OCCUPY EMBASSY TO HOLY SEE

AU011528 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 1 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 1 Sep (ANSA)--Twenty-one Iranian students today occupied for three hours the Iranian Embassy to the Holy See. The students, who oppose the clergy-led Iranian Government and spiritual leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni said they belong to the Peykar (Muslim Protest) sect.

They entered the embassy building at 1000 local time and took it over after they immobilized the personnel. The students then staged a demonstration against the Ayatollah regime chanting "Iran Mojahedin", the name of the nation's largest opposition group.

The students peacefully ended the demonstration three hours later and were taken to police headquarters. Similar occupations have taken place in the last week at the Iranian embassies in Belgium, Holland and Sweden.

Foreign Ministry Note

[Text] Rome, 2 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Foreign Ministry "strongly deplored" the occupation of the Iranian diplomatic representation to the Holy See in Rome Tuesday and reported in a note released in the evening that the Iranian students responsible for the incident would be answerable to magistrates. The Foreign Ministry note explained that the students, who claimed to belong to the Peykar (Muslim Protest) group, gained access to the embassy offices by telling personnel they had consular matters to discuss.

After they began their three-hour occupation of the premises, the demonstrators shouted slogans expressing their backing for the Iranian leftwing movement Mojahedin. The Mojahedin are thought to be responsible for the Sunday night bomb blast which killed Iranian President Mohammad 'Ali Raja'i and Premier Mohammad Javad Bahonar and for the June 28 bombing in which Ayatollah Mohammad Beheshti, the number two man in the revolutionary regime, and some seventy other leaders were killed.

Similar demonstrations involving the occupation of Iranian diplomatic representations in Belgium, the Netherlands and Sweden were staged on August 24 and 25.

IRAN DISSIDENTS, EUROPE TERRORISTS HOLD CONTACTS

[Excerpts] Rome, 1 Sep (AFP)--Twenty one Iranian students occupied the Iranian Embassy here for nearly 90 minutes today before giving up to authorities, police said. All were later detained by police and jailed.

After Italian police surrounded the embassy building, the students left in single file with their hands up, were handcuffed and taken to a nearby police barracks.

The students were charged with occupying a public building, willful damage and other charges.

Meanwhile, the Tehran spokesman in Rome, Hassan Ghadiri, today said he had notified the Iranian Foreign Ministry that "high-level contacts" had been made between Fedayeen and Iranian Mojahedin and the Italian Red Brigades and the German Baader-Meinhof terrorist groups.

TRADE DELEGATION TALKS IN LIBYA ON OIL, COOPERATION

[Text] Rome, 1 Sep (ANSA)--Italo-Libyan cooperation and oil supplies were the key topics of talks between and Italian delegation chaired by Foreign Trade Under Secretary Baldassarre Armato and Libyan Economic Under Secretary (Shakschuki) during the delegation's recent visit to Tripoli. The delegation included representatives of various Italian firms and state-owned institutes--Fait, ENI, IRI and Montedison. The talks involved broadening and improving Italian cooperation in Libyan development projects.

The Italian delegation briefed its hosts on the possibilities offered by Italian industry in infrastructures, particularly in the construction of the Serir aqueduct whose cost is estimated at seven billion dollars.

During this month, Libyan heavy industry minister Al-Muntasir is slated to visit Rome for talks on speeding up payment of Italian supplies and better safeguards for Italian workers in Libya.

COLOMBO CALLS FOR 'MEDITERRANEAN LOME CONVENTION'

AU01 054 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 1 Sep 81

[Excerpts] Naples, 1 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has called for a "Mediterranean Lome Convention" to reduce tensions in the area. He made the proposal Monday during the first day of study here of the European People's Party, a seminar sponsored by the European Economic Community.

Colombo's call for a Mediterranean Lome convention was to be seen in the framework of efforts to promote cooperation and reduce tensions among countries bordering on the vast inland sea.

The Italian minister outlined various problems that beset the Mediterranean basin and nearby geographical areas. He also voiced keen concern for the situation in Iran which was a destabilizing factor that went beyond any local, regional influence, he said.

Colombo also recalled the ties of friendship between Libya and Italy, but voiced concern over the level of Libya's arms. Colombo said it was a duty to keep open a dialogue between the two nations, especially given the political value this relationship can and must have. Other nations would do well to follow suit, he added.

He said he understood the legitimate concerns of the U.S., but that tensions should be reduced and relations clarified. Colombo called for greater cooperation in the Mediterranean area and advocated a policy of nonalignment for other nations in the area where Libya operates.

PCI AIDE CRITICIZES N-BOMB, CRUISE DECISIONS

PM261512 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 10 Aug 81 pp 1-2

[Report on PCI Secretariat member Adalberto Minucci 9 August speech in Pesaro: "Immediate Action Against Rearmament"]

[Excerpt] Pesaro--"The U.S. President's decision to give the go-ahead for production of the neutron bomb casts an ominous shadow over the entire world situation. The latest rearmament measures threaten to envenom to the bounds of tolerability the already tense relations between the two opposing blocs, giving way to a spiral which, unless halted in time, could soon lead to the threshold of a war of extermination." This is how PCI Secretariat member Comrade Adalberto Minucci opened his speech at the L'UNITA provincial festival in Pesaro. Other speakers at the extremely well-attended and lively meeting included Joze Bucar, secretary of the LCY City Conference for Ljubljana, who headed an authoritative delegation of Slovenian comrades hosted by the Communists of the Marches.

We need more than ever, Minucci said, action for peace at all levels, which will unite the forces in Italy and Europe which believe in the possibility of negotiation and which therefore, on the one hand, will impart an impetus to the forces in the United States itself which oppose Reagan's options and, on the other, help the socialist countries to reach positive solutions to the existing contradictions in their international strategy.

Next, Minucci pointed out that the plan to build the neutron bomb was suspended some years ago by then President Carter following protests from world public opinion. It is not only a deadly weapon, the speaker said, but a monumemt to the inhumanity and cynicism of the modern advocates of the arms race; indeed, its producers envisage annihilating all traces of human life over a broad expanse of territory while leaving objects and material assets intact.

"The fact that Reagan is now returning to Carter's decision and definitely deciding on the production of the bomb constitutes an outright provocation and indicates the direction in which the new U.S. administration is moving. Forced by the majority of its European allies to accept the principle of negotiation on the Euromissiles, the U.S. administration is not only maneuvering to dangerously delay the start of negotiations but it also introducing new and very serious obstacles designed to sabotage them and nullify their outcome at the outset."

Within this framework, Minucci continued, the Italian Government's decision to choose the municipality of Comiso in Sicily as the site where the cruise missile base is to be constructed assumes, if possible, an even graver significance than before. By acting as "teacher's pet", the five-party government risks granting a dangerous political endorsement of the most extremist NATO circles which are openly aiming at the failure of the negotiations. Following Reagan's decision on the neutron bomb, the assertions of the defense minister and other government representatives, according to whom once the base has been constructed there will be time to reconsider and reexamine matters, sound even more hypocritical.

JUSTICE MINISTER RESIGNS OVER DIVORCE BILL

[Text] Madrid, 1 Sep (AFP)--The Spanish cabinet ha undergone a minor reshuffle following the resignation late yesterday of Justice Minister Francisco Fernandez Ordonez, it was announced in the STATE GAZETTE today.

Mr Fernandez Ordonez is replaced by 58-year-old jurist Pio Cabanillas, minister to the Premier's Office, while that post has been filled by Assistant Secretary of State to the Premier's Office Matias Rodriguez.

Named justice minister last September by then Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez, and retained by Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo who succeeded to the premiership, Mr Fernandez Ordonez was under growing criticism from his conservative colleagues in the ruling Union of the Democratic Center for his bill to allow divorce in Spain.

The first divorce courts open for business today.

Mr Fernandez Ordonez had also expressed reservations at the government's haste in taking Spain into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

His successor has held several government posts since taking office in Prime Minister Arias Navarro's first cabinet in January 1974 as minister for information and tourism.

Mr Matias Rodriguez, 33, had been assistant secretary of state since September 20 last year.

REQUEST FOR NATO ENTRY SUBMITTED TO CORTES

LD010654 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2200 GMT 31 Aug 81

[Text] The government's official request for the Cortes to authorize Spanish entry into NATO today was brought into the Congress of Deputies. The government's request will be considered by the officials of congress and by the board of spokesmen, possibly on 8 September. Parliament will examine the government request in the Foreign Affairs Committee, after which it will pass to a plenary session of the chamber around 24 September. It will then go through exactly the same procedure in the senate.

The request submitted by the government expresses the decision to apply for Spanish membership in the Washington treaty under Article 94 of the Constitution, which stipulates that agreement by the state to commit itself to treaties or conventions will require the prior authorization of the Cortes in the case of treaties or conventions of a military nature. Following this course, the government will require, both in congress and in the senate, only a simple majority to win the day on the subject of NATO.

CALVO-SOTELO DISCUSSES NATO, UCD, ELECTIONS

PM271529 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 25 Aug 81 pp 3-4

[COLPISA and EFE report: "There Is No Shadow Cabinet in UCD"]

[Excerpt] Athens, 24 Aug--Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo does not appear to regard Adolfo Suarez as an enemy within the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD]. Nor does he believe that the former prime minister is interested in promoting a "shadow cabinet" within the centrist party's Executive Committee. And in any event, Calvo-Sotelo would not be prepared to allow it.

That is what seems to follow from an informal conversation with the prime minister onboard the aircraft which took him to Athens to begin a 1-week cruise through the Aegean.

NATO issue

The prime minster is certain that the government's stance in favor of entry into NATO will secure a majority in parliament, but under certain conditions. After all, membership in the Atlantic alliance can take many forms. For instance, Spain could join while rejecting the deployment of nuclear weapons on our territory. And for that purpose, the neutron bomb is just another nuclear weapon. It doesn't matter if the FRG is considering the possibility of accepting the neutron bomb on its territory; it seems clear that Spain will not do so. He already has said that there will be no referendum on Spain's entry into the Atlantic alliance, and there will be none. He will fulfill his pledges in his investiture speech and will, therefore, bring the issue before parliament.

The international situation in the UCD does not appear to worry the prime minister too much. "There is,"--he is emphatic about this--"no shadow cabinet in the party's Executive Committee. Nobody has planned for its existence and even if somebody did plan this, I would not allow it."

"There Will Be No Early Election"

It is asserted that former Prime Minister Adolfo Suarez is privately criticizing the foreign policy conducted by the current government. But that is not Calvo-Sotelo's impression. And he has good reason to be well informed because Suarez himself apparently denied to him leveling such criticisms.

The prime minster does not appear to see grave internal confrontations in the UCD. Calvo-Sotelo does not regard even the moderate platform as a problem but as the expression of a current of opinion within the UCD.

No major changes in the centrist party appeared to be foreshadowed in the course of the informal conversation with Calvo-Sotelo. He does not appear to foresee an imminent entry into the UCD of personalities such as Jose Maria de Areilza, Alfonso Osorio or Antonio Garrigues Walker. Nor does he appear to discount this hypothesis outright; he merely believes that the 1983 general election is still a long way off. Bring forward the election? Not by any means. Calvo-Sotelo deems it his duty to complete the legislative term, and that will take place in 1983.

6-MONTH DEFENSE PURCHASES ABROAD REPORTED

PM271103 Copenhagen BERLINSKE TIDENDE in Danish 24 Aug 81 p 5

[Text] In the last 6 months the Defense Forces have signed contracts for new materiel worth 462 million kroner, a report from the Defense Ministry to the Folketing Finance Committee shows. A clause in all the contracts states that there must be compensatory purchases of Danish goods for part of the value of the contract.

The list of new acquisitions includes the purchase of British and U.S. aiming and navigational equipment for aircraft worth a total of 139 million kroner, the purchase of missiles and missile equipment from the United States worth 80 million kroner and the purchase of 10 Harpoon missiles for the navy worth 54 million kroner. These latter will be delivered in 1985.

In addition a contract has been signed with the French firm Thomsen/CSF for a new control and information system for the navy's operational command worth 130 million kroner. The system will be supplied in the period from September 1983 to March 1985.

In addition Denmark is participating in a NATO project to develop a mechanical antimissile device. The development work is expected to be finished in 1983.

NORWAY

SCHMIDT ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE, N-WEAPONS ISSUE

DW310903 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1710 GMT 29 Aug 81

[Statement by FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Norway; date not given--recorded]

[Text] There is no disparity of views in the security policy field between the Norwegian Government and the German Federal Government. Three subjects are involved: First, regarding the so-called NATO dual decision, there is no disparity of views. There is also no disparity of views regarding a Scandinavian nuclear-free zone as suggested by the Soviet Union. I welcome very much the fact that the government here does not intend to enter separate talks or negotiations with the Soviet Union. We belong to a common alliance and we are protected by this alliance only through maintaining mutual solidarity.

The whole idea brings up the problem of which territory the Soviet Union wants to make nuclear-free so as to comply with the commitments of the Scandinavian states. It also raises the question of how the Soviet Union can ensure--nuclear-free zone or not--that the Scandinavian countries will not be threatened by Soviet Eurostrategic arms deployed somewhere else. We have a similar basic attitude to these issues. It can well be that such issues will gain acute significance later on in the course of arms control negotiations between the East and West.

Third, we also agree that neutron weapons at present cannot be considered an acute problem for Europe.

PAPER REPORTS ON NAVY COMMITMENTS OVERSEAS

PM311440 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 31 Aug 81 p 5

[Desmond Wettern report: "Navy To Show Flag Overseas Despite Cutback in Ships"]

[Text] The government intends to increase the navy's commitments overseas next year, despite planned reductions of a third in the number of surface ships during the next four years.

Mr Nott, defence secretary, is anxious to increase the number of flag-showing visits, and has ordered that the practice of deploying a sizeable task group of eight or nine ships east of Suez should be resumed.

The sailing of a task group was cancelled this year, because it was impossible to find the ships needed without depleting the navy's contributions to NATO exercises.

The navy also has to keep four destroyers or frigates on patrol at all times in the Gulf of Oman watching over international tanker traffic.

The Oman patrol will be a year old in October and by then 16 destroyers and frigates, a third of the number in full commission, will have been involved.

There is no indication that the government means to wind up the patrol, which is now seen by the navy as an "open-ended" commitment.

In finding more ships for next year's east of Suez task group, the naval staff has fewer ships to draw on, as eight destroyers and frigates are to be scrapped during the next 16 months as part of the government's initial cuts in the navy.

In addition, it has each year to provide two destroyers or frigates for NATO's multinational standing naval force Atlantic, while one is based at all times at Gibraltar as guardship.

Two frigates will also have to be kept in the West Indies. Under the independence agreement with Belize, Britain will continue to be responsible for external security, which includes keeping a guardship off the coast.

Although it is the government's intention to cancel all major modernization programmes this will not materially increase the number of ships in full commission, which will be reduced through premature scrapping. This will bring the total of destroyers in commission down from 60 to 40 by 1985.

Allowing for refits, repairs, crew leave and time in transit it has been calculated that to keep one frigate east of Suez at any time requires four ships.

CUMHURIYET DISCUSSES TURKISH CYPRIOT PROPOSALS

[Izzet R. Yalin report]

[Text] Lefkosa [Nicosia]--In the introduction section of the constitutional draft, which is part of the comprehensive Turkish Cypriot package proposals submitted to the Greek Cypriot side, it is recalled that "Denktas and Makarios had agreed on four principles on 12 February 1977 and that Denktas and Kiprianou in a meeting on 19 May 1979 had reached agreement, approving these four principles."

In addition, the following principles concerning the Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals were the outcome of those two agreements; the foreign and finance ministries shall not be chosen from the same community. The observance of the following principles are considered as prerequisties: The constitution will have a federal and bicommunal character. The two communities will have a federal character. The two communities will have their own territory. The unity of Cyprus will be protected by these two zones, and the rights and basic freedoms of the Cyprus citizens will be respected.

In the constitutional proposals, it is pointed out that in the negotiations held so far, no complete identity of views had been reached on the question of federation and the unity of the federal republic. So, that is why it is essential to clearly define the term "federal republic" referred to in the first principle of the 12 February 1977 agreement. In this respect, the Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals say: "Unless such terms are defined differently, they should be accepted in their ordinary meaning. In its ordinary sense, 'federation' means the establishment of a federal state through the unity of two or more federated states. In joining such a federal state, the federated states retain their autonomous status.

Each federated state has its own territory, people and government. As a matter of fact, in accordance with second principle of the 12 February 1977 accord, it was agreed that both communities should administer their own territory. The term 'territory' used here possesses a meaning different from the word 'land' in legal terms. The word 'territory' means the land, the air and the sea under the administration of the federated state."

The Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals subsequently go on to say that the unity of the federated states in the form of a federal state should not be taken to mean a unitary state. The proposals continue: "It is impossible to reconcile the concept of federation, which is a form of decentralized administration, with the concept of a unitary state which is, in fact, a centralized administration."

Through these proposals, the Turkish Cypriot side stresses the contrast between these two concepts, and concludes that a "unitary federation" is out of the question.

The fourth principle of the 12 February 1977 accord states that the terms 'unity' and 'integration' used in the ninth section of the 19 May 1979 accord could not be interpreted to mean a 'unitary state.' In conclusion, it is said: "The Federal Republic to be established shall be based on two federated states run under a decentralized form of administration."

The Turkish Cypriot constitutional proposals assign the executive powers and functions of the Cyprus Federal Republic to a Federal Council. It is envisaged that the Federal Council should be composed of three Turkish Cypriot and three Greek Cypriot members to be elected from the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot communal groups of the Federal Senate for 4 years. Any vacancy in the Federal Council shall be filled through the same procedure, within 2 weeks from the day the vacancy occurs.

On the other hand, Foreign Minister Turkmen has stated that the Greek Cypriots will never be able to squeeze Turkey into a corner. He added: "Recent history has shown that Turkey can never be squeezed into a corner." Turkmen concluded by saying that Turkey is not worried about the Cyprus issue being referred to the United Nations.

PAPANDREOU OPENS PASOK ELECTION CAMPAIGN

[Speech by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou at 30 August meeting of cadres at the Sports Club stadium opening PASOK's election campaign]

[Text] Comrades: I wish to start by stating that our meeting today has an exceptior important significance for all of us who have worked for 7 years to create a battlewor. y organization. The presence here today of 3,000 of the movement's cadres is a milestone in PASOK's advance toward the government and the people's advance toward authority.

Today PASOK officially proclaims the start of the election battle, the last stretch leading to the crushing people's victory on 18 October and the commencement of another creative task by the people at the side of PASOK's government for the great change.

Seven years have passed. They have been years of struggle and creation. In 3 or 4 days it will be 7 years since the historic declaration of 3 September. During these 7 years--militant and creative years--a movement has been created. It started originally around the slogan for people's self-organization and today it is one of the most important political organizations ever known in our country.

You, the 3,000 cadres, the 100,000 members, the many hundreds of thousands of PASOK's friends, with one voice we all ask the nonprivileged Greeks--the workers, the farmers, the wage earners, the small- and medium-sized businessmen, the women and the new generation--to unite their forces in the great struggle for the nation's survival. Today we proclaim, here and now, the identification and unification of the "I can" and the "I am able" in the struggle for victory.

In our founding declaration--a document that will remain in our fatherland's history--we sowed the seeds of a great vision. Today these seeds have flowered and they have born fruit. In 1974, with 13.5 percent of the electorate, we were the visionaries. In 1977, with 25 percent of the electorate, we were the credible claimers of authority. Today, in 1981, as of 18 October, we will be the founders of a new democratic and socialist society.

Seven years of struggle and creation--the founding declaration, the Panhellenic conference, the resolutions of eight congresses of the parliamentary committee, parliamentary and non-parliamentary action, the strategy of national people's unity--all these guarantee the people's and PASOK's crushing victory in the coming election.

In this way today we are able to state that PASOK does have a history, that PASOK is making history and that PASOK promises more history.

Socialism

It is difficult for me and many colleagues to forget the first days after PASOK's founding. The word "socialism" was considered by many as a dangerous novelty, something that would lead PASOK into a corner, into isolation, making it a small party club for ideological debate. This vision of a socialist Greece, however, found response in the souls of the Greeks who for so many decades have fought for social liberation and for fundamental social, economic and political democracy.

PASOK was not a chimera. On the contrary, today it is the only alternative solution, a tangible solution, the only solution that promises a course which is nationally proud and socially just for the people. It is today's promise, the only political promise that has a tangible and visible chance of becoming fact. We are a movement that is genuinely born of the people, at a truly critical time in the history of our country and also in the history of Europe and perhaps of the world.

We are the movement that once again has restored the lost historic identity to the democratic and progressive forces of the country. For so many generations the peoples' progressive forces have battled, have touched on authority, but have never enjoyed the change. The reasons are well known to all: The unprecedented deviations of the right-wing and its patrons who under an artificially erected party state have managed to strangle the people's will for so many times.

At the same time, however, we must also stress that the leaders of the progressive people's forces committed critical historic mistakes and that they were not worthy of the times. It is for this reason that our responsibility to history, the people and the nation is vast. We here, the 3,000 cadres, shoulder the responsibility for leading the people toward victory. We have no right to fail.

Three Generations

We have declared and created the conditions for a broad, equal alliance of the non-privileged of our fatherland--the workers, the farmers, the wage earners, the small and medium businessmen, the new generation and the women. At the same time, we are also the movement within which three generations have unified and marched together for the first time--the generation of the national resistence movement, the national resistence movement which will be officially recognized by PASOK, the generation of the two implacable democratic struggles and, in conclusion, the generation of the resistence movement during the 7-year alien-instigated dictatorship.

At the same time PASOK expresses the hopes of a generation that wanted, could, but was not able, the faith of a generation that learned and matured, the dream of a new generation that struggles and demands and which this time will succeed, will be victorious.

The right and its political representation, New Democracy, in 1974 tried to wear a new cloak, the cloak of a conservative but basically liberal European party so that we might forget its incredibly sinful past, the violence and the falsifications, the royal coups, the betrayal of Cyprus, the concessions in the Aegean, the harsh 7-year alien-instigated dictatorship. So New Democracy became the party of liberal radicalism. And everything was fine until it felt, it saw, until the right recognized that this time, in these elections, for the first time power is at stake.

Naturally the frightened right has shed its cloak of radical liberalism and again donned its old clothes and proceeded to alarmism, which in the past, under the shadow of the civil war, was the danger of communism and currently is the danger of Marxism; the policy of intolerance, the division of Greeks into infected and uninfected; the policy that identifies the nation, the state, with the right, which was and still is the organ of dependence and of the interests of local and foreign oligarchy. The right's lifebuoy is again political apprehension, alarmism and polarization. However, the current leadership of the right, its political representatives, have been severed from their popular forces and they are alone in facing the struggles of the popular masses.

The Right Is the Minority

Our task in this electoral struggle is to isolate the right, the intolerant right, from the Greek people and to show its true dimensions of a small minority among the Greek people. It is our duty within the framework of national popular unity to free the right's popular base from the bonds which decades of rule by the right forged for it.

As we said in Sparta, rightist, centrist or leftist wages do not exist for PASOK. PASOK is in solidarity with all the working people. We are united with them by their social origin, even though until now we had been separated from them by their party preferences. We open wide our hearts, thoughts and doors to all Greeks who work, whose permanent interests are represented by only one movement like PASOK, which leads to socialism and democracy.

For this reason, we shout "no" to the message of intolerance, no to the seeds of division and "yes" to the message of unity and conciliation of our people, because our policy, the policy of PASOK, is not the policy of "strength" but the policy of solidarity and brotherhood.

Today from this stadium we address a warning to the New Democracy leadership to put an end to blind fanaticism and to the slide toward extreme rightist positions which are dangerous for the country. However, at the same time we inform them that the conscripted children of the people, our country's armed forces, are in brotherly union with the people in the common cause for defense of national independence and democratic institutions.

We also inform the right that PASOK will not fall into the trap of the skilfully escalating provocations, polarization and alarmism. At the same, we also denounce them for the irresponsible policy of preelectoral economic pyrotechnics which do not buy the consciences of the working Greeks but which undermine the country's economic course through a "scorched earth" policy.

Independent in Power

Since our establishment in 1974, the choice has been clear and fixed--contest the elections independently. The big issue of power arises in these elections. As we have said, 18 October will be the meeting point of the people and the nation with history. Our people have already realized that "the people in power" means PASOK in the government with an independent majority. Only thus, without falsifications, without concessions, without inopportune leaps will we be in a position to implement the program that will lead to our society's social transformation.

PASOK rejects every narrow or broad preliminary agreement for cooperation among parties and fronts because summit agreements change goals and, at the same time, contain seeds for division at the top.

Through the strategy of national popular unity, through its government program, PASOK is advancing toward socialism with guaranteed democratic institutions for the implementation of the historic change.

National popular unity is not an opportunistic strategy. It is the only strategy for power. This is so because it aims at rallying popular social forces against the right, the economic oligarchy and the system of dependence.

National popular unity constitutes a new historic, social alliance for power. Through national popular unity, PASOK addresses itself to the overwhelming majority of Greeks. It invites them to outgrow their party dependencies and the deliberately cultivated psychoses and to rally round the popular, patriotic movement for national independence, popular sovereignty, democracy and socialism.

We do not underestimate or oppose the other political forces which belong to the democratic opposition. We do not ignore either their role or their specific weight in the struggle for the removal of the right and the laying of the foundations for change. However, at this hour these forces must realize that the historic lot and responsibility for the implementation of the historic change has fallen on PASOK.

In the coming weeks, the duty of all PASOK cadre will be to convince the people in every part of our land that PASOK's goals are feasible and that its strategy will be victorious. We should realize that no PASOK goal will be implemented or converted into action unless it becomes a part of the people's conscience, unless the people themselves participate in the conquest of the movement's goals.

The PASOK program is not the product of technocrats, is not a readymade formula for the solution of all problems. On the contrary, it is only the framework for action for the PASOK government, for the popular masses in the struggle, the course toward the great change.

For us, citizens are not objects. They are the subjects of history. They are the subjects of the PASOK program. Citizens act, criticize, control and defend their goals and conquests. And this is a point that needs attention.

We have our strategic goals which have been expressed in the declaration of establishment of 3 September. We have immediate and intermediate goals. The PASOK government policy, the policy of PASOK in government, is the set of immediate and intermediate specific goals which constitute the prerequisite for the further development toward the vision of a socialist Greece.

The PASOK declaration that has just recently been published constitutes PASOK's starting point toward government and of the people toward power. The declaration gives the answer to what we will implement, how we will implement it and when we will implement it. This sequence of measures will give flesh and bones to the course for national independence, popular sovereignty and social transformation.

The intermediate goals are not independent and they are not an end in themselves. They constitute a transitory situation within the framework of a strategy which, because of its internal logical sequence, will lead to the great change.

For us, for PASOK, this all-or-nothing attitude leads to the negation of the only feasible course for the implementation, the substantiation of our goals. We are not miracle workers. We are not magicians. And this is something we should always tell the people.

What we promise are steps, and sometimes leaps, which will be firm and consecutive, which will not permit a return to the past and which will unify the broad people's masses, whose participation is a prerequisite for the implementation of PASOK's program.

Now a few words about the notorious calm climate during this election confrontation. For PASOK, the active support of the constitution--under any and whatever reservations we may have expressed because it still remains the constitution today and we move within its framework and we consequently respect it--and the active support of democracy and freedom in no way abrogate our promises and progress toward socialism. On the contrary, the democratic framework strengthens and guarantees progress toward socialism without backtracking or adventurism.

PASOK provides a new, richer content to the relationship between democracy and change. Without a doubt, the parliamentary regime, with the presence of parties which support opposite positions, the parliament and party pluralism are one of the basic foundations of democracy and people's authority.

At the same time, however, there is also the direct participation of the citizen within the framework of local self-government at the first, second and third levels, without the activization of which there can be no fundamental and basic function of democracy.

In addition, there is also the operation of trade unions by the employees, the workers, the farmers and the wage earners. The independent trade unions should not have guardians. They should be free and politicized, but nonpartisan. And they should enjoy the government's guaranteed respect of the inalienable rights of the workers whose interests it will at long last serve. With our policy, PASOK's policy, we will continue to contribute toward strengthening, guaranteeing and expanding the democratic institutions for the completion of democracy and people's authority.

Within this framework, democratic dialogue during this preelection period means a calm climate. A calm climate, however, does not mean tolerance. It does not mean giving up positions. It means confrontation and ideological juxtaposition based upon party programs and not personalities and based on ideas and not on the personal history of our opponents.

We Will Make History

I believe that during this election, we, the cadres of PASOK, must make history. We must establish a level of struggle that, although hard, must be democratic and decorous. We must at long last establish these processes so that we may put an end to petty politics and petty political party affiliations.

This is why, once again and at this meeting, we denounce the rightwing's irresponsible, undermining and antidemocratic campaign of lies and danger-mongering propaganda against us.

We must realize that the direct goal of the people is to oust the rightwing. This is the vision of decades, because since the civil war to date--I do not want to go further back to 1932--the rightwing has virtually governed by identifying the state with the party, by identifying foreign interests with our interests. There have been one or two short periods of democratic centrist administration, but they barely touched upon authority.

These were soon overthrown so that the rightwing might again prove that pluralism, parliamentary democracy and the citizen's freedom are permissible only to the degree and so long as the rightwing maintains authority. The time has now come, the time for which our people have waited for decades, to at long last lead the rightwing to its Waterloo and to the "pensioning off" of its personalities.

Today we have a dominant bipolar confrontation. It is a confrontation between the forces of change and the forces of conservatism. This political polarization reflects the social polarization. It reflects the fact that the people's masses have been freed from the traps of the rightwing and, united, they are now marching toward the realization of their great vision.

Only Against the Rightwing

It is for this reason that the primary and true toal of PASOK's criticism and confrontation will be none other than "New Democracy" and the rightwing as it is now and was in the past, for the last 7 years.

We are not going to start a multifront struggle, a struggle against the other parties of the democratic opposition, because both a bifront as well as a multifront struggle would save the rightwing's life.

Naturally, we have the duty to defend our ideological identity when it is questioned by a party in the democratic opposition. This, however, always remains at the level of ideological and political confrontation and does not constitute a clash.

There are basically two fundamental characteristics in our preelection struggle: One--the presentation of PASOK's program, informing the Greek citizens from one end of the country to the other, in the villages and the cities, the offices and the field; and Two--the exercise of criticism--implacable criticism--of the achievements and the times of the rightwing, but not on its program because one never existed. There is always its history, which the people will condemn at the polls on 18 October.

PASOK's organization and the role of organization today and tomorrow is for us, for me personally, a prerequisite for the development of PASOK and a guarantee for the victorious outcome of the people's struggle.

At today's historic phase, the role of organization both before and after the election will be definitive. Before the election, it will be the lever for informing, briefing, mobilizing and confronting. After the election, and through the involvement of organization in all social areas, it will become the pole for the unification and cohesion of the mass movements in the joint progression toward change.

The election battle requires diligent conscription. All of us must understand that this battle we are waging is not a narrow party affair; it is an historic milestone for the people's movement of our country, and it is for this reason that our goal is a self-supporting government. This is not simply our own choice, it is a people's choice.

For this reason, and within the framework of our large and battleworthy organization, we always condemn the spirit of sectarianism and of party self-sufficiency, because our own party organization is not separated from the social forces which it represents, it is not an end in itself. It is the means the people have chosen toward the great change. The organization is not the bulwark of the initiated ones, but a bastion of a vital political struggle.

To the Deputies

And now for our parliamentary representatives who are 94 today and will become 184....

During the past 4 years, our parliamentary group has waged hard, successful and victorious battles in the Chamber of Deputies. The term "victorious" has nothing to do with draft laws we have had approved. It does, however, have to do with the clashes and confrontations which considerably helped form the people's movement and which to a great extent briefed our people in their struggle for the implementation of change.

I would, however, like to stress two things: For a party like PASOK, a socialist party--either in the form of opposition or a progovernment party--the parliamentary group is not a coalition of independent personalities supported by an electoral base, in the same way that the election result is not a sum total of the election successes of our individual deputies.

As fighters, our candidates, our deputies, do have their own titles of honor--militant titles of honor--and most certainly they do enjoy the confidence of a large section of the people in the nomes in which they are elected.

For a socialist movement, however, it must be clear that representation in the parliament is in itself also a tool of the movement which battles on specific bastions.

At this point, I would also like to speak of something else. In the past, one of the ways in which the establishment, both foreign and domestic, undermined the course of the people was through the disruption of parliamentary groups. Such a disruption is not feasible within the framework of the panhellenic socialist movement. This means that whenever there is a manifestaion--either today or in the future--of any effort to create splinter groups, this will be hit hard by our people.

This is the basic characteristic of a parliamentary group within the framework of a socialist, a people's movement.

The time has arrived; the time has arrived for the great historic confrontation. The battle will be waged here and now. The rightwing will suffer its crushing defeat here and now. It is here and now that the people's forces will win, so that the people may take up authority in their own hands so that Greece may belong to the Greeks.

ARAB COUNTRIES' ENVOYS CONDEMN U.S. POLICIES

[Text] Ankara, 28 Aug (AA)--Ambassadors and envoys of Arab countries stationed in Ankara, except Egypt, have condemned the U.S. attack on Libyan aircraft in the Bay of Sidra. The Arab diplomats, joined by the ambassador of Pakistan, met in Ankara to declare that the attack, which confirms the aggressive and imperialist mentality that dominated the White House and intended to "intimidate and degrade" the Arab nation.

It was clear, the Arab diplomats said, that the attack was conducted to prepare the ground for a "scheme" that would "enforce the American solution to regional problems," and constituted a new link in the chain of provocative acts by the U.S. against the Arab nation and its just cause. They noted the U.S. had demonstrated it was the instigator of international terror by preventing a UN member from protecting its own territorial waters of 3 miles, while the U.S. itself shipped its fleet and claimed rights over thousands of miles of international waters, and then turned around to charge with terrorism the Arab Socialist People's Libyan Jamahiriyah, which represented the vanguard of the Arab campaign against [word indistinct] and imperialism.

The chief of Arab embassies and legations in Turkey protested the U.S. insistence on protecting the Zionist existence in the Middle East as a proxy for itself, and on trying to turn the regime in Egypt into a second U.S. proxy in Africa and the Arab world in order to protect American interests. They reiterated their intention to maintain to the end effective resistance to this policy of aggression, threat and terror.

GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS ROUND UP TCP CELLS, MEMBERS

206 in Ankara Area

TA281516 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 28 Aug 81

[Statement issued by the Press and Public Relations Department of the Army IV Corps and Ankara, Cankiri and Kastamonu martial law command]

[Text] The cells and members in the command area of the secret and illegal Turkish Communist Party [TCP], which aims to establish a Marxist-Leninist order by forcefully changing the basic system of the Turkish Republic, have been uncovered. The Kirikkale cell of this organization, which has been reorganizing itself since the mass arrests in 1951, was first spotted and discovered on 24 March 1981 and 206 members of the organization, who were positively identified following the evaluation of the information obtained from suspects' statements and other evidence, were captured by security forces.

Of these 206 members, whose investigation is being conducted by the martial law military prosecutor's office, 172 were arrested by the military court where they appeared for a hearing. Of the captured suspects, 90 are civil servants--including 28 teachers and 19 engineers--38 are workers, 24 are unemployed, 22 are unionists, 17 are students and 15 others are of various professions.

From the statements made by the organization members and other evidence obtained, it was learned that certain foreign centers protected and organized their activities, that they formed central party archives in a foreign country, organized training sessions in foreign centers through a union affiliated with the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and conducted intelligence work in certain important state establishments in a bid to send it abroad. It was thus possible to expand the operations throughout Turkey.

The media campaign launched against our command through their radio and press organs, that are directed by certain foreign centers, during the initial period when the work of the security forces was conducted in secrecy has confirmed the accuracy of the captures and the blow to their detestable activities aimed at dividing and destroying our state.

The true face of this organization, which has also prepared the grounds for the emergence of the armed action organizations that have been disrupting the tranquillity of the great Turkish nation--although it does not deserve unrest--through their subversive and secessionist activities, will be displayed before the judiciary.

As a result of statements by the suspects and the evaluation of the documents, it has been determined that the TCP is organized as follows: The TCP Central Committee; the Politburo; the person in charge of Turkey; regional committees; provincial committees; district committees; subdistrict committees and cells. It has also been determined that Turkey has been divided into regional committees. The members of these units have been (?determined).

SPOKESMAN DENIES ALL-PARTY GOVERNMENT FORMATION

[Text] Asked about the formation of an all-party government, the government spokesman stated that if the president of the republic deems ipso facto that such a government would serve national interests he would not hesitate to do so. The spokesman added: However, the president of the republic cannot underestimate the substantive difficulties that might ensue and which, in the final analysis, could possibly make such a government a government of division and not one of unity.

For this reason, the spokesman said, the late Ethnarch Makarios introduced the institution of the National Council instead of an all-party government--an institution that still exists and is functioning in a particularly useful way at the present time.

Asked whether the president intends to make the National Council institution stronger, the spokesman said he is not aware of any change in the composition or the functioning of the council.

INTERCOMMUNAL SESSION HELD IN NICOSIA 2 SEP

NC0217/58 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] During a meeting today at the Ledra Palace Hotel within the framework of the intercommunal talks, the discussion in rotation of all four questions on the agenda was continued. These questions are the resettlement of Varosha, the initial practical measures and the constitutional and the territorial aspects.

On arrival at the Ledra Palace Hotel, Mr Cobbi, the special envoy of the UN secretary general in Cyprus, said he did not wish to make any comments. He simply said the discussion in rotation of the four questions on the agenda at every meeting was agreed on by the two sides.

Mr Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative at the talks, stated that during today's meeting the discussion in rotation of the four questions on the agenda was to be continued. He added that the Turkish Cypriot side probably would comment on the Greek Cypriot side's reasoned views on its proposals. He said: We are studying our positions and we will probably put forward our views next week at the negotiation table. I hope, he added, that we will be in a position to express our views in a way that will help the dialogue, in accordance with our wish to hold substantive and constructive talks.

Mr Onan, the Turkish Cypriot side's representative at the talks, stated that he was waiting for the Greek Cypriot side's counterproposals. We have submitted, he added, our own concrete proposals, and it is time for the other side to put forward its views on both the territorial and constitutional aspects. He said: Then there will be a constructive rapprochement of our effort for a solution.

Referring to the Greek Cypriot side's reasoned views on the Turkish proposals, Mr Onan said they repeat the old views and he said he did not want to comment. He added: I have nothing to discuss today. I shall simply await the other side's counterproposals, so that the dialogue may be continued.

Bayrak Report

TA0217/25 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks, Umit Onan, has said that the Turkish Cypriot side has already submitted its proposals and it is now the turn of the Greek Cypriots to submit proposals.

The intercommunal talks, which aim at reaching a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem, were held this afternoon. Replying to reporters' questions before the meeting, Onan said the Turkish Cypriot proposals were out in the open and that the Greek Cypriot side was now expected to submit its own proposals. Replying to a question on the recently submitted Greek Cypriot views and the reasons for the views, Onan stressed that they were nothing but a repetition of old views. He added that it was possible for the Greek Cypriots not to like the Turkish Cypriot proposals but that they had to submit counterproposals if the talks were to continue.

In a statement before the meeting, Greek Cypriot negotiator Ioannidhis said the Greek Cypriot side was waiting for the reaction of the Turkish Cypriot side to the Greek Cypriot views. Replying to another question, he said a second document explaining the Greek Cypriot stand could be submitted to the Turkish Cypriots next week. He charged that this document would express the Greek Cypriot stand in a way that could facilitate the continuation of the dialogue. Asked whether this second document would include proposals, Ioannidhis refused to comment.

The UN secretary general's special envoy to Cyprus, Hugo Cobbi, refrained from making any statements before the meeting.

At today's meeting, the sides are discussing items on the agenda, namely the issue of Maras [Varosha], basic practical measures to improve relations, mutual trust and return to normalization between the two communities and the constitutional and territorial issues, in that order.

IRANIAN SPOKESMAN WARNS OF MOJAHEDIN ACTIONS

AU0209J9 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 2 Sep (ANSA)--Ties between leftwing terrorists in Italy, the Red Brigades, West Germany's Rote Armee Fraktion, and the Mojahedin in Iran exist and can be demonstrated, according to the spokesman for the Iranian Embassy in Rome, Hassan Ghadiri.

The spokesman levelled his allegation to persons who came to the embassy on Tuesday to add their signatures to those who deplored the Sunday night bombing in Tehran in which Iranian President Mohammad 'Ali Raja'i and Premier Mohammad Javad Bahonar were burned to death. The Mojahedin, thought responsible for the June 28 bombing which killed Ayatollah Mohammad Beheshti and some seventy other leaders of the revolutionary regime, are also considered behind the Sunday blast. Hassan Ghadiri also warned that the Mojahedin could conduct terrorist acts in Italy.

The embassy spokesman went on to comment on the three-hour occupation of the Iranian mission to the Holy See in Rome on Tuesday by some twenty Iranian students claiming to belong to the Peykar (Muslim Protest) group. Ghadiri said that the demonstration, staged to protest the Tehran regime, was an act in support of terrorism and affirmed that the students failed in their objective of laying hands on and "destroying the diplomatic archives." The spokesman said that the occupation of the embassy offices did not last long because the protesters "were frightened of the arrival of Iranian students loyal to the Islamic revolution."

'POLITICAL DEBATE' STILL 'RAGING' WITHIN PCI

AU3108A5 Rome ANSA in English 0823 GMT 31 Aug 81

[Text] Rome, 31 Aug (ANSA)--The political debate raging within the Italian Communist Party has been further fueled with an interview in the Rome daily LA REPUBBLICA with former speaker of the lower house, and one of the key figures in the PCI, Pietro Ingrao.

In a long interview Sunday, Ingrao dealt polemically with the problem of the PCI's identity, its role within the left and, more generally, political methods which now prevail in Italy. The interview came only a few days another PCI leader, Giorgio Napolitano, criticized party Secretary Enrico Berlinguer. Ingrao only partially picked up Napolitano's assertions and broadened the issue to crucial theoretical problems.

Ingrao started off from the so-called "communist tradition" deeply felt by his party's rank and file, warning communists against "schematizations." He went on to say that "within that tradition there is the guide--party and monolithism... A mechanistic and providential view of the working class has a compact and (linear) protagonist of general emancipation (which) has been challenged and criticized by events. And with it, the idea of the party as exclusive interpreter and guarantor of this mission has been dealt a blow."

Ingrao continued saying that "in place of that mythology there is, however, all that force accumulated by the concrete working class, with its enormous difficulties but also with its powerful and consolidated organizations, with its mass culture and its effective or potential alliance..." Turning specially to the issue of the PCI's relations with the other political parties, and particularly with the Socialists, Ingrao s[illegible] e fears a political confrontation "which is cut off from the reality of society a[illegible] [illegible]urdly reduced to a competition between 'bodies' whose job is politics, in a separa[illegible] political elite."

PREMIER'S OFFICE, COLOMBO REACT TO LIBYAN THREAT

[Excerpt] Rome, 2 Sep (ANSA)--Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's threat to bomb the nuclear arsenals in Sicily, Crete and Turkey and thereby trigger an international atomic catastrophe should the United States once again attack the Gulf of Sidra has caused "deep surprise" in the Italian Government.

The premier's office issued a statement today which underscored the "gravity of these statements, should they be confirmed, and the absolute unacceptability of such threats" aimed at Italy.

Speaking last night at a celebration for the twelfth anniversary of the Libyan revolution, Al-Qadhdhafi had said. "If the United States again attacks the Gulf of Sidra, we will counterattack and hit nuclear arsenals" in Sicily, Crete and Turkey. On August 19, two Libyan Soviet-made jetfighters were downed by American Tomcats over the Gulf of Sidra where the Sixth Fleet was carrying out naval manoeuvers.

The Italian Government statement went on to say that "these threats are in flagrant contrast with the Italian Government's commitment to maintaining cooperation and good neighbor relations with Libya, a nation with which there are strong economic, as well as historical, ties.

"On a more general level, Italy is in favor of safeguarding rules of peace and coexistence in the Mediterranean and will react firmly to any unilateral initiative or gesture aimed at upsetting or breaking the balance in this region."

The Italian Foreign Ministry has summoned the Libyan representative to Rome to give him the government statement and to point out that military bases in Italy fall within the framework of Italy's membership in a purely defensive alliance and have never presented a threat to Libya or any other country in the Mediterranean or elsewhere.

Colombo Statement

LD021746 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1200 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Text] We have the first official Italian reaction to the threats uttered yesterday by the Libyan leader al-Qadhdhafi to attack NATO nuclear bases in Sicily, Greece and Turkey in the event of new incidents with the United States such as those that occurred in the Gulf of Sidra. Foreign Minister Colombo, who is at the friendship festival in Trento, made the following statement to our correspondent Salvatore d'Agata:

[Begin Colombo recording] We have noted with surprise the threats uttered by Libyan President al-Qadhdhafi. We have arranged for the summoning of the Libyan representative to Italy to make it clear that if these threats have indeed been expressed, then they are to be regarded as unacceptable by Italy. We regard these threats as being in flagrant contradiction of Italy's moderate position which she has always adopted in this area. Italy's action has been not to increase tension and not to fan disputes. We believe we (?must tell) President al-Qadhdhafi that the military installations located in Sicily are installations of a defensive alliance. They are not directed against anybody and are not directed at attacking anybody. Their aim is to guarantee the country's security [passage indistinct]. [end recording]

COLOMBO MEETS SAUDI DEVELOPMENT AID OFFICIAL

[Text] Rome, 2 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo met Tuesday with 'Abd al-Muhsin al-Sudairy of Saudi Arabia, chairman of the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), for consultations on the Italian contribution to the fight against hunger and malnutrition in the world.

[Answer] If France rebuilds Tammuz after receiving sufficient assurances on the use of the installations for peaceful purposes, who can doubt this? But the reality will still remain that sooner or later many countries in the world will master nuclear technology which has become commonplace. All they need to do is to train or recruit 200 nuclear scientists.

[Question] Strictly from the viewpoint of what they consider to be their political interest, didn't the Israelis attack the wrong target when they bombed the Iraqi reactor?

[Answer] It is not my role to distribute praise or to blame but simply to state the real state of affairs yet again: The Near East is in a state of war, the countries there are at war either endemically or overtly. You cannot understand anything of what is happening in the Near East if you view events in terms of peace. They must be seen and assessed in terms of war. Thus, the raid on Tamur is an act of war and anything done in reply or in revenge would also be an act of war. It is more important to understand the real reasons for this state of war and these are to be found for the most part outside the Near East.

LE MONDE COMMENTS ON FRENCH-MEXICAN STATEMENT

[Editorial: "Demand for Justice"]

[Text] To demonstrate in a startling way the strength of his convictions toward the Third World and the new directions of foreign policy in his 7-year term, President Mitterrand has chosen an initiative which breaks with the practices of conventional diplomacy. Indeed, in its relations with governments at grips with rebel movements, Paris is not accustomed to the terms used by the 28 August joint French-Mexican statement on El Salvador.

Nonetheless, in this affair, the president has repudiated none of the opinions he was known to hold and which he frequently expressed before taking office. He had given clear support to the o yanizations which are struggling, sometimes with arms, against the repressive regimes of Central America. During his recent tour of Mexico, Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Honduras, Claude Cheysson echoed the Elysee's concerns. "The fact that a country's armed forces are powerful doesn't mean that the solutions they propose are just," the external relations minister stated, adding that, in his view, the tensions in Central America stem "all too often from injustice, unacceptable social development, the system of agricultural ownership and the concentration of wealth." The French-Mexican document takes up this argument by invoking "the need for fundamental changes in the social, economic and political spheres" in El Salvador. The situation was deemed serious enough to disregard the taboo against expressing, at least in an official way, an opinion on the reforms which should be introduced in a sovereign country.

The French-Mexican approach, although not in keeping with international rules, nonetheless has commonsense on its side. Nothing can stop the civil war in El Salvador unless there are negotiations with the main protagonists--the leftwing rebel organizations--and unless the structure of agrarian ownership is changed.

The underlying analysis behind the French-Mexican statement is, in fact, diametrically opposed to the one emphatically proposed by the Reagan administration since it came to power. Ostentatiously rejecting the "Carter doctrine" which highlighted support for the democratic movements in Latin America, Washington is stressing security questions almost exclusively. At the very moment when Paris and Mexico were revealing their positions, U.S. Secretary of State Haig was asserting that the Salvadoran guerrillas had chosen a strategy of "pure terrorism" whose only victims were innocent civilians and that they were receiving "increased aid" from Cuba. In Washington's eyes, the civil war in El Salvador should in fact, primarily be interpreted as a demonstration of "interventionism" by the USSR and its "stooges" in the region, namely, Nicaragua and Cuba. The American reaction to the French-Mexican initiative, however, has initially been relatively moderate so as not to pointlessly damage the delicate relations with two important allies.

This demonstration of Saudi Arabia's power indirectly benefited the West. There is no certainty that Saudi Arabia will be able to pursue this policy to the end. And even if it is able to it will obviously utilize its control over its partners' production level and unity of price to increase the latter with a view to gradually making good, first, the effects of inflation and, second, the financial resources which oil can secure for it. Saudi Arabia has made huge investments. It is now confronted with considerable operational costs and it will have to pay them. This means that the situation which has prevailed in recent years--when there was a surplus of oil money waiting to be invested--likely could not last much longer.

[Question] We tried at one time to establish closer ties with Iran and more recently with Iraq based chiefly on the transfer of nuclear technology, which could be a problem....

[Answer] As far as I am concerned, I never thought that we could establish a policy of contracts with that country. Others thought so and they were wrong, as events have proven. Today, Iran does not want to accept the imbalances provoked in the country by a gigantic development which has upset its structures, including social structures. That is its own affair.

As for Iraq, we continue to exchange so-called strategic products. But we must be clear: The news, the press and contemporary thought have long admitted that there are several sources of energy, nonrenewable and renewable energy. We are still living in an age of nonrenewable energy (petroleum, coal, nuclear energy). Several states have been actively engaged in diversifying their sources of energy production (of electricity), and many have considered producing nuclear energy. This is all very commonplace today. Any state--like Brazil, which has no petroleum--can aspire to hydroelectric generation or to alcohol from sugarcane or to nuclear electricity. There is no need to be alarmed by all that. We are part of a civilization which has discovered the atom and which intends to use it.

[Answer] Indeed. In certain areas, the countries which possess civilian nuclear technology hesitate to build power stations and to establish a nuclear capacity for other countries on the pretext that the latter might use this civilian energy for military purposes. But this nuclear capacity lies less in the material than in the men. Who will or will not have a nuclear team? That is the question. Israel passed from one zone to the other long ago; it did not sign the nonproliferation treaty. Iraq signed this treaty. Monitoring by the Vienna agency or anyone else cannot absolutely guarantee that people will not make the switch from civilian to military technology. The switch is made, at any rate.

Let's be quite clear about this: Is it possible that a certain number of countries really believe that they will prevent other countries from providing themselves with the human infrastructure necessary to master nuclear technology? That is the only question which matters. Does Pakistan have this human infrastructure? The same question applies to Iraq, India, Brazil and South Korea. Don't you think that Germany today, given its state of industrial development, is capable of making its own bomb if it ever makes up its mind to do so? Don't you think that South Africa, Brazil and Argentina are capable today, if only in an elementary way, of constructing a military nuclear capacity?

[Question] If France rebuilds Tammuz, can it then be satisfied with assurances from its client and the monitoring of the Vienna agency?

FOREIGN TRADE MINISTER DISCUSSES ENERGY SITUATION

FM2812Z4 Paris LE MATIN in French 26 Aug 81 p 6

[Henri Lauret interview with French Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert; date and place not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] Are we still threatened with a third oil shock despite the fact that oil is now plentiful?

[Answer] We are still threatened with a third shock for a fundamental reason--oil shocks have occurred only because world inflation has become galloping inflation. The fall of the dollar, which has accelerated since 1971, much more than the Near East conflicts, has led to the oil war which we have experienced and which, in essence, has reflected the desire of a certain number of countries to establish their political power on a solid economic basis and their determination not to allow the resources which they could derive from the sale of their oil to deteriorate.

[Question] What kind of relations with oil states do you advocate? Agreements with individual states similar to those which you initiated in 1973? Or, on the contrary, would it be better to let market forces be freely expressed?

[Answer] It isn't a question of dreams, emotion or theory. Whenever oil is in short supply, everybody deems a policy of long term contracts between individual states as excellent since it simultaneously resolves the problem of production on the one hand and that of supplies on the other. And then as soon as the market situation eases, you see 12 or 15 international operators rule the roost, and some people are pleased that market forces have come into play again. I have just mentioned two possible attitudes and I believe that they must coexist because year by year one of these two solutions prevails, depending on the political, economic and monetary situation--but only for very short periods.

This means that the philosophy of oil agreements can be justified on a factual basis. Furthermore, as far as most of the production is concerned, oil has become the property of individual states. It is natural, therefore, that production is subjected to state regulations, hence agreements on a state-to-state basis. You require no extraordinary imagination but merely a modicum of commonsense to be able to recognize one of the features of the times in which you live. This is what I sought to do when I assumed some responsibilities in 1973 and even before.

[Answer] They are bound to become increasingly so. Despite a relative glut of oil on the market at present, the situation will not last. If the present galloping inflation continues--and none of the overall causes of it has changed--a third oil shock is bound to occur. I have no idea when this will happen but it would, in fact, happen within a few months. Especially since in view of very high interest rates, oil stockpiling--the cushion which the West has been padding in recent months--has become much more costly and, as a result, a certain number of major companies have quietly been discarding it.

[Answer] The tensions which exist in the Near East and the decisions made--political decisions--could well lead to great internal political difficulties in several oil producing Near East states--Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates. We would be well advised to take a very close look at this since the absence of an oil shock at present is a result of a deliberate production policy pursued by Saudi Arabia, which has decided for purely Saudi political reasons to establish control over the price of oil produced by all its partners.

And once again, the bomb planters select a target that is the object of criticism also outside their close circle. That was the case during the Vietnam war when the bombs of the Red Army Faction exploded in Frankfurt and Heidelberg. A similar situation is developing now.

Those critics of U.S. policy who have to be taken seriously will have to suffer for this in the end; the blind followers of U.S. positions are already trying to "call the critics to order," indicating that one ought to pick one's words carefully and examine whether they could serve to create understanding for the bomb terrorism against U.S. installations. Justified protest must not be muzzled that way.

[Commentary signed G-K.: "Damage to the Alliance"]

[Text] Not much fantasy is needed to imagine what effect the Ramstein and Wiesbaden bombings will have on American soldiers stationed in the Federal Republic and their dependents. Some of them may fear that someone is trying to drive them out of the country. There will be more, however, who will ask themselves why they should perform their service in Europe if those who profit most from that service don't appreciate it. The effect the explosion and fire attacks will have on these Americans' fellow citizens must be taken more seriously than the damage to buildings and cars.

An alliance is as good as the degree of agreement between the members of the allied states. Alliances also have a spirit that must be cared for. Now and again, the nature of most important interests must be remembered. Three generations of Germans owe much to the Americans--we are tempted to say almost everything that counts politically: freedom, help in material need and security in foreign affairs. The democratized Germans of 1945 experienced in the early postwar years the strength of American idealism and the extraordinary preparedness of the American nation to help. The American promise of protection made at the time was the most important foreign political basis of the Federal Republic. Nothing much has changed in this regard since the Berlin blockade.

Is that about to be forgotten? In recent months, an amazing tone of indifference, doubt and gradual defamation of U.S. foreign and alliance policies has spread among some of the top politicians of the leading government party and among some papers, radio programs and the weekly political and news magazines. They seem to have no idea that good will is also a foreign policy factor. Years ago the Germans had the foolish fear that America could distance itself from Europe. Now some Germans are foolish enough to have no fear at all about detaching Europe's security from that of America, especially in matters of nuclear policy where America has put its own security at stake for that of Europe.

A letter dated 31 August and signed "Red Army Faction" sent to the DPA office in Giessen says: "Today, with the Sigurd Debus commando, we attacked the headquarters of the U.S. Air Force Europe in Ramstein." The attack was part of the strategy of "war on the imperialist war."

The 38-year-old terrorist Sigurd Debus died on 16 April following a 2-month hunger strike in a Hamburg hospital.

NEWSPAPERS COMMENT ON RAMSTEIN BOMBING

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU

DW0212\9 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 2 Sep 81 p 3

[Gerhard Ziegler editorial: "Enemy Images"]

It also happens that those who view the slightest criticism of U.S. policy as "destructive anti-Americanism" believe that a spiritual background exists for a new wave of violence, namely, the "peace movement." Once again, as so often before, the "spirit of the times" is being quoted. This pattern is known and it has been demonstrated too often. After it was vehemently stressed that "democratic" criticism of U.S. foreign and security policies naturally is permissible and legitimate and that it would be malicious to claim that a direct line must be drawn between the bombers and those exercising the right to criticize (no, that can not be done in any case), the following was said: But it still makes you wonder that particularly now....

To make everyone realize what must be concluded from this, some helpful hints are being put forth. Strong statements by politicians are being cited, such as Willi Piecyk, chairman of the Young Socialists, who termed U.S. President Ronald Reagan "a terrible president." Or one thinks out loud about receiving U.S. Secretary of State Haig with a protest demonstration in West Berlin. In this way, it is being systematically suggested that this is exactly the climate where violence develops and bombs explode.

Unfortunately, however, the U.S. alliance partner has contributed to fanning the mood in this direction. It was stressed in a DIE WELT report that AFN, the American forces network, reported on the Ramstein bombing with the additional remark that this happened "against the background of a growing neutralist mood in the Federal Republic." Thousands of Germans were said to have participated last weekend in protest actions against U.S. medium-range missiles and the neutron bomb. We have been sufficiently supplied with our own outstanding examples of the methods of political defamation. It is regrettable that assistance is now coming from an area where the rights of citizens hold such a high position--assistance to discredit the right to demonstrate.

All that can be condensed into a brief formula: Whoever does not consider U.S. foreign and security policies as extraordinary and convincing and calls them into question is pursuing anti-Americanism--and anti-Americanism stimulates and produces violence. This is absurd but it also cannot be denied that the atmosphere created by Reagan's policy and the defensive reaction in Europe does not promote just rational argumentation. Terrorism, which lately had been maintaining a waiting position, now has a clear image of the enemy again.

EPPLER REPORTS SOVIET VIEWS ON ARMS CONTROL

[Text] Bonn, 2 Sep (DAP)--During his visit to Moscow, SPD Presidium member Erhard Eppler was told that not all Soviet SS-20 medium-range missiles have three warheads. At a news conference in Bonn today, Eppler pointed out that Moscow had thus for the first time publicly joined in the debate on medium-range missiles with new information.

In his talk with Central Committee Department Chief Vadim Zagladin, Eppler was also told that the explosive power of the individual warheads is not, as hitherto presumed in the West, 250 kilotons, but "considerably less." Eppler gained the impression that the explosive power of the warheads is possibly only about 25 kilotons (Hiroshima size) and is thus intended for use against targets that could be precisely pinpointed.

Eppler, who was in Moscow on 21 August and then continued to North Korea, also said that Moscow is more or less reconciling itself to the inevitable and expects the implementation of the NATO counterarming decision in Europe, especially as it views the peace movement's chances of success with considerable skepticism. However, the Kremlin is preparing itself quite seriously for the forthcoming arms control negotiations with the United States.

Eppler said that he had not "been able to detect any visible agitation, not even over the decision to produce the neutron bomb." But according to information given him by Zagladin, Soviet counterarming with powerful warheads is inevitable if the counterarming generation of Pershing II and cruise missiles is introduced into West Europe.

Eppler said that the DPRK desire for closer relations with West Europe without preconditions was made clear during his talks with President Kim Il-song. Eppler spoke of the astonishing independence and nonaligned stance of the country which holds views contrary to those of its powerful neighbors, the Soviet Union and China.

FRG SUPPORTS SOUTH AFRICAN WITHDRAWAL FROM ANGOLA

[Text] Bonn, 2 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government regrets the lack of uniformity among the Western countries in the voting in the UN Security Council on the South African military action in Angola. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker reported from today's Bonn Cabinet meeting that, in his report on the Security Council debate, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher had noted that Bonn, if it had been a member of this body, would have voted with France for the unconditional withdrawal of the South Africans from Angola.

The relevant resolution, which also envisaged the payment of compensation to Angola by South Africa and the sending of a UN investigative commission, was blocked by the U.S. veto. Britain abstained, whereas France and the other 12 Security Council members voted for the draft resolution.

BECKER: BREZHNEV VISIT SET FOR LATE NOVEMBER

[Text] Bonn, 2 Sep (DPA)--The visit to Bonn by Soviet state and party head Leonid Brezhnev has now been definitely set for the end of November. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told a press conference in Bonn today that the date had been set and confirmed by both sides in mutual agreement.

Becker stressed that the date of the visit, upon which there had been speculation for several weeks, had thus been confirmed. In accordance with diplomatic practice, the exact date will be announced later simultaneously in the two capitals. Becker noted that the setting of a date for the trip has killed speculation that the recent personal attacks on the federal chancellor by the Soviet news agency TASS could threaten the planned visit.

[Hamburg DPA in German at 1827 GMT on 2 September 1981 reports that 23 and 24 November are the dates named for the Bonn visit of the Soviet general secretary and that official sources refused to confirm this, pointing out that the exact dates will be made known jointly later.]

PRESS VIEWS TASS 'ATTACK' AGAINST SCHMIDT

[From the press review]

[Text] The attack by the Moscow news agency TASS against Federal Chancellor Schmidt is discussed by STUTTGARTER NACHRICHTEN: Whoever bears the drum beats with which Moscow is attacking Federal Chancellor Schmidt will scratch his head in amazement: What had things did the chancellor say?

Then Schmidt's television interview this weekend will be remembered. He made a clear statement regarding the so-called peace movement--seriously, carefully and without provocation. Schmidt said plainly, for example, that the Krefeld appeal against NATO's rearmament was very much supported and directed by the German Communist Party and also that this appeal was directed against NATO. Moscow has something else in mind with its propagandistic accompanying music, namely, fanning the peace movement even more.

BERLINER MORGENPOST notes: There are statesmen and politicians who allow roses and manna to rain on countries they plan to visit in the near future. Leonid Brezhnev is not one of them. The strong attacks launched by TASS yesterday against Federal Chancellor Schmidt are hardly suitable to create a good mood in official Bonn regarding Brezhnev's visit in November. The attacks were launched with such heavy guns that doubt could almost be raised about the intentions of the Kremlin chief to visit.

The direction in which Moscow is directing its thrust is more than clear. It is aimed directly at the rifts that have opened in security policy problems between the social-liberal Federal Government and one wing of the SPD that is shaken by pacifist expectations.

NORDWEST-ZEITUNG of Oldenburg says: Moscow obviously expected too much of the so-called peace movement because the hardest accusations rain on Schmidt because of this movement. The accusations are such that Schmidt could be proud of them. If the Soviets confirm that he has clearly acted in an anticommunist way, the Bonn opposition has been deprived of much argument.

DEBATE CONTINUES ON PURCHASE OF INTERCEPTORS

[Excerpt] Vienna (AZ)--The question "if and which type of interceptors will be bought for the Austrian Army" continues to be open. Chancellor Kreisky stressed on Tuesday after the cabinet meeting: "The government will first of all have to decide on whether any interceptors will be bought at all."

Then the offer submitted by France (Mirage 50) and the not-yet-submitted offer from the United States (F-16) would have to be examined as to their expediency and economic efficiency. "Then we will see." Moreover, the chancellor indicated--he used the term prophesy--that next year's budget would not include any funds earmarked for interceptors. In view of the grave burden which the purchase of interceptors would constitute, Kreisky said that he is fully relying on the finance minister's judgment.

The chancellor pointed out that the National Defense Council before the summer suddenly made a "basic decision" in favor of the French Mirage, the producers of which offered extensive barter transactions. The American side, he said, indicated that it would be annoyed if U.S. firms were not given an opportunity to submit a similarly detailed offer like that of France. The chancellor stressed that to date he had not received any materials from the United States and that the U.S. offer was to be submitted to him by 15 September.

SYNAGOGUE TERRORIST SUSPECTED OF NITTEL MURDER

[Summary] Police are continuing their intensive investigation into the background of the terrorist attack on the Vienna synagogue, at the same time following up leads pointing to connections with the assassination [on 1 May 1981] of Vienna City Councilman Heinz Nittel. Police are concentrating their efforts on finding out where the injured terrorist (Hasan Marwan), alias Yusuf, was at the time of the Nittel murder. "So far, it could not be clarified where he was in the 3 weeks from 1 to 23 May." (Marwan) has been successfully operated on and will be transferred to the Vienna provincial court prison as soon as possible.

Commenting on rumors that the terrorists might be deported to a foreign country, a Justice Ministry spokesman stressed that there is no legal basis for such a deportation. He said he was sure that, in the event of their being sentenced, such sentences would have to be served in Austria.

FOREIGN MINISTRY RESPONDS TO LIBYAN THREAT

LD0222Z0I Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1730 GMT 2 Sep 81

[Excerpt] An official spokesman for the Spanish Foreign Affairs Ministry said that it will pay no attention to the Libyan threats to attack U.S. bases in Europe because, as far as Spain is concerned, those bases are there under a bilateral treaty signed in 1976 which presently is undergoing renegotiation and that Spain maintains relations with any foreign country by virtue of its sovereignty, for which reasons--and in spite of the good relations which Spain has with Libya--it will not accept in any instance any foreign country telling it what it has to do or not do. The fate of the Spanish people, concluded the spokesman, will be decided here in Spain by the Spanish people. Spain can establish pacts with whomever it wants.

Eighty one million French francs were earned in return. Importers of Turkish-made Renaults were Egypt, Libya and certain West African countries, paying a total of 81 million French francs in foreign currency. The factory also exported over 3,800 gear boxes to France for a total of 90 million francs. [Text] [Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1450 GMT 31 Aug 81 TA]

Rallis appears to have a different opinion, believing that in order to be useful he must avoid becoming unpleasant before the election. Thus the current prime minister wages the election battle from a position of strength, since he is in authority and he actually blocks the ability of PASOK to make promises and grants.

In other words, on this point also, we have a reversal of the positions of the two parties. Papandreou, "New Democracy" circles observe, who successfully waged two election campaigns under a slogan against "one-sided austerity," using the tactics of illogical satisfaction of every social and labor demand in his promises, is now forced to denounce the government for "a preelection campaign of grants," as well as for "a scorched earth policy" and "squandering of public funds."

In addition to this PASOK's chairman this week called on his candidate deputies to avoid making promises about the satisfaction of economic demands and not to bind the party without the knowledge of its leadership.

In the ideological-political confrontation between the two parties the weaknesses of PASOK are centered in the very sectors in which the majority party is the strongest. Specifically, "New Democracy" very easily uses candidates from the center and national front areas in preparing its election slate and the only reaction apparent at this moment is not due to ideological motives but to certain petty party estimations or local personalities.

Papandreou, by contrast, although he knows that in many areas he will have to demonstrate actively the center support he claims, is not permitted by internal party reaction to utilize the available center personalities in his slates.

Papandreou's statement last Sunday that PASOK will rely exclusively on the following his party has in the center mass of voters without "resorting" to the use of personalities not connected with the movement's struggles, is interpreted as a direct admission of this weakness.

All these observations and conclusions give a new and unexpected dimension to the preelection struggle. The withdrawal of PASOK to defensive positions and the parallel offensive initiative of "New Democracy" most definitely, and in a first stage, does influence the psychological climate within the two opposing camps. If this phenomenon is not temporary, its repercussions will most probably be extremely important for the election confrontation and its outcome.

The presentation ceremony was attended by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and Secretary General of the Presidential Office Molivlatis. The new Indian ambassador, (Ramesh Cesere Roda), had earlier presented his credentials to the president. [Text] [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 2 Sep 81 MC]

I KATHIMERINI VIEWS ROLES OF MAJOR PARTIES

NC3010625 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 30 Aug 81 pp 1, 3

[Article by Stamos Zoulas: "New Democracy's Campaign Centers on PASOK's Lack of Credibility"]

[Text] There are clear, recent indications on the reversal of roles by the two leading parties. "New Democracy," fortified behind the defense positions of the past 4 years, appears to be clearly taking the aggressive role while PASOK is forced into a position of defense. There are numerous reasons for this reversal which, if completed, will possibly influence the outcome of the election in a positive way. They are mostly based on the fact that "New Democracy" at this moment appears to have greater ease to maneuver, compared to PASOK, within the areas selected by the two parties in their effort to expand their electoral base.

PASOK's basic difficulty is attributed to the delay as well as to the hesitant way it attempted to revise its fundamental ideological and political positions in its effort to claim an important percentage of conservative votes.

This attempt is now under concerted fire from "New Democracy," aimed not at pushing PASOK back to its former extremist positions but at proving lack of political credibility, ideological insignificance and generally the dangerous and contradictory course adopted by the official opposition party.

As can be seen from Papandreou's reactions, this campaign appears to be extremely painful for PASOK because it cultivates a feeling of uncertainty, mistrust and insecurity among the electorate. It is a fact that leading PASOK personalities believe it would be preferable if a different campaign scheme were adopted, targeted either against the leftist positions or against the more moderate changes which the official opposition party is attempting. The same person observed that attacks on the Marxist identity of the party, for example, would have preserved unity within the leftwing of the party and, at the same time, could have been countered by suitable political maneuvering which could have had more important effects among the more conservative voters.

A "New Democracy" campaign exclusively aimed at denouncing and undermining PASOK's over-[illegible] toward the center could have been dealt with just as easily. This is because "New Democracy" criticism would confirm such an "overture" and could have helped the official opposition party's leadership, which would not be forced to "supply proof of conservatism toward the rightwing while at the same time giving promises of devotion to the original proclamations to the leftwing of PASOK."

In other words the context of "New Democracy's criticism, which now questions every single position declared by PASOK--whether toward the rightwing or toward the leftwing--appears to have created problems for Papandreou in his selection of a specific policy.

"New Democracy" circles consider it very indicative that Papandreou continually waves the white flag of truce, calling for a calm climate--particularly at the very start of the election campaign.

At the same time, for the first time in the postdictatorial period, Papandreou is face to face with the superiority of strength available to all parties which wage an election battle from a position of authority.

As mentioned in the past, the Karamanlis dogma, "I much prefer to be useful than pleasant," prevailed during two previous election campaigns. While he was prime minister, the current president of the republic not only refused to adopt measures which could be considered pre-election measures but, on the contrary, was forced to adopt measures on the eve of elections enforcing austerity, taxation and consumer restrictions.

FDP, SPD CHAIRMEN COMMENT ON STATE OF COALITION

Genscher Remarks

DW040847 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1700 GMT 3 Sep 81

[Reporter Heinz Metlitzky interview with Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn on 3 September--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Since you take such a positive view of everything, do you also believe that the FDP-SPD coalition will last until 1984?

[Answer] I believe that a positive decision [on the government's austerity program] and the expected positive effects on economic development also will strengthen cooperation.

[Question] When you say strengthen cooperation, do you mean the coalition should last until 1984?

[Answer] Yes, yes.

Brandt View

DW040843 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1700 GMT 3 Sep 81

[Reporter Heinz Metlitzky interview with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt in Bonn 3 September--recorded]

[Text] [Brandt] A situation had arisen where one could have the impression that the coalition was drifting apart. I think that this has been overcome.

[Question] Was there some sort of unofficial reconciliation between the individuals involved--such as between you and Mr Genscher?

[Answer] There was nothing between me and Mr Genscher...

[Question] So you predict the happy continuation of this coalition until 1984?

[Answer] Happy or not--the situation is not such that we can always speak of happiness; but I consider it as quite possible--and this would be in line with the mission given to us by the electorate--that this coalition will be able to continue its businesslike cooperation until the next federal elections.

Budget Compromise Cited

[Excerpt] Bonn, 3 Sep (DPA)--Discussions between the SPD and the FDP to overcome budgetary problems also bear on "the continuation of the coalition," according to SPD Chairman Willy Brandt. With these words, Brandt justified the budget decisions of the coalition and the cabinet in a letter to SPD members published on Thursday in Bonn.

Brandt stressed that political opponents are waiting for the coalition to irrevocably split. In spite of some important "sociopolitical differences of opinion," however, the SPD and FDP found the strength for a compromise "which harms neither partner and was not achieved at the cost of our fundamental convictions." But Brandt admitted that his party had to face problematical decisions and "painful corrections."

A "significant process" for the SPD is also the interim abandonment of an additional program to support the economy. The intervention of the Social Democrats is necessary, however, to preserve the course of the peace policy and to secure the welfare state. Altogether, the savings are socially manageable and probably some details of the budget will still be amended in the debate in parliament.

EPPLER REPORTS SOVIET VIEWS ON ARMS, U.S. POLICY

["Excerpts" from Heinemann interview with SPD Presidium member Erhard Eppler; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] As a result of your talks there, what does the Soviet Union think about the possibilities for a round of talks and negotiations on limiting medium-range missiles in central Europe?

[Answer] It is not news that the Soviet Union is extremely skeptical about one point, namely, U.S. interest in such negotiations. Yet I have the impression that they are making intense preparations and that they will try to make the best of these negotiations. The Soviets told me that a balance exists not only with regard to delivery means but also to warheads. That must be discussed with them and then they will have to really show their hand.

[Question] Should we assume that the Soviets are already considering the implementation of so-called measures to catch up in armament?

[Answer] It has been clear for a long time that the Soviet Union will take countermeasures the instant mobile medium-range missiles are deployed here--missiles which could destroy the Kremlin in 5 minutes. These countermeasures could well be aimed at the large-scale destruction of our republic. It was not expressed that way to me, but there were such indications.

[Question] You think you have found insecurity in the Soviet assessment of U.S. foreign policy. Why?

[Answer] It is based on the fact that very different statements have come from the United States, very militant statements. A discussion is underway in the United States as to whether the United States is already pursuing a clearly formulated foreign policy. Naturally, this is also being discussed in Moscow.

SCHMIDT MARKS ANNIVERSARY OF BERLIN AGREEMENT

[Text] Bonn, 3 Sep (DPA)--In the opinion of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, the quadripartite agreement on Berlin signed 10 years ago must be strictly observed and fully implemented. It must not be infringed upon by unilateral measures taken by the GDR, such as the increase in the amount of foreign currency that must be exchanged.

In a statement today on the 10th anniversary of the signing of the agreement, Schmidt recalled the words of the then federal chancellor, Willy Brandt, who had seen the real significance of the agreement as being the acknowledgement that there ought to be no more Berlin crises. "Ten years have passed and one can say that there has not been a Berlin crisis. The agreement is accomplishing its purpose," the chancellor said.

In addition to thanking the three Western protecting powers for their guarantees, the chancellor stressed that close understanding with these powers is "the core of our Berlin policy and, in fact, the core of our entire overall policy."

MITTERRAND, DIOUF DISCUSS SENEGAL'S ECONOMY

[Text] Paris, 4 Sep (AFP)--President Abdou Diouf of Senegal and President Francois Mitterrand discussed Senegal's economic and financial situation and current African problems when they met at the presidential palace here today. Mr Diouf said the talks, their first since Mr Mitterrand's election last May, had been "extremely fruitful." They had also covered cooperation between the two countries in depth, he added.

MINISTER ADVOCATES INCREASED THIRD WORLD AID

[Gerard Viratelle interview with French Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot; date and place not given]

[Text] [Question] Generally speaking, there is a degree of skepticism with regard to major international meetings. Minister, what is the specific importance of a conference on the least developed countries [LDC]?

[Answer] The conference was launched under the previous government and in a way we have boarded the train while in motion. This concept, even the very concept of LDC, is criticized by a number of states, both because the category is defined in rather an arbitarary way, at least regarding the limits of the category, and also for fear that it will be impossible to see the forest for the trees--that the 31 LDC which will be studied with solicitude might distract attention from the problem of underdevelopment as a whole and that, at a time when a number of states have announced their intention to cut their public development aid, it may in a way serve as a useful pretext to show that they are not completely indifferent to the fate of the most unfortunate people. There is a rather patronizing aspect to this affair, which could be dangerous.

At the same time, however, it is true that there are enormous disparities among the developing countries and that some of these countries are in particularly difficult situations not only because of the difficulties their citizens are experiencing but also, and perhaps more importantly, because these countries cannot find the resources which would enable them to get off the ground. This is the reason for the desire within the UN and UNCTAD framework to treat the LDC as a special case and to launch this conference.

[Answer] Since this conference is taking place, we think it must succeed because we think that specific aid measures should be defined for the LDC, which could in a way pave the way for other efforts affecting all the developing countries. Hence, in this respect, defining measures for a limited group of countries which are suited to development problems as a whole could serve as a precedent and an example.

Moreover, we think that it is important for this conference to succeed because of the time at which it is being held, after Ottawa and before the North-South summit in Cancun, Mexico, and in view of the possibility of launching all-embracing negotiations. At this stage, it is important that we should try to reopen the special dialogue which the Paris conference constitutes.

For these reasons, the French Government is determined to do everything necessary to ensure that this conference is a success or at least to ensure that it is not a failure.

This will not be easy. The Manila precedent (the fifth UN conference on trade and development in June 1979) is hardly encouraging. In view of the preparatory meetings, I must say that there seem to be emergent signs of a political will to succeed and that, now that the conference is being convened again, we are in a rather better situation than we might have hoped.

Specific Measures

[Question] What does the success or failure of the conference mean?

[Answer] The success of the conference in view of what I [apparent line drop] means the adoption of a number of specific resolutions which can be implemented. The main criticism leveled at the Manila conference was that its rhetoric did not lead to any action. The program of immediate action for the 1979-81 period in particular never really got off the ground although it was an emergency program.

If this happens again, adding a second disappointment to the first, I think we will be able to talk about a failure. It is important that the Paris conference should succeed in adopting a program of action which comprises measures which are practical even if modest, ensuring for the LDC that their affairs will be pursued and improved in the next few years and comprising the structures to be established. I believe, therefore, that the test will lie in some materialization of political will.

The conference will be characterized by a second element: the unilateral pledges which will be made or announced. In a period of recession in public development aid, they could mark a desire to give new impetus to the North-South dialogue. What the various countries say will be important.

Finally, the third indicator of success or failure will lie in the participants' readiness to continue this dialogue. The result will be seen in Cancun and at the UN General Assembly.

Increasing French Aid

[Question] The objectives which UNCTAD is submitting to the conference refer in particular to doubling the volume of transfers to the LDC between now and 1985 and quadrupling them by 1990. Is that the main objective? Isn't there also good reason to attach great importance to the nature of aid and the methods of supplying it?

[Answer] The important thing is to have objectives which can be attained. I am not sure that grand proclamations about doubling or quadrupling aid are very realistic. It might be an incentive. So much the better. But past experience of global objectives does not inspire optimism. I hope that we might emerge from the conference with more specific achievements independent of these general statements. In particular, anything which relates to methods of supplying aid could be important as could the followup to the decisions.

In other words, LDC will be successful if problems are tackled by methods and procedures which will have been decided at least generally by the conference if development projects are able to find an outlet and if the aid procedures outlined become effective. The highly practical aspect of methods of supplying aid is an aspect on which results can be obtained. Of course, the LDC will fix their attention on the more general problem of the transfer of resources. Unless something is done in this sphere the rest will be generally seen as hypocrisy. But I cannot be very optimistic on this point, at least not in a general sense. Although some states or groups of states might announce greater efforts on this occasion, President Reagan's position is symbolic.

[Question] France is about to solemnly announce that it will pledge to increase its aid to the LDC to 0.15 percent of its GNP. Is the amount of aid devoted to other countries not going to be reduced in order to do this or will there be an overall increase in French aid?

[Answer] The French position is a confirmation of the objective of 0.7 percent of the GNP, excluding overseas departments and territories, which means doubling total aid and within this objective, there is a secondary objective which has a date and also means doubling the present level which is around 0.08 percent. This means that in the framework of the major increase in public aid, preference will be given to the LDC but not to the detriment of the other countries.

[Question] Will this apply to both bilateral and multilateral aid?

[Answer] Yes, both. In addition, it is vital that aid to the LDC should be given priority since they have very little capacity for self-sufficiency. This financial and administrative aspect of aid is probably the main importance of the LDC category.

[Question] France is sometimes criticized for giving too important a place to tied aid?

[Answer] The notion of common interest must back up the notion of LDC, otherwise we will not overcome the crisis. Aside from the theological problem, the policy of aid to the Third World must have repercussions for France. This is a precondition for its implementation. I say this openly and unashamedly. Generous talk about aid leads to recession.

[Question] Since the aim is to "eliminate hunger" and seek "self-sufficiency" in food, shouldn't a large part of the aid be devoted to agricultural development?

[Answer] There is no doubt that rural development aid must be given priority, but at the same time it is one of the most difficult types of aid to implement because it is very diverse; it is only meaningful if it is accompanied by a training and education effort.

No "Differences of Opinion" With Cheysson

[Question] You have stressed the need for "self-centered" development. Does this mean that many of the agricultural economies have been gradually directed toward exports to the detriment of food crops?

[Answer] The notion of self-centered development is widely held. To a large extent it is the philosophy of the developing countries themselves. The French position simply backs up an existing concept in order to support its application. The difficult thing is to move from rhetoric to policy in this sphere.

[Question] Do you think there is a place for private investment in the LDC?

[Answer] It is true that the LDC are less "attractive" to world trade and investment by industrialized countries than the countries which have resources. There are, nonetheless, interesting sectors: the development of small enterprises. A whole sector of small and medium-sized enterprises, for instance, could certainly contribute to launching similar enterprises in the LDC. It is just that the investments differ from the type of heavy operations which are profitable in states which have considerable resources.

[Question] What role does France intend to play in view of the attitude adopted by some Western countries toward the Third World?

[Answer] I don't know whether it will be possible to bend the American position because this position is at least as philosophical as it is political.

When it is a question of dogma, things become more difficult. What we should do, both with regard to our partners and to our public opinion, is to tirelessly demonstrate that the Third World's development coincides with our own interests and that it is only by establishing a new international order that we will solve our economic problems.

We began to demonstrate that in Ottawa, we will continue to do so in the French stances at the Paris conference and, above all, will reaffirm it strongly in Cancun and afterwards. We will try to show our partners that it is a mistake to limit commitment to public development aid in the hope that the money saved will provide a new impetus to overcome the crisis. However, it isn't easy to demonstrate this. In a period of crisis and austerity, it is never easy to plead for an increased financial effort. Furthermore, the results of development strategies have hitherto not been very convincing.

Parallel to the effort to explain things, we must develop in more detail our ideas on an effective development strategy, in other words, a strategy directed at satisfying fundamental needs but forming part of the search for a new international economic order. The fight for this order is also a fight for a new national order. None of this is a matter of indifference to people and produces a frank dialogue which can at times be extremely unpleasant.

[Question] You and Cheysson sometimes seem to differ in your views of development and relations with the Third World.

[Answer] I do not think that there are any differences of opinion on this subject. I simply think that we both agree on the need to approach the problem from both angles. In practical terms, this means that we must have a development strategy which is appropriate to the country and that at the same time this strategy can only have a chance of succeeding if it is part of a world trade strategy and falls within the framework of a new international economic order. These two strategies must not conflict or they will both fail. They must, therefore, be complementary. This is not always evident in the way priorities are established, but it is vital.

LE MONDE LAUDS CHEYSSON MIDEAST TRIP RESULTS

[Eric Rouleau dispatch: "Cheysson Has Won Over His Interlocutors Without Any Essential Concessions"]

[Text] Damascus--Claude Cheysson has some reason to be satisfied with the tour which has taken him to three Near East capitals in 3 days. In Amman, Beirut and finally Damascus, which he left on 31 August, he was able to directly assess the facts and the analyses of officials--like the Lebanese and Syrian presidents--who rarely have the opportunity to go abroad. In addition, he had the opportunity to explain the French Government's Near East policy both to the leaders and to public opinion. He thus has succeeded in removing the misconceptions and distrust of Paris' impartiality and to make some progress in clearing the ground for the conciliation mission which President Mitterrand hopes to give the whole European Community.

Without making any essential concessions, Cheysson has won over his interlocutors--judging from various official and unofficial commentaries--by the directness of his speeches and by his sincere tone. His stances in favor of self-determination for the Palestinians were accompanied by constant reiterations of France's attachment to the existence and security of Israel--an essential precondition to any settlement.

Following a banquet Sunday evening given in his honor by Syrian Foreign Minister Khaddam, the head of French diplomacy spoke of the Jewish state with the active support of the international community. This reparation, he explained, engendered another injustice, this time suffered by the Palestinians who, in turn, are involved in the Lebanese tragedy. Hence, the urgent need, he added, for a compromise based on justice, which would end the sufferings of all the peoples concerned and would establish a lasting peace in the region.

Cheysson said exactly the same to President al-Asad with whom he had a meeting lasting almost 2 hours in Al-Ladhiqiyah where the Syrian head of state was resting.

The French minister attacked the myths which are still current in some parts of the Arab world. It is necessary, he said, that diplomacy should "stick to simple and concrete facts, "namely, that two peoples--the Israelis and Palestinians--exist and hence have the right to a homeland, to a state, otherwise it would be impossible to establish peace.

Damascus' Position

Mr Cheysson's Syrian interlocutors told him in reply that they too ardently want a settlement. However, they could not help observing that the situation produced by the Camp David agreements, far from constituting a "step forward," as the French minister believed, had increased sources of tension. The division of the Arab world--a source of extremism--caused by Egypt's "defection"; the exclusion of the Palestinians from the peace process; the increasing number of faits accomplis in the occupied territories under cover of the treaty concluded between Cairo and Jerusalem and with Washington's blessing; the aggravation of the imbalance in favor of Israel whose "arrogance" was bolstered by massive U.S. aid.

The Damascus leaders pointed out that Israel's air strength, compared with the strength of its armed forces as a whole, was proportionally 20 times higher than in the United States, which, they claim, demonstrates the Begin government's "aggressive intentions." If that were not the case, what explanation would there be for the increase in U.S. arms supplies despite the peace treaty signed between Israel and Egypt, the most powerful of the Arab states? What is even more serious in the eyes of the Syrian leaders is the fact that the Camp David agreements have encouraged U.S. military implantation in the Middle East, thus introducing an additional explosive element connected with the direct implication of the states in the region in the East-West confrontation. The Damascus government's conclusion is that France, and also Europe, must help to neutralize these negative factors so that negotiations can be opened and can succeed.

The Quai d'Orsay chief was favorably impressed by the attitude taken by President al-Asad and Khaddam toward Lebanon, which he had described as the "central point" of his trip. Far from regarding that country as a Syrian preserve, they assured Cheysson that they shared France's concern to preserve the country's "unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity." Syria, they repeated, has no territorial ambitions. In return, Mr Cheysson told the press before leaving Damascus that the Lebanese were an integral part of the "Arab nation" and that "all communities" should hence adopt a common attitude toward external problems. This was probably a way of saying that he disapproved just as much as the Syrians of the ties with Israel maintained by some Lebanese factions.

Despite these areas of agreement, the external relations minister was anxious to tell the Arab people that France will refrain from taking any initiative before consulting the other party in the conflict. It was at Damascus airport that he announced to the press that he intends to visit Israel "as soon as possible."

LE FIGARO VIEWS MITTERRAND'S FOREIGN POLICY

[Serge Maffert editorial: "Different Approaches"]

[Text] No crisis or tension exist between France and the United States but there are subjects of disagreement or, as it is said in Franglais, different "approaches" on problems which are important but not vital. The innovation in the French-Mexican statement issued on Friday evening lies in the fact that it is a direct and public intervention by France regarding the internal situation in El Salvador, a Central American state. This intervention is aimed at giving priority to the search for a political solution and not for the military solution to which Washington seems to give preference.

Mitterrand's foreign policy is taking clearer shape as the weeks go by. It falls essentially into two main sections:

On all matters relating to East-West relations, France ostensibly adopts the American viewpoint, be it on the strategic balance, arms negotiations with the USSR or the firm line invoked with regard to Afghanistan or Poland.

On all matters relating to what is called North-South relations, in other words, relations with the Third World and the solutions which might be envisaged to solve its desperate problems, France, however, is resolutely going it alone, not only with regard to the United States but also with regard to its main European partners.

Although he is not saying so and possibly does not intend to do so, Mitterrand is clearly adopting the same outlook as General de Gaulle: France has a great role to play with regard to the billions of men who inhabit regions which are the poorest either for climatic reasons as in Africa or because of an inherited political burden as is the case in Latin America particularly and also in a large part of Asia.

It can play this role to the benefit of these countries and also to its own benefit, provided it obstinately defends the "human cause," in other words, it isn't easy to follow such a course of action. It requires a great deal of conviction because you automatically encounter many interests, and worse still, many preconceived ideas. It also requires material means because everything is ultimately translated into aid--financial, technological, food and so forth.

Theoretically, the East-West and North-South axes of French policy are not inconsistent but this combination or this juxtaposition must be seen with Cartesian and Latin logic. When he meets with President Reagan in October, Mitterrand will be faced with a different kind of logic, as confident as his, which consists of reducing all world problems to a single dimension--the Soviet threat. Later, at the Cancun conference in Mexico, he will be in a position to check to what extent his own views coincide with those of President Lopez Portillo and those of the delegations to this international development conference. This will be an initial test for his policy and possibly will be easier than the American visit.

PERTINI OPPOSES PARDONING 'REPENTANT' TERRORISTS

[Text] Rome, 3 Sep (ANSA)--Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini came out today against granting pardons to "repentant" terrorists one week after Premier Giovanni Spadolini's government coalition drafted legislation designed to encourage terrorists to desert their ranks by assuring them special legal treatment.

"There are two groups of people whom I would never pardon," Pertini told LA REPUBBLICA commentator Giorgio Bocca, "drug pushers and terrorists."

"The pardons I grant are for convicts who have served decades in jail on a life sentence," said the 85-year-old Italian president, adding "twenty-five or thirty years in jail are enough to atone for any crime."

"I am familiar with jail life," Pertini noted with reference to the years he spent in jail under Benito Mussolini's fascist dictatorship, "and remorses which come about in jail are not convincing." In a reference to the problem of terrorism in Italy, Pertini stated in no uncertain terms, "if anyone thinks the presidency will take care of the shortcomings and contradictions of others by handing out pardons, he is mistaken."

The government-sponsored legislation calls for giving terrorists who repent for their actions and collaborate with the law in cracking down on guerrillas their freedom and safety in hiding. One of the most controversial innovations of the government bill is designed to give investigating magistrates the power of releasing renegade terrorists during the hearing stage, before the case even comes up for trial.

LAGORIO: COUNTRY CAN REPEL ANY LIBYAN ATTACK

[Text] Rome, 3 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio claimed today that Libya did not have the technological or military power to go through with reprisals against Italy, Greece and Turkey.

"Al-Qadhdhafi's military strength does not qualify him to infer a great deal with respect to Italy and other countries threatened, like Greece and Turkey," Lagorio remarked in an interview published in Milan's IL CORRIERE DELLA SERA today. The most he could do, in Lagorio's opinion, is a demonstrative action pulled off by commando units, special forces trained in Libya for sabotage raids.

The Rome government's defense chief indicated that every Libyan armed forces battalion has such specially trained "special forces" in its ranks. He gave assurances that "Italy would be able to defend itself even from an unconventional, insidious form of attack."

Papers on Al-Qadhdhafi

[Text] Rome, 3 Sep (ANSA)--The five political parties making up Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini's ruling coalition in Rome all discarded today Libyan strongman Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's latest threats as "delirious" and "hysterical" but not without apprehension about the effects the North African leader's policies may have on world peace.

Al-Qadhdhafi's threat to blow up nuclear arsenals in the Mediterranean if the United States tried to "attack" the Gulf of Sidra again drew inflamed reactions from the party newspapers of the five groupings. The Christian Democrat (DC) mouthpiece IL POPOLO called Al-Qadhdhafi's "a delirious challenge." LA VOCE REPUBBLICANA (Republican Party) "the delirium of impotency," the Socialist Party's (PSI) AVANTI "hysterical threats" and the Social Democrat Party's (PSDI) L'UMANITA "hyperbolic threats." The fifth party in the coalition, the small Liberal Party (PLI), does not have a press organ, but its leaders ha[illegible] statements to the same effect.

None of the parties underestimated,however, the danger of Al-Qadhdhafi's speech Monday commemorating the twelfth anniversary of the Libyan revolution.

LA VOCE REPUBBLICANA, the daily of Spadolini's party, voiced the hope that the Soviet Union "would not put world peace in danger for a dish of lentils," an Italian metaphor for money. The paper warned that Al-Qadhdhafi's threats "should not be taken lightly" since "small obsessed (people) often cause unreckonable damage."

The organ of the DC, whose leaders have shaped Italian foreign policy since shortly after World War II, stressed "the extreme correctness" with which the Rome government has handled relations with the Libyan Jamahiriyah. The paper called for "a calm realistic analysis of the situation" in order to shape appropriate "diplomatic actions." Tripoli was openly described by the DC daily as "the recognized epicenter of de-stabilization politics in the past few years."

The PSI newspaper noted that the danger of a clash between the super-powers in the Mediterranean would hardly be averted with "threats and provocations" and stressed the need to "de-fuse the dangerous wandering [as received] mines infesting the (area)." L'UMANITA insisted that, however delirious, the presence of "an irresponsible (leader) who might light the fuse of a third world war, whether acting on his own or for others, was still a problem."

TENSIONS RISE BETWEEN RIVAL IRANIAN GROUPS

[Text] Rome, 3 Sep (ANSA)--Tensions between rival groups of Iranians in Italy were at a peak here today following the anti-Khomeyni occupation earlier this week of Tehran's consulate in Rome.

The Iranian students who took over the office, housed in the Iranian Embassy to the Holy See, for two hours Tuesday morning were questioned by an Italian judge in Rome yesterday. The youths, who belong to the Peykar Muslim protest group and support the leftist opposition Mojahedin organization in Iran, are being held in a Rome jail on indictments for occupying a diplomatic office, kidnap and vandalism. Three Italian defense attorneys were on hand for Wednesday's hearing, during which the students appeared particularly worried about losing their study visas and being forced to return home, either to jail or a firing squad.

Meanwhile, opponents of the ruling Islamic fundamentalist regime filed a libel suit in Rome yesterday against Iranian Embassy spokesman Hassan Ghadiri for his allegation that the Mojahedin had links with the Italian Red Brigades.

Tensions between the rival groups were particularly high in Perugia, site of the Italian university for foreign students. Pro-Khomeyni students set fire to the car of a medical student, Meherdad Sejed Sadighi, a sympathizer of the Mojahedin guerrillas.

VATICAN RADIO QUOTES PRAVDA ON ATHEISM DRIVE

[Excerpt] Vatican City, 3 Sep (ANSA)--The Vatican Radio station today took the unusual step of broadcasting ample extracts from an editorial in the Soviet party daily PRAVDA in which the official Soviet mouthpiece admitted shortcomings in the drive for atheism in some Soviet regions. The passage which the Vatican's programmers found most striking said it would be a mistake to suppose that religious beliefs would disappear "spontaneously under the mere influence of the socialist way of life and technical-scientific progress." According to PRAVDA, whose comment was entitled "Educating Convinced Atheists," "systematic atheist work" was also needed to achieve the extinction of religion.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN EXPLAINS RECOURSE TO UN

[Text] Referring to an article in a newspaper today, the government spokesman explained that the Cyprus problem was not struck off the UN General Assembly agenda last year, but discussion on it was postponed in view of the fact that the intercommunal dialogue was in progress. The spokesman added that the government arrived at this decision after weighing all factors and after listening to the views of the National Council, and that its policy enjoyed the full and unreserved support of the nonaligned contact group.

The spokesman added that the policy which was followed does not constitute concession of rights and said the government will continue in the future to shoulder its responsibilities for the charting of the necessary line for a sound solution of the national problem.

CYPRUS EMBASSY IN LIBYA UNDER CONSIDERATION

NC040747 Nicosia THE CYPRUS WEEKLY in English 4 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] Cyprus is considering setting up an embassy in Tripoli, Libya, and a definite decision is expected to be taken by next year, according to Mr 'Abdallah az-Zubaydi, secretary of the Libyan people's bureau in Nicosia.

Cypriot businessmen, especially clothing manufacturers, have been pressing the government for such a move to facilitate Cyprus exports to Libya, as well as transactions and visits in general.

"The government has assured us that a Cyprus Embassy will be set up by next year", Az-Zubaydi said. A decision could be announced on the occasion of President Kiprianou's visit, on a date to be fixed later.

The possibility of a direct air link between the two countries is also being discussed, Az-Zubaydi said.

He announced other moves to strengthen relations between Libya and Cyprus:

--The ministers of labour and commerce, Mr Stavrinakis and Mr Kittis, will be visiting Libya later this year.

--A Libyan cultural centre will open in Nicosia towards the end of this month.

--A group of 40 Libyan students will be coming to Cyprus to attend the Hotel and Catering Institute in Nicosia.

Az-Zubaydi said Libya would be giving priority to imports from "friendly" Cyprus. Last year Libya imported Cyprus goods worth $15.5 M and has been buying large quantities of Cypriot clothing in the last few months.

Az-Zubaydi, speaking at a press conference to mark the 12th anniversary of the September 1 1969 revolution that brought Colonel al-Qadhdhafi to power, reaffirmed his country's stand for a "united Cyprus, free from foreign troops and bases."

"It is important for us to have a truly independent Cyprus, with the people united. A divided Cyprus would not be in the interest of the area or of Cyprus itself," he said.

The 1969 revolution led to the overthrow of the "reactionary and corrupt" regime under the monarchy and to the dismantling of British and American bases in Libya. Then in 1973 there was the "people's revolution" that transformed the political, economic and social system of the country.

Asked about reports that Libya was spending too much of its oil revenue on armaments, Az-Zubaydi said: "We plan to have the entire population of our country under arms. They will receive training in the use of modern weapons, not just rifles, in order to be able to defend their country. So we have to get everything we need. We cannot have too many weapons."

He spoke of threats and conspiracies by "imperialists" and some neighbouring countries against Libya.

INFORMATION AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH YUGOSLAVIA

[Text] Cyprus and Yugoslavia today signed an agreement at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for cooperation in the field of information. The agreement was signed by Minister to the President Katsellis and by Yugoslav Ambassador Job.

Speaking after the signing of the agreement, Katsellis said the new agreement, as well as the recent agreement for cooperation between the Cyprus and the Yugoslav broadcasting institutions, constitute additional proof of the very close relations between the two countries, as well as of their desire to strengthen these relations in the fields of information still further. In the case of Cyprus, he added, information and communications constitute the most important weapons in our struggle to make our cause known and thus secure support for our efforts to achieve a fair and peaceful Cyprus solution.

In his reply, the Yugoslav ambassador stressed the importance of the new agreement and spoke in favor of a new world information order and of a balanced flow of information between the developed and developing countries.

MITSOTAKIS 'AMAZED' AT AL-QADHDHAFI REMARKS

NC031729 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1700 GMT 3 Sep 81

[Text] Answering questions on the recent statements by Libyan leader Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, according to which Al-Qadhdhafi said he will strike at U.S. bases in Sicily, Greece and Turkey if Libya is attacked in the Gulf of Sidra by the United States, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis stated the following:

We are amazed at the statement and we fail to understand its logic. The allied installations in Greece are of a defensive nature, within the framework of the alliance to which we belong, and within the framework of the foreign policy which our country has been following and which also includes the policy of friendship and cooperation with the Arab world.

Appropriate representations have been made to the director of the Libyan bureau here, who was summoned to the Foreign Ministry.

AKROPOLIS Comment

NC031830 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 3 Sep 81 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "Who Is Acting ?"]

[Text] So Billy Carter's friend and financer Colonel al-Qadhdhafi has more or less threatened that he will sink Crete and that he will not hesitate to provoke...a third world war; and he will do all this if a second U.S. "attack" like that of 19 August happens in the Gulf of Sidra. With bombastic language that reminded us of the renowned Duce. The "Caesar of Libya" released his bombs against all. "We warn the peoples of Sicily, Crete, Turkey and all Mediterranean states that if the United States attacks the Gulf of Sidra again then we shall attack the nuclear arsenals in these countries and create world catastrophe..." Of course his big-mouthed threats were made in safety, when he had already learned a hard lesson from the United States and a "taste" of President Reagan's dynamic policy. The fact is that with the Mediterranean extending toward the Persian Gulf, it has become the hottest sea in the world today. Al-Qadhdhafi is not the only one who has impudently come out "with the sword of Islam" to the sea plowed by the two superpowers, but he is the only one who has believed that he could threaten his Mediterranean neighbors. But he chose the worst way to do so. In his agitating speech the Libyan leader, among other things, said: "Reagan has failed as a film star and is now failing as a president."

Political observers believe that after the defeat Al-Qadhdhafi sustained in the Gulf of Sidra, he realized it is difficult to confront Reagan's political dynamism. Rhetorical attacks are easier. In this particular case the "Colonel of the Desert" is the film star.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS AL-QADHDHAFI REMARKS

[Text] Representations have been made in connection with Libyan chief of state al-Qadhdhafi's statement that if there is a clash between Libya and the United States, Libya would not hesitate to attack U.S. military installations in Turkey, Greece and Western Europe. According to Turkish Radio and Television's correspondent, the secretary of the Libyan people's bureau in Ankara was summoned to the Foreign Ministry today to explain Al-Qadhdhafi's statement.

In a speech marking the 12th anniversary of the Libyan revolution, Al-Qadhdhafi said a clash similar to the one which occurred in the Gulf of Sidra last month could result in an international disaster. In the event of such a clash, Al-Qadhdhafi noted, Libya would not hesitate to attack U.S. military installations in Sicily, Crete, Greece, Turkey and Western Europe.

NATO'S LUNS INTERVIEWED ON AID, NUCLEAR ARMS

[Husni Kaptan interview with NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns--recorded]

[Text] [Question] There is no doubt that a militarily and economically strong and stable Turkey would serve the deterrent aspect of the alliance if one also takes into account the current events in Turkey's region. What are your views on whether the level of efforts and contributions of the member countries on this matter are sufficient?

[Answer--in English with translation superimposed] As you know, the NATO countries took the initiative years ago to extend economic aid to Turkey. The military aid was extended by NATO and the economic aid was extended paticularly by OECD organizations. Since then, Turkey has received large amounts of aid. Unfortunately, during the same period all the Western European countries were the victims of economic stagnation. Certain countries, such as Britain, were forced to adopt economic measures. However, much aid was extended to Turkey, this could have been greater. Turkey now seems to have recovered economically. This of course, pleases the NATO allies. However, I am convinced that financial aid to Turkey will continue.

[Answer] There is no reason to be so worried about reactions in Western public opinion. I would like to point out that NATO's decision to modernize its tactical weapons is intended to develop the defense capabilities of the alliance. It aims to secure peace and, therefore, such reactions are emotional and do not benefit efforts for peace. The governments, on the other hand, are adopting a more positive attitude in this matter.

On Libya, Iran

[Excerpt] Asked to comment on a recent statement by Libyan leader Muammar al-Qadhdhafi, the NATO secretary general expressed the belief that Al-Qadhdhafi's bark was worse than his bite. He added, however, if Libya attempted to carry out his threats, it would be exposing itself to danger. The NATO secretary general noted further there were no American bases in Turkey, but only Americans serving on Turkish bases.

Iran was not a NATO member, Luns pointed out, but added, although developments there were Iran's domestic affair, NATO was still following them closely. If the disturbances [word indistinct] they would constitute a threat to the region, which included Afghanistan and the Gulf countries, and to NATO, he explained.

AUSTRIA

PAHR DISCUSSES PLO, SOUTH AFRICA, HUSAK VISIT

[Report on press conference by Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr on 3 September in Vienna]

[Excerpts] At his press conference, Foreign Minister Pahr took a stance on three current issues of international politics. First, he commented on the consequences of the attack on the Jewish center in Vienna. Since it was proved that the PLO was not connected with the attack, Pahr said, there will be no negative consequences for Austria-PLO relations. The appointment of a new PLO representative, made necessary when the former representative Ghazi Husayn was recalled in connection with the arms smuggling affair, will not be delayed, Pahr said. He added that to date, however, the Palestinians have not named anyone.

As far as Austria's relations with Israel are concerned, Pahr said: The dispute, the discussion with Israel--I hope--is over. You know that we have rejected this protest but that we have noted that these various statements by Israeli politicians are not to be regarded as the official opinion of the Israeli Government. You also know that I have told the Israeli ambassador very clearly that I regard it as rather regrettable that this dreadful attack--against Austrians, in Austria--was turned by Israel, by Israeli politicians, into a cause for launching polemics and a campaign against Austria and Austrian politicians.

Pahr reaffirmed Austria's condemnation of South Africa's invasion of Angola. Austria, Pahr said, would have liked a tougher stand by the world Security Council--there, as you know, the demand for sanctions against South African was blocked by a U.S. veto.

In conclusion, Pahr said, regarding the planned visit to Austria by CSSR chief of state Husak this fall, that a decision would be made by mid-September and that it would depend on a number of conditions on which the three Austrian political parties had reached agreement. He said: We have agreed to study this question in mid-September, in light of the development of relations between Austria and the CSSR. That includes not only humanitarian questions, not only questions of human rights, but also other issues such as border crossing procedures and nuclear powerplants close to our border. Whether the visit should take place at this or at some other time will be assessed in light of these aspects. But let me add one thing to preclude any possibility of misunderstanding: Visits on a high and the highest level not only serve to sing one another's praise, but they primarily serve the purpose of discussing conflicts and problems. In other words, we are not pursuing only a course of good weather diplomacy but contacts are particularly important and valuable when there are conflicts and disputes.

FOREIGN MINISTERS STRESS INITIATIVE ON AFGHANISTAN

[Text] London, 6 Sep (AFP)--European Economic Community (EEC) foreign ministers today stuck with their proposal last July for a two-phase international conference on Afghanistan, intended to obtain the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

In a separate move, the ministers agreed in principal to strengthen political cooperation by creating a permanent three-diplomat team to assure continuity in this realm. But the ministers, who met at Brocket Hall in suburban London, stopped short of setting up a more structured, formal secretariat to handle these matters.

On the Afghan question, British Foreign Office spokesman Nicholas Fenn said the EEC foreign ministers agreed over the weekend to maintain previous positions during UN General Assembly debates later this month.

He said the EEC would seek a firm resolution at the United Nations, designed to bring international support for its position. He also pointed out that British Foreign Minister Lord Carrington will meet with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko in New York.

In July, Moscow and Kabul in effect rejected the EEC plan, noting that it involved the Kabul regime in only the second stage, not the first. In the second stage, Afghan rebel representatives would also be involved.

Mr Fenn said that the goal of the European initiative was also to continue expressing international discontent over the presence of Soviet troops in Afghanistan.

Referring to the effort to improve political cooperation, Mr Fenn said that the three diplomats' efforts would bring a modest improvement in these matters. He said the agreement in principle to form the team would go before a EEC meeting in London in mid-October.

He said the three diplomats will come from the two countries previously holding the chairmanship of the Community and the present office holder. They will have their headquarters in the country serving out the six-month chairmanship.

The move resulted from a British proposal to deepen political collaboration and perfect the instruments for it, he said.

The ministers also discussed the following matters, according to Mr Fenn:

--They noted with interest the Saudi plan put foward on August 8 for a settlement of the Middle East situation, which Mr Fenn said included numerous points in common with the EEC initiative in this regard.

--They discussed Poland's third request for aid, and reached a general consensus that food shipments could be sent without demanding in advance a cash payment of five per cent of the shipments' value. There were however reservations in some delegations, born of concern about the size of Poland's foreign debt, put at more than 25,000 million dollars.

--French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson also presented the Franco-Mexican position in favor of recognizing the political importance of Salvadoran leftists--a stand that was coolly received by Washington and criticized by a number of South American countries.

Mr Fenn also said that there was a short informal discussion between Lord Carrington and Irish Foreign Minister Jim Dodge on Northern Ireland.

SCHMIDT REAFFIRMS COMMITMENT TO U.S. ALLIANCE

[Text] Bonn, 4 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Schmidt regards the restoration of the military equilibrium between the blocs as an "absolutely necessary condition for peace in Europe." In an interview with Danish TV today, the chancellor said that "some people in the SPD" have become irritated "by exaggerated utterances" coming out of the United States. But the alliance with the United States will continue to be an "indispensable necessity", and not only for the Federal Republic. However, this does not mean that there must be agreement on all questions. Schmidt warned against the illusion that U.S.-Soviet negotiations on arms control might produce "results by next Easter."

Regarding international economic developments, Schmidt thought that a lowering of U.S. interest rates, which could have a favorable effect on the world economy, is "still some months away."

BAHR DEMANDS FRG SAY ON U.S. MILITARY EQUIPMENT

[Text] Bonn, 6 Sep (DPA)--Egon Bahr, in an interview with the trade union paper METALL, has demanded the Federal Government's right to have a say in the equipment of U.S. troops stationed in the Federal Republic. However, the SPD politician granted that the United States, in purely legal terms, could deploy any weapon in the FRG as it saw fit, including the neutron weapon. Nevertheless, Bahr emphasized that he thought it was politically impossible for "former occupiers to fall back on the occupation statute or to believe that it could be revived." The United States and the Federal Republic had become partners.

According to Bahr, the Federal Republic's political and economic responsibility has grown, but its right to self-determination regarding the use of nuclear arms has not grown at all. This is unsatisfactory in the long run. For this reason, the issue of the Federal Republic's political participation prior to a possible confrontation between the two nuclear powers would have to be minutely examined. "We have the unrelinquishable right to codetermine the question of our existence."

The text of the interview was prereleased to DPA by the paper on Sunday.

APEL DISCUSSES AUSTERITY PROGRAM EFFECTS

DW071245 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1710 GMT 6 Sep 81

[Reporter B. H. Hauser interview with Defense Minister Dr Hans Apel in the program "Bonn Perspectives"--recorded]

[Answer] Certainly not. One thing is clear, however. We will be able to carry on only with strictest economization measures. We can finance the great procurement projects with the current economic means. If fuel prices don't increase too much, we will be able to buy about the same quantity of fuel as this year. But many desirable and also necessary things cannot be financed and must be forgotten.

[Question] Can you guarantee that you will be able to make both ends meet with the available money or must one expect a supplementary budget?

[Answer] In coordination with the finance minster, we were reckoning with an average exchange rate of DM2.39 for $1 wherever we have to make our payments in dollars. Originally, we had reckoned with a much lower exchange rate. We reckoned with mid-August gasoline prices. As regards the Tornado fighter plane, we reckoned with a price level of mid-1982. We made provisions wherever we could. But naturally, nobody knows how the exchange rate of the dollar and gasoline prices will develop.

[Answer] We economized considerably this year. Just keep in mind what economization measures must take place during the exercises in the next 3 months. The economization process has set in strongly in the Bundeswehr this year and it will be continued next year.

[Question] Must one expect division of labor among individual branches of the armed forces of the alliance to save money?

[Answer] Such a debate is certainly necessary for the alliance, but it will not lead to economization measures. Our armed forces branches are being "renovated" as we call it. There will be new frigates, tanks and planes. This indicates that such a project is a long term project which will have an effect in the 1990's at the earliest.

[Question] A final question: Can you stand your ground in the alliance with the 1982 defense budget?

[Answer] I am firmly convinced that I can. It is important for our alliance partners that we have continued to develop the new structure of our field army, that we will have gasoline--not much but enough--always under the prerequisite that gasoline prices will not explode and that the new generation of arms can be financed. Gaps will remain with regard to research and in other fields. But if one must economize everywhere, last but not least due to the high interest rates set by America, we must also economize.

[Answer] I listen to it and I will answer it. One answer is quite obvious: We have an army of conscripts representing a particularly high defense value not just because of the reservists involved. A professional army creates considerably different grave problems. You see, one argument follows the other.

EQUIPMENT, PERSONNEL REDUCED FOR MANEUVERS

[Excerpt] Ulm, 7 Sep (DPA)--A Bundeswehr spokesman announced today that, in connection with the Federal Republic's economy measures, 800 soldiers, 150 vehicles and 50 guns less than orginally planned will be used in the Bundeswehr's largest maneuver this year, "Sharp Blades," which will be held from 14-18 September in southern Germany. In addition, a number of smaller exercises on transporting damaged equipment will be cancelled. These cuts were ordered after consulting with the inspector of the army because of restricted funds due to drastically increased fuel costs.

REPORTAGE ON BAHR-HONECKER TALKS IN EAST BERLIN

Spokesman's Reaction

LD041848 Hamburg DPA in German 1748 4 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 4 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government regards the talk between Bahr and Honecker as a further sign that the GDR, despite the known difficulties, intends to continue the dialogue, a Federal Government spokesman said in Bonn tonight. Apart from that, Bahr being accompanied by Boelling was "quite a normal procedure."

Bahr Interview

DW071325 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1810 GMT 4 Sep 81

[East Berlin correspondent Fritz Pleitgen interview with SPD Bundestag Deputy Egon Bahr; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Egon Bahr coordinated his East Berlin visit with the chancellor's office, the Foreign Ministry and the SPD leadership. Bonn's permanent representative in the GDR, Klaus Boelling, also took part in today's talks. The exploratory talks are not a secret affair and not some bold action of Egon Bahr. Did the talk encourage you with regard to an improvement in German-German relations?

[Answer] I believe at any rate that the will exists--as far as it is possible with regard to the limited power of both states--to see to it that relations will not deteriorate but improve if possible. We do not sit on an island and we depend, naturally, on general developments between the East and the West. I think improvement is possible within this framework.

Security Concerns Noted

[Text] [No dateline received] In an interview on "Heute-Journal" of ZDF television, Egon Bahr tonight referred to the Federal Republic's and GDR's common security concerns. The GDR on account of its geographic situation, just like the Federal Republic, is interested in the avoidance of a conflict between the military blocs. There can be no unilateral security.

According to Bahr, the room to maneuver by the two German states is greatest when relations between the United States and Soviet Union are determined by a prodetente attitude. In the opposite situation or if there was a possible conflict between the great powers, the respective leading powers would give the orders and "all others would listen and, if need be, die." Between these two extremes, it would have to be the objective of the two German states to make use of the remaining latitude.

The SPD politician emphasized that he had heard new views and arguments during his talks.

BECKER SAYS SCHMIDT-HONECKER SUMMIT EXPECTED

[Text] Bonn, 7 Sep (DPA)--Like GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker, the Federal Government firmly expects a summit meeting to be held soon between the SED leader and Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in the GDR, Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told the press in Bonn today. Preparations, however, are not yet underway for such a meeting.

Moreover, Becker endorsed Bonn's view that the date of the chancellor's visit to the GDR would probably be after Soviet state leader Leonid Brezhnev's visit to Bonn scheduled for the end of November. The government spokesman once again drew attention to the view of the chancellor and Federal Government that there were no preconditions for an intra-German summit. The recent correspondence between Schmidt and Honecker has not changed this. At the same time, however, Becker stressed the Federal Government's view that relations between the two German states have been placed under a strain as a result of the increase in the minimum compulsory exchange rates and that this subject should be included in the issues to be discussed. SED leader Honecker was informed of the Federal Government's attitude.

Federal minister for intra-German relations, Egon Franke said that a meeting between Schmidt and Honecker before the end of this year would make sense. In an interview with Deutschlandfunk, Franke said that the question of minimum exchange rates for Western visitors is an important topic. In Franke's view, the GDR currently is trying to broaden its scope for more talks.

LEADERS COMMENT ON BUDGET TALKS, COALITION

Schmidt Interview

[Reporter Heinz Metlitzky interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn on 3 September--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, you are in such a good mood this afternoon. It is certainly not just due to the blue sky over Bonn. Is the result of the talks such that you, your party and the trade unions could be in the same happy mood?

[Answer] Nobody will be happy, but I have a very clear conscience.

[Question] Did you give more in order to stay in the government than did your governing partner?

[Answer] I consider that an improper question--a question that certainly has been asked by journalists in past weeks and that has been answered, unfortunately, by politicians from both government parties. It is not a matter of somebody gaining or yielding more or abandoning some pet projects. There are people on both sides--more as well as less important people--who must abandon some of the pet projects they have been advocating in public. We agreed that we will jointly implement those matters on which we jointly agree.

[Answer] As you have phrased it, I cannot give an unambiguous answer to this question. There is no guarantee that all the measures will have a positive effect by next spring and summer. Oil prices come from outside and the interest rate increases come from outside--from America. Rates are 4 - 4.5 percent higher in America, France and Italy than in our country. If they should increase there, ours will go up somewhat too. That will have a negative effect on our economic development. If that happens, we might have to look at the whole matter once again and make new decisions. Guarantees do not exist. But I am most certain that the coalition will emerge strengthened by the decisions that have been made today.

[Question] You are certainly aware that your personal relations with Mr Genscher have been called in question after these negotiations. Is there something to this from your point of view?

[Answer] I would clearly say no.

[Question] The coalition has left disputed problems out, with notations to that effect, in the protocol of the Council of Ministers. Does this mean that if these disputed problems have to be discussed again, we must count on greater difficulties?

[Answer] If they are brought up by one side or the other, it will certainly not be a simple matter. A coalition always has internal difficulties, even if one party has a Bundestag majority. Don't think that such decisions have been achieved without large disputes in just one of the government parties. Different opinions exist now in the FDP as well as the SPD on various problems.

SPD-FDP Officials

[Excerpts] Hamburg, 6 Sep (DPA)--A few days after the cabinet compromise on the savings measures for the 1982 federal budget, these planned measures are being increasingly criticized from within the SPD and clear doubts about the continuation of the SPD/FDP coalition are being expressed.

SPD leader Willy Brandt said at a SPD regional meeting in Nordenham, Lower Saxony, on Sunday that he could not guarantee that the coalition would last until 1984.

Meanwhile, FDP General Secretary Guenter Verheugen accused the SPD on Saturday of having answered factual arguments with personal attacks on FDP politicians. The FDP leader, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, admonished the coalition partners on Saturday to get down to business again.

In the words of Brandt, the FDP stretched to the limit what was possible in the budget discussions. He, too, was not satisfied with the budget compromises, but there had been no alternative. Although it was worth many sacrifices not to let the responsibility for the government in Bonn slip away, the limit of Social Democratic self-respect had been reached, he said. The SPD has the good will to keep the coalition going, but "if it collapses" there should be no doubt as to who is responsible.

Press Reaction

[From the press review]

[Text] FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE writes: The leaderships of both coalition parties, the SPD and the FDP, have made it clear this weekend: The austerity agreement, as patchwork-like as it may be, cannot be changed any more. Too many efforts were involved and the political consciousness, worried about the agreement of the voters, has been strained too much. The SPD and the FDP indicated clearly that if any party wants to make changes to its advantage, the coalition would be endangered, which would be the worst. It is a coalition where both parties can have one most beautiful experience: the ability to continue ruling.

HESSISCHE-NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel states: The social-liberal community is facing its most severe test and it looks as if not enough glue can be found in the whole republic to patch up the rifts in a lasting way. The cabinet's sealing the decisions will not end the quarrel at all. On the contrary, the compromise created the longing in wide sections of the SPD to march back into the opposition. The SPD must either live with the liberals or give up. The SPD is at the crossroad.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG is of a different opinion: One must not be a prophet to be able to predict that the Social Democrats will give in again. Some of them will complain loudly and almost all of them will clench their fist in their pockets, but nothing will be changed any more. There will be a week of displeasure and many Social Democrats will realize that they have been condemned by their party leadership to help the preservation of power.

ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz writes: Basically, just the following problem is involved: Will the Bonn consolidation concept just channel financial streams to the economy or will social power be simultaneously "returned to private ownership?" If that were so, Willy Brandt's vision of the Social-Liberal alliance coming to an end prior to 1984 could soon become reality. The heated discussions in the SPD, but not just there, make one fear that the forceps delivery of Bonn's austerity concept will be followed by a long afterbirth.

BREMER NACHRICHTEN notes: If a prize existed for the most miserable public relations work, the still existing SPD-FDP coalition in Bonn would have won it. The fact is worth mentioning in this connection that the coalition parties are able to shoot each other from the saddle and that they are not forced by a strong opposition to give up. The opposition continues to maintain restraint, looking on how the SPD and the FDP pull the carpet from under each other.

SCHMIDT: NO BIGGER EC CONTRIBUTION SHARE

[Text] Bonn, 4 Sep (AFP)--West Germany is prepared to remain the major contributor to the European Community's budget for the foreseeable future but its payments must not grow any bigger, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has said.

His remarks, in an interview given a week ago to Danish television during a visit to Denmark, were released here only today.

Mr Schmidt declared: "It is not true that we want to pay less...We would like only not to have to pay more each year."

He recalled that in 1980 Germany contributed 5,000 million marks (2,000 million dollars) to the Community budget, and that this would reach 6,500 million marks this year. If the trend continued, the payment next year would be 8,500 million dollars.

FRG URGES SOUTH AFRICA TO WITHDRAW FROM ANGOLA

[Text] Bonn, 7 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government today called on South Africa again in the strongest terms to withdraw immediately from Angola. The Federal Government is "dismayed" that its 26 August appeal for South Africa's withdrawal has not been successful. Despite this and other international warnings, South Africa is still maintaining "considerable troop units" in southern Angola.

"The Federal Government notes this with dismay and strongly urges the government in Capetown to immediately end this absolutely unacceptable violation of the sovereignty of a neighboring country," stated foreign office spokesman [name indistinct] at a federal press conference in Bonn.

GENSCHER MEETS WITH DJIBOUTI FOREIGN MINISTER

[Text] Bonn, 4 Sep (DPA)--The tensions in the Horn of Africa region were at the center of an extensive talk between Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and the foreign affairs and cooperation minister of Djibouti, Moumin Bahdon Farah, at the Foreign Ministry today.

The two foreign ministers agreed on the difficulties posed by the "presence of a great foreign power in Ethiopia," which has hampered solving the problems. Genscher and Moumin Bahdon Farah thus referred to efforts by the Soviet Union to establish bases in that region.

Diplomatic circles underlined the clear pro-Western foreign policy of the small and strategically very important Republic of Djibouti, which gained independence only in 1977.

MUNICH PAPER EYES U.S. MILITARY BUDGET CUTS

DW021057 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 2 Sep 81 p 4

[Commentary signed Th.: "Reagan's Armament Budget Cuts"]

[Text] President Reagan's economic policy, correct in its aims and setup, contains two considerable risks, mainly in that there is a certain radical change of course. In 1 or 2 years, Reagan could face a new socially explosive situation in the country if the economic motor, ignited by tax reductions, budget cuts and a positive change of mood, has not properly sped up the economy. Then those fruits of the economic boom, which could more than offset the consequences of cutting $35 billion, would be missing, particularly from social expenditures.

Whether the desired upswing takes place will depend on the cuts in the arms program. Amazingly enough, the presidential advisers seem to have realized this only now. The arms program of $1.6 trillion over the next 5 years has such enormous dimensions that more seems to be at stake than just the balanced budget promised by Reagan. This strong armament action would tie up many finances, raw materials and experts. The American private economy has shown concern for quite some time about such reduction in the availability of resources. A recent Wall Street weakness was the first overt expression of such concern.

The landslide of Reagan's armament billions would bury efforts aimed at stabilizing the dollar through high interest rates, particularly since arms have no effect on the market. It is, therefore, most likely that U.S. Defense Secretary Weinberger will experience cuts in his budget--some $20 - $30 billion in 1982 and $75 billion in the two following years. The NATO partners, who all have their financial problems and who are being pressured by Weinberger, may look on this with some pleasure.

Criticizes Reagan Policy

[Commentary signed Jr: "Reagan's Urgent Invitation"]

[Text] The determination of the Americans not to take any nonsense any more--neither from the Russians, from Khomeyni or the European allies--was the main force that brought Ronald Reagan to the White House. The U.S. President has made little decisions while in office, but it is nevertheless not difficult for him to make his voters feel content with his promises to reestablish America's greatness and superiority. The helplessness and humilation experienced during Carter's presidency have hit the Americans so hard that Reagan probably will be able to rule with promising words instead of action.

In the tough world of realities, however, intentions look quite different. The daring arithmetic aimed at an enormous increase of defense expenditures simultaneously with tax cuts--this calculation does not seem to work. It cannot work, even if cuts in the social field are made, if the deficit is not balanced by newly printed money. Secretary of Defense Weinberger is also expected to economize now; it is being said that his budget will be cut by $30 billion. It seems that the arms race is laboriously starting on the American side, while Reagan is warning the Soviets against becoming involved in it because they would be the losers, saying that "a new chip is on the table."

Let us assume that America's science and economy could stand such competition; the problem is, however, what other problems would ensue. George Kennan maintained for a long time that both superpowers are ruining themselves through the arms race, making their societies unstable--but they have not realized it yet. Reagan did not want his warning vis-a-vis Moscow to be considered a threat; in such a case, his Chicago speech can only have been an urgent invitation to take part in negotiations.

COMMENTATOR SAYS BREZHNEV WANTS TO MEET REAGAN

[Commentary signed Rm.: "Seeing Schmidt First"]

[Text] Brezhnev is seeking a meeting with Reagan. Since the end of the Stalin era, the Soviet leaders have wanted to become personally acquainted with Western world leaders. This world is foreign to them and they fear they will miscalculate unless they know from their own experience how Western statesmen react in talks. Moreover, the Soviet leaders want to use the opportunity to shock the American President and made him feel insecure. Khrushchev succeeded in doing this with young Kennedy. Brezhnev's chances are not that good with regard to Reagan--but why not try it?

But that lies still in the future. Brezhnev's visit to Bonn is closer. Moscow has just roughly attacked Schmidt and Genscher. PRAVDA reports that the party chief is adhering to his travel plans. Is that surprising? No, it is natural. Brezhnev expects a concession from Bonn just for talking with Schmidt and Genscher in a normal tone and he is particularly hoping to encourage the FRG "peace movement" which he likes very much. Let us wait and see whether the "peace friends" will organize a torchlight parade for him.

COLUMNIST VIEWS POLITICAL EFFECT OF MANEUVERS

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Maneuver Time"]

[Text] Military maneuvers are taking place in the East and in the West. Such large exercises are prepared for many months in advance. No side is surprised by them. But whenever the maneuvers begin, they have a political effect. It isn't only due to the fact that the moving of army units, naval units and air force squadrons makes one's fantasy work: a connection with war is established subconsciously. Times are turbulent. The concentration of more than 100,000 Russian active soldiers and reservists in Belorussia cannot serve as merely a test of the Red Army's preparedness for action. Like the Red Fleet, operating off the Lithuanian coast, the troops could also be directed toward Poland within a very short time. A political and a psychological mission are, therefore, hidden behind the military mission. It is, therefore, good that the West can also use military power as a psychostrategic means. The series of "Autumn Forge" maneuvers keeps the political and military balance stable in Europe for months.

PRESIDENT MITTERRAND COMMENTS ON ARMS SALES

[Text] London, 8 Sep (AFP)--French President Francois Mitterrand said in an interview with the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) that he does not think that at the moment there was a leader anywhere in the world mad enough to take the risk of an atomic war.

In the interview to be broadcast tonight, Mr Mitterrand stressed that "the entire world" should be aware of his intention at all times to seek peace, but the world must also know that he was prepared to accept his responsibilities.

Asked about French arms sales abroad--France is the world's third largest arms manufacturer after the United States and the Soviet Union--he said that France would "carry out" all current contracts. He noted that the French Army could not be equipped with modern weapons if France did not have a flourishing arms export market. He pointed out that, in any case, if France dropped its overseas arms sales its place would be quickly filled by "the United States, the Soviet Union and many others."

Asked about the developing countries, he said that the general policy of the United States showed no commitment to the Third World, and only seemed interested when it came to military strategy. In this regard he gave South Africa as an example, saying Washington was getting closer to Pretoria without caring too much about what was going on in the rest of the black continent. He said that the United States was thinking more of military might than the world economic problem.

Asked about how he viewed Britain on the eve of the British-French summit on September 10-11, he said that he respected Britain's role in World War II. He was struck by the energy, character and temperament of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, but considered that her understanding of the world and society was a long way from his own. While he thought she was mistaken, he realised that she was English and had to work in England while he was French and had to work in France.

The interview was conducted by leading French journalist Olivier Todd.

DEFENSE MINISTRY DENIES PLANES FIRED ON BY LIBYA

[Text] Paris, 6 Sep (AFP)--The Defense Ministry today denied a Paris newspaper report that a French reconnaissance plane had been attacked by Libyan fighter jets off the disputed Gulf of Sidra, where United States jets shot down two Libyan aircraft last month.

The denial was in response to a story in the JOURNAL DU DIMANCHE, which said two Libyan SU-22 fighters attacked a French Breguet-Atlantic reconnaissance plane "after a short chase." The newspaper gave no date for the alleged incident.

Two Libyan SU-22 fighters were shot down on August 19 by two U.S. F-14 jets that were attacked during maneuvers over the Gulf of Sidra, which Libya claims as part of its territorial waters.

GOVERNMENT PLEDGES AID TO POOREST COUNTRIES

NC041144 Paris AFP in English 1123 GMT 4 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 4 Sep (AFP)--France today became the first major Western industrialized nation to plan to allocate 0.15 percent of its gross national product by 1985 to aid for the world's 31 poorest countries.

French Finance Minister Jacques Delors made the announcement during debates at the first-ever United Nations conference on the least developed countries (LDC).

The 0.15 target figure is one of the key demands, put forward by the Group of 77 (developing countries), for improving aid to the world's most destitute nations. According to the latest U.N. figures, only the Scandinavian countries and the Netherlands have met the suggested target figure.

The United States, West Germany and Japan are among the richest countries which, according to conference sources, are reportedly against setting specific aid targets and Canada has warned that such sub-targets would not make any practical sense in certain circumstances.

For 1981, France would increase its aid to the 31 to 0.10 percent of the French GNP, an increase of 30 percent over the past three years, Mr Delors said.

Mr Delors said that there would also be an increase in the quality of French aid.

He reiterated his government's concern over the effects on the world economy of the "brutal and massive" increases in U.S. interest rates and the rise in the dollar, comparing their effects on the two previous oil crises.

"There is no individual solution to the crises," Mr Delors said, and urged the international community to commit itself to a "vast contract of solidarity" to help the 280 million people living in the least developed countries.

Meanwhile, West German Cooperation Minister Rainer Offergeld warned that his country could not continue to increase at past rates to the LDC due to economic difficulties, but said that overall development aid would be increased. Noting that West Germany was at present the biggest aid giver to the LDC, Mr Offergeld said he hoped that oil exporting countries and industrialized socialist countries would increase their aid efforts to the world's most destitute nations.

L'HUMANITE REPORTS CEAUSESCU-GREMETZ MEETING

PM071549 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 29 Aug 81 p 5

[Text] Romanian Communist Party General Secretary Nicolae Ceausescu had a meeting 27 August with PCF Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz who is visiting Romania at the Romanian Communist Party Central Committee's invitation. Maxime Gremetz handed Nicolae Ceausescu a message from Georges Marchais.

During the meeting, the two interlocutors expressed satisfaction at the good relations existing between the two parties and expressed the hope that they and French-Romanian cooperation will be extended.

The meeting, which took place in a warm atmosphere, gave Nicolae Ceausescu and Maxime Gremetz a new opportunity to firmly advocate the need to halt the arms race and, in particular, the production of the neutron bomb and the deployment of new nuclear missiles and weapons on the European continent and throughout the world.

POLL SHOWS CONFIDENCE IN SOCIALIST LEADERS

[Text] Paris, 4 Sep (AFP)--Most French people still have confidence in their newly-elected Socialist leaders despite a fall-off in support over the past month, according to a poll published by the LE FIGARO MAGAZINE.

The poll, conducted by the SOFRES Institute at the end of August, showed that 62 per cent of those polled believed that President Francois Mitterrand was doing a good job--down from 71 per cent in July.

But the previous poll was taken in the balmy post-election days just after Mr Mitterrand's Socialists swept into power, and the new poll followed publication of mounting inflation and unemployment figures.

Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy also fared well--68 per cent of those surveyed felt he was doing a good job.

All recent polls have ranked Mr Mauroy at the head of politicians the French would like to see play a major role in the future, ahead of Planning Minister Michel Rocard, a popular figure who last year was seen as a possible challenger for the presidency.

COLOMBO COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH LIBYA

[Text] Rome, 8 Sep (ANSA)--Italian foreign minister Emilio Colombo has denied that tensions in the Mediterranean were at the point of crisis and confirmed that the Rome government wanted "loyal and good" relations with Libya. "It is improper to speak of a crisis," said the Italian diplomatic chief in a televised interview Monday night, "and we hope we'll never have to speak of one, even if there are some tensions."

Colombo, who discussed recent developments in the Mediterranean with his EEC partners in informal talks in London over the weekend, said the European Ten had a unified stand on the issue. Bilateral relations between Italy and Libya were said to be developing well in economic and trade terms. On a political level, Colombo stressed, Italy wants to keep up "a loyal and positive" relationship, stemming from frank explanations.

On East-West relations, Colombo complained that it was not fair "to talk about peace and disarmament in unilateral or instrumental terms...just to accuse the other side of not wanting peace." The Rome government's stand, he stressed, was based on a "two-way, simultaneous quest for security and dialogue."

The Italian diplomatic chief gave an account of his talks in London with French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson on the "wine war" going on between the two countries. Both sides, he said, realized that a perpetration of the present situation was bad for their countries.

LIBYAN ENVOY EXPLAINS AL-QADHDHAFI'S STATEMENTS

[Text] Rome, 5 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Foreign Ministry protest against what was perceived here as a threat to Italy launched by Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi on September 1 was based on an incomplete and garbled text of Al-Qadhdhafi's (El Taggazi). [as received] The Libyan leader's speech was reported to have contained a threat to bomb nuclear arsenals in Sicily, Crete and Turkey and thereby trigger an international nuclear catastrophe if the United States again attacked the Gulf of Sidra, the scene of the August 19 American-Libyan air clash.

In an interview slated for publication in the Monday edition of the Italian weekly, ESPRESSO, (El Taggazi) said, "the leader's speech was misunderstood. He threatened no one, much less Italy, which we consider a friendly country. "The Italian Foreign Ministry protest," the chief of Libyan diplomacy in Italy continued, "was based on an incomplete and confused text of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's speech."

According to the ambassador, Al-Qadhdhafi was seeking to make other Mediterranean countries aware of a real danger and warned them of what would happen if American or NATO bases were used against Libya. There was "no reference to retaliation against Italian territory" El Taggazi insisted and added, "I repeat, we are interested in maintaining good relations with Italy, which we see as one of the countries most highly involved in settling the serious problems in the Middle East and guaranteeing peace in the Mediterranean.

"For this reason," the ambassador concluded, "we were surprised when, following the aggression over the Gulf of Sidra, the American pilots held a press conference aboard the USS Nimitz at anchor in Italian territorial waters."

BALSEMAO, EANES ADDRESS SWEARING-IN CEREMONY

LD050437 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 4 Sep 81

[Text] Dear listeners, the swearing-in ceremony of the eighth constitutional government took place at Ajuda Palace. It ended a few moments ago and was presided over by the head of state. The head of the eighth constitutional government, Dr Pinto Balsemao, began his speech:

[Begin recording] At every moment in the life of the state, the Portuguese are entitled to know its exact condition and the reasons behind the actions of those who govern them. The first duty of those who carry out a mandate on their behalf is to speak the language of truth, the only language compatible with a policy that is also a policy of truth, capable of defining and consolidating the democratic regine.

I would like therefore on this occasion to throw some light on the extent of the government change taking place today in the aftermath of the end of the previous cabinet resulting from the resignation I saw fit to tender to the president. The program of this government, supported by a majority vote of the assembly, was not then in question and the government solidarity reaffirmed once again by the Council of Ministers with regard to my decision to ask, under the terms of the constitution, to be relieved of my duties as prime minister, was never weakened or blurred either. Nor can any doubt be cast on the dedication and lofty sense of national interest displayed by all members of the previous government. I wish to emphasize that here and now. And at the same time, I wish to recall particularly the competent action taken in priority spheres for the Portuguese, such as that taken in the fields of financial and foreign policies and European integration on the one hand and in social and labor policies on the other.

The government now being installed in office is taking up the legacy of the two administrations that preceded it over the last 2 years, with the resolve of a government starting a new stage along the same road, committed to the same political program that lay at the root of the creation of the Democratic Alliance and received the vote of a clear majority of the Portuguese people in the 1979 and 1980 elections.

The real reason for the government crisis that this installation in office has now definitevely overcome lay in the awareness of the fact that, with the country needing and expecting the implementation of the Democratic Alliance election program, it did not seem right that doubts of any kind should exist about the firmness of the commitment of all the alliance's members to the alliance's government.

In strictly formal terms, the political confidence of the president and of the assembly suffice to ensure the constitutional survival of any government, but in terms of substance, the government needs the clear, unequivocal and constant political support of all those politically committed in the eyes of the Portuguese people to the program pledged by the government.

My attitude, based on ethical criteria by which politics must always be guided, prompted a thorough rethinking and debate about these matters and was caused by the need to protect the efficiency and credibility of the government for the implementation of a courageous program of renewal for the effective transformation of Portuguese society.

We have gone deeper into the alliance's program. The other leaders of the Democratic Alliance are now more directly involved in government activity. The government now taking office comprises a set of personalities of recognized ability and prestige. These facts alone are the best evidence that the delay has been worthwhile because the Portuguese can now decidedly count on a sounder and more stable political solution for the future. This government is, from the outset, in a better position to change Portugal. [end recording]

Dr Pinto Balsemao then continued his speech with a reference to the main guidelines on which the government's program is based. Describing them as evident, the Democratic Alliance, he said, remains faithful to the often reaffirmed ideals of structural change and liberation of civilian society from the often stifling tutelage of the state, of speedier economic development and greater social justice, of promotion of cultural, scientific and technological progress, of integration in Europe--to which we belong--of regional autonomy in the Azores and Madeira and of administrative decentralization.

The implementation of part of this project, Pinto Balsemao said, entails the participation of other sovereign organs, namely, the assembly which is the most appropriate body for the revision, without excessive delays, of the constitution, so as to make it consistent with our country's essential and permanent conditions and also to promote the subordination of the armed forces to the democratically elected political power. Bearing in mind this latter goal, the government has amalgamated the functions of deputy prime minister and minister of defense in order to enhance their availability for the drafting of legislation appropriate for the transition which, he said, one hopes will quickly take place. The assembly, he stressed, is the appropriate organ for the definition of a legislative framework propitious to the recovery of the Portuguese economy and the revitalization of the initiative of the citizens and their representative bodies in the economic, educational, professional and social spheres.

Further on, the head of government said that the government that has now been installed rests on three principles which he defined as follows. It wants, first, to promote economic recovery; second, to improve the social situation; third, to implement decentralization.

In this news bulletin, we also give coverage to statements made by the president. In his speech, Gen Ramalho Eanes stated.

[Begin recording] The events which have taken place over the 8 months following the installation of the previous government have not substantially changed the electoral imperatives and formal conditions on which the expression of my political confidence in Your Excellency was based, allowing you to take up the post and assume the responsibilities of head of government. In spite of the current crisis and the effect it naturally had on public opinion, no new political conditions have formally emerged.

There is at present a coalition of parties ensuring a parliamentary majority and no political shift decisive for the continuation of the government or likely to call into question this parliamentary majority and its support for the cabinet has occurred. Having examined the political alternatives put forward, I took the view that there were no grounds to resort to elections. I therefore reiterate what I said to you 8 months ago when I outlined the reasons for my institutional solidarity with you, a solidarity on which you can always count and which you will continue to receive in the continuation of your work as prime minister; I reiterate what I said then, convinced that you will perform your duties with respect for the democratic relationship among the sovereign organs and committed to the defense of the established legality.

Few changes in formal political realities have occurred over the last few months. However, some negative aspects of our political life have continued to manifest themselves and have hindered the full realization of the national potential. Signs persist that politics has not improved in terms of quality and efficacy and that its main task of creating and consolidating conditions for progress and understanding among the Portuguese remains unfulfilled.

Many and varied reasons have prevented the reversal of the worsening of concrete problems that are becoming chronic and are blocking the expectations of broad social groups. This has served to reinforce our historical habit of resorting to individualistic solutions and schemes that fail to consider the national interest and favor the proliferation of pressure groups that erode the state and threaten democracy.

These are not new facts but they are nevertheless grave. We must recognize in full conscience that many of the promises and demands of democracy have so far gone unfulfilled. We have wasted time on minor issues and have allowed hopes and enthusiasm to die out. We must recognize that the encouragement created by electoral promises has not yet been translated into concrete political achievements which are only possible through the conscious commitment of all Portuguese.

It is useful for electoral propaganda to clearly show the differences among the various political tendencies and for its exaggerated manner to define their most important traits in a way that makes the electorate's choice clearer. But the euphoria and enthusiasm characterizing electoral periods then given way to the responsibility of governing the country, leading to a greater need for a serious and real analysis of the problems and for a (?better definition), without demagogy, of the issues concerning all Portuguese, making it possible to find the solutions capable of justifying and satisfying the need for the interested participation of all, with the courage to refrain from raising false expectations. [end recording]

CUNHAL PROMISES TO PROVOKE CRISIS IN GOVERNMENT

LD070252 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2230 GMT 6 Sep 81

[Text] The official Communist Party stance vis-a-vis the third Democratic Alliance [AD] government was made public by PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal in a speech today at the Avante festival.

Alvaro Cunhal was not sparing in his severe criticism of the new government, describing it as the result of a vulcanization job with plenty of rubber from the Social Democratic Center [CDS] and adding that, the bigger the job, the louder the bang when the tire blows out.

In the communist leader's opinion, the formation of the new government will in no way contribute to resolving the economic, social and political crisis that in his view is gravely affecting the people's living standards and will instead make it more acute in the near future.

Alvaro Cunhal's criticism of the Socialist Party [PS], the president and the Council of the Revolution were also extensive, although the last two were let off more lightly. In the PCP secretary general's opinion, the crisis in the Democratic Alliance could have been used to bring about a change of government.

[Begin Cunhal recording] The crisis of the AD and its government crated a great opportunity for removing the AD from office and bringing about a democratic solution to the crisis. A similar opportunity had arisen immediately after the defeat of the AD in the December presidential elections. But on that occasion, as at other crucial moments when the forces of reaction, weakened by serious setbacks, could have been defeated once and for all, certain democratic forces and the state institutions consigned themselves to the defensive, allowing reaction to recover from the setbacks, regroup, regain ground and go over to the offensive again.

[Words indistinct] If the PS had united with the PCP and other democratic groupings, the way would have been paved for a democratic solution to the crisis. But what did the PS and its secretary general, Mario Soares, do? PS commander in chief Mario Soares did his utmost to see that such an opportunity was wasted, to allow the formation of a new AD government, to prevent the opening up of prospects for a democratic alternative.

At the same time, other organs of sovereignty, specifically the president and the Council of the Revolution, may perhaps have failed to weigh correctly the new and serious threats posed to democracy by the failure to fully exploit such an opportunity. And it will not be long before facts prove the correctness of this assessment.

Mario Soares and other PS leaders uphold the false theory of the erosion suffered by parties in government. The socialists claim that the new AD government will not last long, just another 4 or 5 monts. But if this is so, then why wait another 4 or 5 months--4 or 5 months of huge deprivations and suffering for the people? Why wait to bring down the AD government and finally achieve a democratic solution to the crisis, when this could be done now?

The truth is, just as we had forecast, that Mario Soares and other PS leades threw a life buoy at the AD just as it was beginning to go down.

And what about the future? We, for our part, will resist the policies of the new government and we are certain that many other democrats, including some socialists, will join us.

For our part, we will do our utmost to provoke a new crisis in the government and in the AD. And when such a crisis comes about, we will do our utmost to ensure that the new opportunity--which may not rise again if the understanding, resolve and courage of many democrats and of the institutions continue to fail them--to ensure that the new opportunity will be exploited without the slightest hesitation by all the democrats and by the democratic institutions so as to kick out the AD once and for all and form a democratic government. [applause]

We challenge the view that the AD is in a position to govern for 4 years because it gained a parliamentary majority in the 5 October elections. To begin with, the democratic nature of those elections was seriously compromised by the abuses of power, by the violations of legality, by the monopoly of the state-owned mass media, by the use of millions of contos' worth of public funds for demagogic and electorialist measures by the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral AD government, which thus managed to prevent the expression of the true political will of the Portuguese people. [applause]

Secondly, since the whole of the AD's presidential election campaign was based on the complete identification of candidate Soares Carneiro with the AD and its government, the defeat of Soares Carneiro by General Eanes on 7 December, thanks to the votes of socialists, communists and other democrats--and even of people who had voted AD on 5 October--signified a clamorous defeat for the AD and, to a large extent, the rectification of the results of the 5 October elections.

Thirdly, you cannot recognize legitimacy in a government that violates the constitution and democratic legality every day, that wages war on other organs of sovereignty, that ruins the economy, that dooms the people to poverty, that plunges the country into debt, that destablizes institutions, that nurtures plots in the armed forces and proclaims its deliberate intention to liquidate the democratic regime in whose framework it holds power. [end recording]

UNIFIED COMMAND FOR IBERIAN PENINSULA REJECTED

[Text] The defense minister today confirmed Portugal's rejection of a unified military command for the Iberian Peninsula, adding that he understands from the foreign affairs minister that the Spanish Government's stand on the matter remains the one expressed by the Spanish defense minister, that is, that Spain has no right to set up a unified military command for the peninsula, even on an annual rotation basis.

Freitas do Amaral said there are three basic reasons for Portugal's stand: The first is of an historic and political character. National independence must be safeguarded. The solution in question would not be positive from this point of view. Second, it is important that we maintain and develop the best possible relations of friendship, neighborliness and cooperation in all spheres with Spain, and the solution in question might be detrimental to this goal.

Pointing out that the third reason is of a strategic nature, the defense minister said Portugal's specific role within NATO is to contribute primarily to the defense of the Atlantic zone, whereas Spain is better equipped to contribute to the defense of the European continent and the Mediterranean area. The forced merger of these two differentiated vocations under a single military command would be an artificial and dangerous solution.

In conclusion, Freitas do Amaral expressed the view that the Iberian Peninsula should be divided into two geostrategic regions, one turned to the Atlantic flank and the other to the continental and Mediterranean area.

MINISTRY RETURNS SOVIET MEMORANDUM ON NATO

LD080852 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Text] At about 2100 last night, the EFE agency transmitted an urgent item under the headline: "Unacceptable Interference by the Soviet Union in Spanish Domestic Political Debate." The text of the item is:

Madrid. Late this afternoon Soviet Charge d'Affaires Ivanov handed over at the Foreign Affairs Ministry a memorandum purporting to warn the Spanish Government about the negative consequences, as the Soviet Union sees it, which would derive from Spain's joining NATO. EFE learned from reliable sources that the ministry returned the memorandum, seeing in both its tone and contents an unacceptable interference in Spain's domestic political debate.

The agency report is more or less the only hard fact we have at this moment. The Foreign Affairs Ministry has given no further information on the matter. The only thing we have been able to find out is that the so-called Soviet memorandum to the Spanish Government on the NATO question--this warning document which goes beyond all diplomatic usage and custom--runs to just over a page.

The document was handed over personally by Ivanov to the director general for European affairs at the ministry. The Soviet ambassador in Madrid, Yuriy Dubinin, is currently in his own country. The director general passed the memorandum to Minister Perez-Llorca, who returned it immediately to Ivanov for the reason cited in the agency dispatch--"unacceptable interference in Spanish domestic political debate."

The memorandum's delivery and its immediate return do not do much for relations between Spain and Soviet Union, relations which are referred to in a broader way by Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca in ABC today. Among other things, he says: I am convinced that joining NATO will help to clarify positions, which will simplify our relations with the Soviet Union. In my view, the minister says, the Soviet Union has now accepted that Spain is to join NATO. That makes matters clearer. There is still a propaganda battle ahead, but I believe that the Soviet Union has accepted the fact. Whatever the case, Spanish Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca says further on: We cannot rule out the possibility of the propaganda campaign being heated up with some sort of [word indistinct] diplomatic gesture. But Spanish foreign policy is conducted through the competent democratic institutions. Furthermore, on the question of the letters which Brezhnev was reported to have sent to Suarez and to Marcelino Oreja, warning about the negative effects membership would have for Europe, Perez-Llorca says: The USSR continues with its habit of sending people lengthy messages though I must stress that (?this has no effect) at international forums or on the attitudes expressed in the press or in communiques.

GRAPO LEADER KILLED IN SHOOTOUT WITH POLICE

[Text] Barcelona, 5 Sep (AFP)--Enrique Cerdan Calixto, 31, head of the far-left October 1 Anti-fascist Resistance Group (GRAPO), died today after a gun battle with police who had found his hideout, official sources said. Several dozen police officers in civilian clothes surrounded the Barcelona apartment early this morning and ordered him to surrender. Calixto refused, jumped from his window to an inside courtyard and opened fire, police said. He was shot numerous times in the ensuing shooting. Police said they found a machinegun, a pistol, 750,000 pesetas (7,500 dollars), two counterfeit identity cards and various documents and plans for future terrorist attacks inside the apartment. Calixto has been sought since a double attack last May 4, in which General Andres Gonzalez de Suso, a leading military official, and a national police officer were killed in Madrid and two civil guards (paramilitary police) were murdered in Barcelona.

"The political evolution in the Korean Republic appears to be heading in the right direction," the Danish prime minister said after the meeting. "There are always things to criticize in this Far Eastern country, but I noted that Prime Minister Nam Tok-u gave me an open account of conditions in his country and that the Korean delegation, during its visit to Copenhagen, is ready to meet with representatives of Amnesty International," Mr Jorgensen said.

Several left-wing political parties have protested the visit, arguing that South Korea "oppressed political opponents". Mr Nam, for his part, called on all well-meaning governments to act individually or collectively to help renew negotiations between North and South Korea on the country's reunification.

Further Meetings

[Text] Copenhagen, 5 Sep (AFP)--Visiting South Korea Premier Nam Tok-u has accepted to meet tomorrow with representatives of Amnesty International, the Nobel-prize winning humanitarian organization, it was learned today. Amnesty intends asking the premier to obtain the liberation of all political prisoners held in his country. Particular stress, it was learned would be put on the cases of imprisoned opposition leader Kim Tae-chung and four other so-called prisoners of conscience "adopted" by Amnesty's Danish section. According to the organization, an estimated 2,000 to 3,000 South Koreans are being held for political reasons, about 340 of whom have been identified by name.

Mr Nam's program here included a private audience with Denmark's Queen Margrethe at Amaliemborg Palace yesterday, followed by a visit to the A.P. Moeller Shipping Company, a discussion with Danish businessmen at the Chamber of Commerce, a lunch at City Hall and a reception at the parliament by Speaker Knud Borge Andersen.

Today, the premier and his delegation visited the Danish provinces, and notably the birthplace of Denmark's great writer of fairy tales, Hans Christian Andersen, at Odense and the internationally know Lego toy makers at Billund. Following his meeting with Amnesty, the South Korean party, which arrived here from Sweden, will go on to Finland, and from there to Belgium, for talks with the European Economic Community.

Amnesty International Meeting

[Text] Copenhagen, 6 Sep (AFP)--South Korean Deputy Foreign Minister Kim Tong-hui today promised here that an Amnesty International delegation would be given permission to visit his country. He gave the undertaking during a two-hour meeting with members of the Danish section of the world human rights organization. An amnesty representative said afterwards that he hoped a delegation could leave for South Korea as soon as possible. Amnesty estimates that there are 2,000 to 3,000 political prisoners in the country. Amnesty's spokesman, Henning Glahn, said he understood today's talks took place only at the insistence of Denmark's prime minister, Anker Jorgensen.

The spokesman said Mr Kim had denied that there were political prisoners in South Korea, but agreed that his country put state security before human rights.

South Korean Prime Minister Nam Tok-u, who is on an official visit to Denmark, did not take part in the talks, although he had a free day today. Mr Nam and his entourage are due to leave here tomorrow for Helsinki--the third stage of a European tour which will afterwards take him to Belgium.

NC050948 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 5 Sep 81 p 8

[Text] Late last night, by order of a warrant, the police arrested and detained Andreas Yeoryiadhis, aged 43, from Lefka and now living in Nicosia, regarding the discovery of a quantity of weapons at the Nicosia Technical School, which is being investigated. Yeoryiadhis is a woodworking teacher at the technical school.

According to a police report, the weapons that were found are: 1 automatic Kalashnikof, 1 automatic Thompson, 1 automatic Skorpios, 1 Colt pistol, 1 Favazia pistol, 1 38-mm pistol, 299 cartridges of various calibers, 17 cartridge belts and 5 leather cases for automatic cartridges.

Court Proceedings

NC061510 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 6 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] Mystery clouds the issue of the finding of the weapons cache at the first technical school in Nicosia, opposite the Hilton Hotel, at noon on Friday and the arrest of Andreas Yeoryiadhis, the woodworking teacher at the school. According to information obtained by I SIMERINI on the finding of the weapons, the headmaster of the technical school was the first to ring the police, who said: "Come immediately, as there are some suspicious objects here."

Mr Yeoryiadhis, who was arrested by the police after the discovery of the weapons, is a member of a big family from Lefka. His brother Y. Yeoryiadhis is working at the Cypriot Embassy in Athens, while his brother Savvas Yeoryiadhis was a candidate for deputy of Mr Tasos Papadhopoulos' Center Union Party. According to some unverified information, fingerprints were found on the weapons.

Meanwhile, Andreas Yeoryiadhis was brought before the Nicosia district court yesterday, and an order was issued remanding him to custody for 4 days for possessing unlawful weapons and explosives found the day before yesterday at the woodworking shop of the first technical school in Nicosia. Specifically, the weapons found are: Three automatic guns, two pistols, one revolver, a great number of cartridges of various calibers, and cartridge belts for the guns.

The chief of the Likavittos criminal investigation department, Police Inspector Nathanail Papayeoryiou, who brought Yeoryiadhis before the court, said: "There is evidence against the suspect that creates reasonable suspicion he is implicated in the present issue." Mr Papayeoryiou further said that certain written notes found at the cache throw reasonable suspicion on the suspect of being implicated.

Mr Papayeoryiou has described the offense as "serious" and advocated that the "suspect's release might influence testimony." Finally, Mr Papayeoryiou said that the suspect has given testimony, that its contents are being investigated and that over 15 other testimonies will be taken.

Mr Lambros Pelekanos, the lawyer defending Yeoryiadhis, has not protested the suspect's detention "in order to help the work of justice." The court order was issued by Mr Yeoryios Nikolaou.

PAPER CITES ARAB CONCERN OVER FOREIGN BASES

NC070755 Nicosia DHIMOKRATIA in Greek 7 Sep 81 p 3

[From the "Democratic" column: "The Bases"]

[Text] Ever since its founding, the Nonaligned Movement has been against the presence of foreign bases on the territory of its member states. This opposition was expressed in the historic declaration of the founding conference of the movement held 20 years ago in Belgrade. Yet foreign bases and foreign troops exist in Cyprus. From time to time during these past 20 years, strong concern was expressed over their presence by neighboring Arab states, against which armed attacks were launched in the past with the bases of Dhekelia and Akrotiri as the starting points.

Now for the first time there is a joint and specific demarche by the Arab states against this foreign military presence in Cyprus. In their recent joint statement, with which they condemned U.S. provocations against Libya, the Arab diplomatic missions in Cyprus called upon the people of Cyprus and the Cyprus Government not to grant military facilities to the U.S. rapid deployment forces which--they underline--directly endanger the Arab peoples in the area and their relations with the brother people of Cyprus. At the same time, Libya directly requested the closing of the British bases in Cyprus.

We will not reiterate what this column has repeatedly stressed in the past in reference to NATO bases in Cyprus and the plans for their expansion as the cause which led to the Cyprus tragedy. Nor will we reiterate what this column has stressed in reference to the horrible dangers which the presence of these bases creates both for neighboring peoples and the people of Cyprus, as well as for peace in the area and internationally. Neither will we reiterate what this column has revealed in reference to those responsible, and their failure to respond to the necessity of a decisive struggle for the abolition of these bases. We will, however, underline that the joint demarche of the Arab diplomatic missions in Cyprus as well as that of Libya on the one hand, and the now overt aggressive activities of the U.S. imperialists in the area on the other hand, leave no margins for our continued well-being and reliance on misleading statements like the ones the British High Commission and the military authorities of these bases often resort to.

MITSOTAKIS RETURNS FROM LONDON EC TALKS 6 SEP

[Text] Foreign Minister Mitsotakis described the 2-day unofficial meeting of EC foreign ministers, held in London, as particularly important, useful and constructive. In a statement prior to his departure for Athens, Mitsotakis said all burning international problems, including internal EC issues, were examined during the meeting.

We discussed Africa, the Middle East, Central America, Afghanistan and Poland, he said. Mitsotakis added the 10 ministers had an extensive discussion on the Middle East issue and that the French foreign minister briefed them on his Middle East visit and his contacts with 'Arafat. The European initiative on the Middle East issue, Mitsotakis added, is active. It goes beyond the Camp David agreement and has all prospects of offering a solution to the problem. Mitsotakis also said he had contacts with many of his Euroean colleagues whom he briefed on the progress of the Cyprus issue. Mitsotakis arrived in Athens tonight.

RENDIS RECEIVES ARAB ENVOYS ON U.S.-LIBYA INCIDENT

LIBYAN ENVOY EXPLAINS AL-QADHDHAFI REMARKS

[Text] Athens, 7 Sep (AFP)--A Tripoli official today denied that Libyan Leader Col al-Qadhdhafi threatened an automatic attack on (?American) bases in the Mediterranean--of which four are in Greece--if there was another air clash like that of August 19 over the Gulf of Sidra. 'Ali Maris, [word indistinct] (?of) the Libyan People's Bureau (Embassy), told a press conference here that Col al-Qadhdhafi had nevertheless warned (?countries hosting) bases that "Libya would have the right to attack them" if they cooperated in fresh aggression by the U.S. Sixth Fleet, planes from which shot down two Libyan fighters in the Gulf of Sidra incident.

Last week Col al-Qadhdhafi was reported as saying that Libya would deliberately attack American nuclear missiles and bases if the U.S. attacked Libya in the Gulf. Mr Maris, quoting Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, said today that Sicily, Crete, Greece, Turkey and Western Europe knew well that they were threatened by the fact of the bases' existence.

Mr Maris reproached Western "mass media" for giving "inexact" reports of the Libyan leader's remarks after the August 19 clash. Col al-Qadhdhafi's reported comments had caused surprise in the Greek capital, and Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis, who has stressed frequently that Greece aims to promote the Arab and Palestinian causes, said that allied military installations in Greece were defensive.

He has summoned the Libyan representative to reiterate the viewpoint and Greece's wish to continue friendly cooperation with the Arab world. Libya is one of the principal oil suppliers to Greece.

Press Reactions

NC070838 [Editorial Report] The Greek-language Athens press for 3-7 September comments on Al-Qadhdhafi's threats against U.S. bases in the Mediterranean.

Athens RIZOSPASTIS on 4 September, carries an article under the headline: "New Democracy, Captive of its Atlantic Policy--Mitsotakis Defends U.S. Aggressive Bases in Our Country." After quoting Mitsotakis' statement, the paper continues: "It is, however, well known that U.S. bases have absolutely no relation to Greek national defense. Like the bases in Crete, they are nothing but bases for attacks against the progressive regimes of the Middle East and North Africa. The recent gangster attack in the Gulf of Sidra is a self-evident example of this trend."

The paper then states that the Greek Government's statement that it follows a policy of friendship and cooperation with the Arab world "is a direct contradiction of reality because such a policy is absolutely impossible at a time when Greek territory is full of aggressive U.S. bases. The base of Souda in Crete, particularly, has become the attack base of the piratical 6th Fleet, which instigated the gangster provocation against Libya." The paper concludes: "From yesterday's statement by Mitstotakis it can be deduced that the 'New Democracy' government, being captive of its Atlantic policy, does not understand the seriousness of the danger from nuclear holocaust endangered by the presence of aggressive U.S. bases in our country."

Athens I AVYI in a commentary on 4 September states: "The concern created in various Mediterranean countries by the recent statements of Colonel al-Qadhdhafi is understandable and explainable." After referring to Mitsotakis' statement, the paper continues: "In respect of the logic behind Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's warnings we must, at the outset, recognize it is within the general logic enforced upon international relations by the aggressive and totally piratical policy of the Reagan administration. It is such a policy which leads to acts like that threatened by the Libyan leader against U.S. bases in the Mediterranean in his effort to stop the developing aggressive U.S. policy against his country. Mitsotakis' concern, consequently, should be concentrated on the jungle climate created by U.S. imperialism in international relations." After rejecting the description of U.S. bases in Greece as "defensive," the paper continues: "Reality demonstrates that the existence of U.S. bases in Greece creates a permanent danger for the country. At a time when U.S. acts of buccaneering and provocations increase, the existence of these bases sucks us in--as elements without a will--into the whirlpool of the multiple consequenses of aggressive U.S. policy." The newspaper then recommends the abolition of the U.S. bases.

Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA, on 5 September, carries an article by Columnist L. Dhanos in the "Events" column, under the headline, "Revival of Detente Is the Duty of the Greeks and the Arabs."

Dhanos deals with Mitsotakis' "surprise" over Al-Qadhdhafi's warning that "he will strike U.S. bases in Italy, Greece and Turkey in case of new U.S. provocations," as well as with "New Democracy's" dedication to Atlantism and continues:

"New Democracy's eagerness to guarantee a supply of arms from this 'protector' of the world [U.S.] in order to maintain even 'some sort' of balance in the Aegean, and that it is nearly, if not absolutely, certain that the present government will be willing to comply to any encouragement from Uncle Sam, thus sacrificing, absolutely and irrevocably, all vestiges of Greek-Arab friendship.

"Naturally, this in no way means that tomorrow's government, PASOK's government, will be able to deal with and solve the problems of our foreign policy from one day to the next. It simply means there will be a change in priorities, not only in the goals but also in the methods we choose for their attainment. It means, for example, we will not cede our sovereign rights for the sake of any policy of 'dependence', but that we will seek and find new methods to strengthen our national independence and territorial integrity. This means that we will cease to give in to blackmail from Washington...."

After dealing with Washington's new "line" which consists of three parts: Strike mercilessly at its enemies; arm without limit all its friends; let the others make up their own decisions, Dhanos concludes:

"We, the Greeks, belong to these 'others,' the progressive forces of Europe, for example, which fight to enforce a new course, the one leading to revival of detente and coexistence, the Final Act of Helsinki.

"The Arabs also belong to these 'others.' Because we need them to the degree that they also need us, because they, like us, have undertaken an effort to protect their independence and territorial integrity together with peace itself, we have the duty--even today--not to insult their intelligence by selling them 'sentiments of friendship' which do not, and we know they do not, exist in the political actions of New Democracy."

Ambassador Gurun will be received tomorrow by Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. In a statement before the meeting, the Turkish Foreign Ministry secretary general recalled that discussions between the two countries were always a welcome development. Also speaking before the meeting, Ambassador Roussos noted that no agenda existed for the talks and added that the aim of the discussions was not to dwell on a specific question or to settle specific problems. All existing differences between the two countries would be taken up generally without any limitations and discussions would be directed toward resolving differences.

During the talks which are expected to continue tomorrow, the Turkish side stressed the violation of the legal rights of the Turkish minority living in western Thrace. The Aegean airspace and the continental shelf problems were superficially discussed. Recent incidents in which Turkish citizens illegally crossed into Greece are also expected to be discussed. In fact, Turkey has officially asked Greece to provide for Turkish Consulate officials to meet with these people in a bid to determine whether any were involved in terrorist incidents in Turkey.

It has been announced that decisions reached at the meeting of the secretaries general will be submitted to Turkish Foreign Ministrer Turkmen and Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis when they meet in New York on 27 September. The two foreign ministers will be there to attend the UN General Assembly sessions.

NATO'S LUNS COMMENTS ON STABILITY, U.S. PLANS

[Text] NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns has said that NATO favors a strong Turkey and that it will make use of all its possibilities to support such a Turkey. At a news conference in Izmir, Luns said that NATO is especially satisfied with the stability and development in Turkey's economic situation and added: There are many advantages to having a strong Turkish army. A strong, happy, developed and modern Turkey is the guarantee of peace and security in its own region.

Referring to various international problems, Luns recalled that the Reagan administration is being criticized for arms modernization, the strengthening of the U.S. army and the neutron bomb. Luns said: The Soviet Union generally attaches great importance to the strength factor in international relations. No doubt, the Soviet Union is following the decisions made by the United States and is assessing them. In my opinion, these decisions, this U.S. determination and its stability policy, will create a great stability in East-West relations and will be a deterrent factor. These decisions will greatly contribute to insuring peace and security.

In reply to a question at the news conference, Luns said that the military instability between NATO and the Warsaw Pact has not yet been completely eliminated and that the recent decisions made by the United States are an important development in eliminating this instability. Luns added that the NATO decisions on the modernization of the tactical nuclear arms in Europe made on 12 December 1979 also play an important role in the elimination of the instability. He said: Had we not made these decisions, the agreements on disarmament and on arms limitation could not have been realized. Today Luns is visiting tourist sites in Cesme. This evening he will attend the NATO day organized at the NATO pavillion at the International Izmir Ataturk Fair.

I consider them as a good and constructive development not only for Turkey but for NATO as well.

Luns said that he would brief Turkish businessmen he will meet tomorrow on NATO's situation, on the problems the organization faces and on Turkey's role in NATO. The NATO secretary general will depart Turkey tomorrow.

TA071726 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 7 Sep 81

[Text] Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has said that the furthering of cooperation with Kuwait in all fields would be significant for the region's stability and security. In a statement which appeared in an Istanbul magazine in English, Turkmen said that both Turkey and Kuwait supported the establishment of a just, comprehensive and lasting peace in the Middle East. In a statement to the same magazine, State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said that it was imperative to devise a plan to promote Turkey's relations with the Gulf countries, particularly with Kuwait. Ozal said all details of Turkey's cooperation with these countries should be included in the plan.

WESTERN NEWS AGENCIES DISTORT RELATIONS WITH LIBYA

TA051019 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0500 GMT 5 Sep 81

[Station commentary: "The Deliberately Disruptive Activities of the American and British News Agencies and NATO"]

[Text] Without checking the sources, the Turkish dailies printed reports to the effect that "Al-Qadhdhafi said he would the bomb the U.S. bases in Turkey. "

Al-Qadhdhafi's remarks were deliberately distorted by AP of the United States and REUTERS of Britain with a view to harming relations between Turkey and Libya. This was announced by the Libyan Government's press spokesman. The Libyan representation in Turkey informed the junta government of that. However, Turkish Radio and Television [TRT] is ignoring this announcement. It is inconceivable that the junta government or the big dailies forgot the recent AP report--which gave its source as Ankara--which aims at harming the relations between Turkey and Libya. Such a stand serves only the interests of those who want to damage the relations between our country and neighboring and friendly countries. Earlier, the junta felt obliged to deny the AP reports, but now the TRT continues to base itself on the reports of these imperialist news agencies. This shows that junta continues to adopt its stands based on lies and on distorted reports. This serves the interests of those who want to damage the relations between our country and friendly countries and brotherly peoples.

In fact, without even bothering to think where he was, on whose land he was, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns immediately began to insult the brotherly Libyan people and their leader. In this way, Luns tried to further poison the atmosphere of artificial tension created by the news agencies. This is certainly not a coincidence. Such deliberately disruptive actions by the Western imperialist news agencies and by the reactionary newspapers in the NATO countries, their lies and slander campaigns are planned at NATO headquarters. NATO spreads the propaganda material of a series of deliberately disruptive activities aimed at poisoning the international atmosphere--activities such as halting the peace struggle, declaring national liberation movements acts of terrorism, portraying the Soviet Union as the supporter of terrorism and spreading the CIA's false reports as proof of such lies. These efforts try to conceal the aggressive aspect of NATO and of U.S. imperialism. All this is verified by the U.S. and British news agencies spreading of lies and of distorted news. This is proved by the fact that the United States and NATO display their aggressive aspects from behind the Israeli Zionists and South African racists. It is proven by their direct attack against Libya. It will be further proved too. They cannot conceal their aggressive aspects because they are imperialists. Their essence is brute force. Their essence is to loot the peoples' national riches through colonial or neocolonial methods. Their essence is a monster which will not refrain from any act of barbarism in order to keep the world under its hegemony.

Their decision to manufacture the neutron bomb on the anniversary of the days they burned hundreds of thousands of people to ashes in Hiroshima and Nagasaki is a sign of this monster, of this craziness.

NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns is the representative of the U.S. arms monopolies. He is the master's voice. It is the U.S. and NATO bases set up in our land and Turkey's membership in NATO that give this old nazi remnant the opportunity to bark, on our own land, against the brotherly Libyan people and their leader. Unless we get rid of these bases and end our NATO membership, we cannot eliminate the dangers created by them.

EEC NATIONS SHOWING COMMON LDC AID POSITION

[By Ann Duncan]

[Text] Paris, 8 Sep (AFP)--The 10 countries in the European Economic Community (EEC) have arrived at a common negotiating position for some demands for aid to the world's 31 poorest countries, according to secret documents obtained today by AGENCE FRANCE-PRESSE.

But key issues of precisely how much aid should be increased and specific aid targets for the Least Developed Countries (LDC) were not included in the documents, a basis for private negotiations that got under way today at the first UN conference on the LDC's.

According to the documents, the EEC proposed that all donor countries reaffirm their commitment to the UN objective that 0.7 percent of those countries' gross national product be allocated to aid. At present, industrialized countries give on an average some 0.3 percent of their GNP to aid.

But the documents made no mention of the developing countries' (Group of 77) demand that 0.15 percent of the donor countries' GNP be specifically allocated to aid for the LDC's.

The EEC countries also did not respond to the Group of 77 demand that aid-giving countries double their aid to the LDC's early in this decade. LDC's now get some 6,000 million dollars U.S. in assistance.

France, Belgium and other countries have reportedly been lobbying hard during late night sessions for the EEC to arrive at a common position during the conference.

But Britain has reportedly dug in its heels against accepting the 0.15 percent subtarget, viewing the figure as arbitrary and expressing concern that aid could be siphoned away from such developing countries as India.

Conference sources have also reported that Britain is worried about taking a position too distinctly different from the U.S. position. The U.S. has never accepted the 0.7 percent target, which if met would call for a substantial increase in American aid.

West Germany is reportedly waiting for Britain's final position on the subtarget issue before making up its mind.

Earlier today Italy and Luxembourg added their names to the growing list of EEC countries that have publicly accepted the 0.15 percent target, with Italy saying it hoped to surpass the figure but giving no indication of when.

Meanwhile a Canadian delegation member said that Canada, considered a liberal aid donor, was in dead centre between the two main camps of industrialized donor countries.

Canada has also called the 0.15 percent subtarget "arbitrary" and warned that it could make aid giving rigid.

But Canada wants to see some sort of increase in aid to the LDC's, the official said. Canada has not publicly indicated what would be an acceptable increase.

CSSR PRESIDENT HUSAK'S VISIT POSTPONED

AU081817 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1730 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Text] The visit by CSSR President Husak to Austria, planned for the beginning of October, has been postponed by mutual agreement until a later date. An official reason for this has not yet been announced. Unofficially, however, reference is being made to relations between Austria and the CSSR, which have been tense since the case of the informer Hodic and the trials of civil rights activists in Prague.

TRADE UNION FEDERATION INVITES LECH WALESA

[Text] Vienna (APA)--Karl Hummel, international secretary of the Austrian Trade Union Federation, who attended the Gdansk Solidarity congress, has invited Solidarity leader Lech Walesa to visit Austria. In an interview for the Austrian radio and television service, Hummel declared in Vienna on Monday that Walesa had accepted the invitation but that a date could only be fixed at a later time. Hummel stressed that he was highly impressed by the democratic proceedings at the Solidarity congress.

USSR MANEUVERS TO BE DISCUSSED WITH NEUTRALS

Vienna does not want to act alone, however, but will study the question within the framework of the so-called "N and N" group, which consists of the neutral and nonaligned participants in the European security conference.

At a special NATO Council session, this organization has expressed concern over the scale of the maneuvers, which became known only through a TASS report. Several countries, including the FRG, the United States and Belgium, have officially inquired in Moscow about details and the reason the Soviet Government failed to comply with the Helsinki stipulations.

Western observers in Moscow expressed astonishment at the scale of the maneuvers after it was announced by the official news agency and described them as the largest since the 1940's.

Analyzing film reports on the maneuvers, Western military experts noted that the Soviet general staff employed World War II tactics. This might be an indication that rapid mobilization procedures were being tested, especially as regards the quick call-up of reservists and requisitioning of vehicles, as well as coordination among the different branches.

In this context a suggestion made by the Austrian Foreign Ministry to the editors of domestic newspapers is noteworthy. In its release the ministry suggests that Austrian newspapers intending to report on Poland inform the Polish Embassy press attache. The ministry advises that this should be done "for the purpose of avoiding difficulties on the part of Polish border authorities." At the same time it is pointed out that compliance with this suggestion would be advisable "irrespective of the fact that in principle no visas are required for travel between the two countries." This certainly "does not constitute any progress in the spirit of the Helsinki act," a Foreign Ministry spokesman told DIE PRESSE. However, he said, allowance should be made for the Polish authorities' "very great nervousness" at the present time. Moreover, he added, the Polish side regards such an attitude by Austrian journalists as "expedient."

JEWISH OFFICIALS ATTACK KREISKY'S PLO POLICY

[Josef Brokhal report]

[Excerpts] Many high-ranking politicians expressed sympathy and solidarity with Austria's Jews after the attack on the synagogue in Seitenstettengasse. This was reported in the opening statement of the press conference held today at the Jewish community center, only a few meters from the site of last Saturday's terrorist attack, but the voice of the Austrian chancellor sounded louder and clearer through all the mass media: With all the weight of his office and with the full authority he has acquired over the years in Austria and in the world, Kreisky depicted the terrorist attack as a predictable and virtually inevitable consequence of Israel's intransigent policy. Then the vice president of the Vienna Jewish community, Edmund Reiss, said:

[Begin Reiss recording] We maintain that, for example, statements by the chancellor and his foreign minister in that fateful hour, when expressions of sympathy and solidarity with the victims were drowned out by attacks on Israeli politicians, create a climate favorable for the terrorists. We cannot understand it. We regard it as condemnable if one allows the alleged increase of Austria's reputation and its economic interests to outweigh the endangering of human life.

Ladies and gentlemen, we would like to be understood correctly: This press conference is not designed to bring about a controversy with our chancellor. It is rather the result of a development which has led to a point where we Austrian Jews have come to regard ourselves as the first victims of this policy. We do not want to be a pawn of this policy. [end recording]

Another speaker, Dr Daniel Charim, declared that Chancellor Kreisky's Middle East policy was actually far less successful than has been frequently asserted. The chancellor's friendly relations with the PLO made it impossible for him to act any longer as a mediator between the two sides in the conflict. [Begin Charim recording] But the crux of the matter is not only that the chancellor--and this applies primarily to him personally-has turned Austria's foreign policy in a certain direction, namely, that there can be peace in the Middle East only if the PLO is recognized as representative of the Palestinians, but that he has done that in such a way that he has actually placed himself in an offside position because one side, the Isreali side, no longer accepts him today. [end recording]

There was also some criticism of Austrian security measures taken in the past for protecting Jewish citizens and institutions. Experiences in many countries has shown, it was argued, that security could be better ensured by stricter surveillance of potential perpetrators. But this was badly neglected in the past, possible because it did not seem opportune for political reasons, it was declared at the press conference today. However, it was added that the authorities had now given assurances that Arabs living in Vienna, as well as those coming to Austria, would be watched more closely and controlled more strictly.

Ballistics Tests Inconclusive

[Summary] The ballistics tests carried out by police on the two submachineguns used by the Arab terrorists in last Saturday's attack on the Vienna synagogue to establish whether one of them was used in the assassination [1 May] of Vienna city councilman Heinz Nittel have failed to produce any definite results. Despite extensive tests, police experts can neither confirm nor exclude the possibility that one of these weapons was used in the Nittel murder. A particular problem in the ballistics test was the deformation of the projectiles retrived from Nittel's body and the fact that no ejected shells were found after the Nittel murder.

PAPER SCORNS GOVERNMENT FORMATION 'BREAKTHROUGH'

PM080917 Amsterdam DE VOLKSKRANT in Dutch 2 Sep 81 p 3

[Editorial: "Paper"]

[Excerpts] The text of the accord so widely hailed answers almost no single question, and certainly not the question why the dramatic tussles of the last few weeks were necessary. Nor could the negotiators involved shed much light on this. According to the PVDA and D'66, the old agreements have been reaffirmed with somewhat different wording. There is nothing to be found in the text to contradict this. CDA negotiator Lubbers spoke cheerfully of "consolidations" and "tougher preconditions" for a policy of budget cuts and attempts to improve the budget shortfall situation. Obviously this is an accord which can easily be populated with dreams.

The greatest puzzle is--still--Van Agt's attitude. He torpedoed the grand coalition and whipped up true CDA popular anger against Lubbers and informateur De Gaaij Fortman Sr. Yet now that these two have produced a new text, which says very little, with the complete agreement of Den Uyl and Terlouw, the phenomenon [reference to Van Agt] even seems to actively desire a cabinet on such a solid and confidence-building basis, under his leadership.

Hopefully his frenzied rank and file is now pleased with "consolidated preconditions." Otherwise there will once again be unpleasant talk of insufficient support in society for the Cabinet. Van Agt himself put the CDA supporters' minds at rest on television on Tuesday evening with a completely misleading representation of affairs. He presented sections of the earlier accord, which he had previously rejected in the most violent manner, as the gains of recent weeks.

The most probable explanation for this surprising turn of events in favor of the grand coalition is a change in the political "preconditions" within the CDA itself, which may have taken place behind the scenes but which least of all point to any consolidation. Perhaps Van Agt--although it does sound a little rich--has realized that there is no practicable alternative, even after pressure is exerted on others.

Given this formation and the abundant distrust between the coalition partners and their rank and file, it is doubtful whether this Cabinet will be able to develop great strength or effectiveness. Even the possible lifetime of this Cabinet has a bigger question mark than ever over it, considering the political chances the CDA's rightwing could expect from the collapse of the coalition and new elections. This is another reason why there is little cause for happiness at Tuesday's "breakthrough."

SPD CHAIRMAN COMMENTS ON ARMAMENT ISSUES

["Excerpt" from Jochimsen interview with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Frank Barnaby said 4 years ago that the most dangerous thing about the neutron bomb and the entire new generation of radiation weapons is that a nuclear war is considered more acceptable because it can be won and that, therefore, a nuclear war is more likely than before. This also is the main argument of the critics and opponents of the neutron bomb today. Is all this just panicmongering and mere hysteria?

[Answer] No, I don't think so. I believe these are very understandable and largely justified concerns, especially because many realize that it would be dangerous illusion to believe that one side--in this case the West--would use small and, as some people say, less dangerous nuclear arms and that the other side would not respond with a much heavier strike. If you look at the situation and see where and how we Germans, the Germans in both German states, live, you must instead conclude that those who say that the use of these smaller and supposedly less dangerous weapons would lead to heavier strikes and to a large-scale nuclear exchange, at least in Europe and thus in the two parts of Germany, could be right.

[Question] You say that this apprehension is understandable. Are you also afraid?

[Answer] That depends on what you mean. I am not afraid for myself. Why should somebody my age be afraid? I think I have never been afraid, not even in dangerous situations involving my own life. But I am afraid for mankind and for my own people. I am afraid that something is being started here that no one can stop--something that could destroy entire nations, at any rate, our people, the divided German people.

[Question] Is something being started now? Something we want to stop, but perhaps can't. How sovereign is the Federal Republic in this situation?

[Answer] As things have developed, we are part of the Western, the Atlantic alliance. I don't see any other position for the FRG. In my view, the only chance to get out of the present difficulties is for the two big powers, which are identical with the two big nuclear powers, and the two alliances to arrive at a new relationship and to more clearly embark on the road to arms control and arms limitation. Recently, the course has much rather been in the opposite direction. Since we have been part of the Western alliance for some time, we have to work within it and together with it. This would mean a limitation of our sovereignty even if we were a nuclear power and had the same status as the French. But we don't want this. This has been a firm line in German politics for many years. We don't have such aspirations.

Nonetheless, we don't allow anyone else to believe that things can be done with Germany and on German soil without our consent, things that have been thought out at desks or in laboratories elsewhere. This also played a role regarding the neutron weapon. Nobody can dispute that on principle the United States can produce whatever it wants to at home. The Russians do that, too. But the idea that this also means that these weapons can be stationed in Germany is unacceptable. It should be made quite clear--as has been done by various sides--that this is impossible without the Germans themselves having a say.

[Question] Some well-informed people who have closely studied the status of forces agreement say that it contains not a word about our really having a say in this matter. Thus, they say, we can't refuse to allow the neutron weapon to be deployed in the Federal Republic.

[Answer] You can interpret the troop status of forces agreement in various ways. Seen politically, it is inconceivable for a power, no matter how big and friendly it is, to believe that in 1981 and subsequent years, it can simply treat the Germans as it wants. True, we lost the last war, but such a conclusion cannot be drawn from this fact. Actually, during those years for which I can speak--when I held government responsibility and after the status of forces agreement had long been concluded--it had become customary and unwritten law that in all fields connected with nuclear arms the principle of consultation--not just informing the other side, but mutual consultation--was applicable.

[Question] Is this the point where we should insist on our stand with a new self-assuredness and--let me repeat--sovereignty, which must not be equated with anti-Americanism, and say no or make our interests clear and plain?

[Answer] I would like to take up what you said about our own interests. If what I said about our position in the Western alliance is true--and I think it is roughly true--we must gain understanding there, we must win European and, above all, American support for our stand. The best way to do this is not to say that we are exceptional or to show a sort of German self-assuredness in the sense that we know better than everyone else. But we are affected differently, or at least more, than the Americans. They would not be necessarily directly affected by the Russian counterstrike we discussed earlier. We would be, and probably other Europeans as well. We would be affected at any rate. The fact that the largest number of weapons, unprecedented in history, is stockpiled on German soil and that the dangers of a nuclear exchange in Europe would materialize most terribly on German soil, gives us the right to say with self-confidence--but without arrogance--and determination what in our view is and isn't possible. Above all, we naturally have the right to make our paramount interest in negotiations clear--our interest in the two big powers talking about whether and how armaments can be reduced and controlled.

By the way, this is also part of the concept--no matter what people may think about it--the concept which was decided in Brussels in December 1979. It says that in the light of negotiations it will be decided what steps NATO will take now that NATO has determined that the Soviet Union has done much more than previously in the field of medium-range nuclear missiles, the SS-20's. Almost all responsible people hold the view that this has created an imbalance in medium-range weapons in Europe.

POLL SHOWS DISAPPROVAL OF U.S. NEUTRON DECISION

DW081220 [Editorial Report] Mainz ZDF Television Network in German at 2130 GMT on 7 September carries the results of an undated and unspecified FRG opinion poll concerning President Reagan's decision to build the neutron bomb. The number of those questioned in the poll is not given. The results are:

	Decision Is Correct	Incorrect
Overall	37 percent	60 percent
SPD members	28 percent	71 percent

PIECYK VIEWS PLANNED ANTI-HAIG DEMONSTRATIONS

DW081209 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0420 GMT 8 Sep 81

["Excerpts" from reporter Heribert Schwan interview with Willy Piecyk, federal chairman of the FRG Young Socialists; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] What has prompted you to demonstrate against Haig's visit to Berlin?

[Answer] I think quite a number of good reasons exist to demonstrate on the occasion of Haig's visit. After all, it was Haig who said shortly after assuming office that there are more important matters for him than peace. Under this slogan, everything developed differently in the new U.S. Government than we thought it would. Everything developed toward armament, armament and armament up to the latest decision to produce the neutron bomb. It would, therefore, be quite proper to say on the occasion of this visit: You can't do this to us!

[Question] Your appeal for a demonstration against Haig says that U.S. policy is characterized by big power mania and merciless hardness. Could you explain these serious accusations somewhat?

[Answer] I don't know the text of the appeal, but I would say that big power mania is correct. If you viewed all statements by U.S. politicians--by leading politicians--you would see that they claim all spheres of influence throughout the world for themselves, all spheres which lie outside the Soviet sphere of influence. When I look at what is going on in the Gulf area or in Latin America, the term big power mania is quite proper in many respects.

[Question] The Berlin SPD Land Executive Board considers your action wrong and harmful.

[Answer] That is a matter for the Berlin SPD Land Executive Board. It can hold a different opinion, but after all, it is not prohibiting the demonstration by Young Socialists there and it respects the right to demonstrate. I think that is fine.

[Question] The Berlin police and the Berlin Senat fear that serious brawls will take place on Sunday. Can you guarantee a peaceful demonstration?

[Answer] I am certain that the Berlin Young Socialists and those who are involved in the demonstration will do everything to guarantee a peaceful course of events. My Berlin friends will certainly carry out the demonstration in a proper way because the demonstration is intended to be peaceful and to serve peace.

[Question] The demonstration against Haig is an example of the great rift between the Young Socialists and the SPD. How would you describe this rift?

[Answer] Actually, I do not see a great rift. I think that the SPD will find other ways to express its displeasure. The Young Socialists must have the right to state plainly what they don't like when problems of existence are involved and when peace is involved. It isn't unimportant matters that are involved here, but the danger of war and how to avoid this danger by criticizing erroneous policies in this connection.

We see at present that NATO, headed by its leading power, the United States, is not continuing along the detente policy course; it instead is steering toward confrontation and lowering the threshold of nuclear war by such decisions as the recent one on producing the neutron bomb. I believe it is necessary to state this quite clearly in view of the situation of the Federal Republic and of divided Germany. The SPD may be of a different opinion. But I believe that the stand and the fear one has regarding such measures must be clearly stated in public.

[Question] Leonid Brezhnev is supposed to come to the Federal Republic, to Bonn, in November. Demonstrations by the Young Union and other groups are expected to take place then. Will you join some of these demonstrations? Afghanistan will be involved there.

[Answer] If you follow the demonstrations by the Young Socialists, you will see that Afghanistan is always named in connection with the danger of war. We are not one-sided, but we do not hold special demonstrations for or against Afghanistan. Our ideas, which have been put down in writing, indicate that we must pursue a policy of peace and we must use every opportunity to make this world more peaceful. All the violations of international law and arms exports are criticized in our writings, regardless of which country committed them--Afghanistan is mentioned as well as El Salvador. You can be sure of that.

[Question] Who loves peace more, do you think, the Soviet Union or the Americans, or neither?

[Answer] I consider both superpowers to be equally dangerous; I consider both blocs to be equally dangerous. I believe that one must say this and exert pressure to make the two get together again, negotiate and reduce existing potentials. Naturally, both have their big power attitudes. Therefore, we must address both of them. The DKP or the Communists say it to just one side, the Union says it to the other. So we feel, therefore, quite good in saying it to both sides.

PAPER SAYS CDU/CSU GETTING U.S. ENCOURAGEMENT

[Commentary signed Jr: "Reagan Bets on Kohl"]

[Text] The CDU's Konrad Adenauer Foundation organized the conference that induced Richard Allen to come from Washington to Bonn. CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl had to play the role of host for the security adviser of the U.S. President. After being informed by the opposition leader about the situation in the Federal Republic, Allen also made his way to the federal chancellor and the foreign minister. He could easily have saved himself one visit--if the Bonn coalition had fallen apart and if Kohl had been the federal chancellor. And Kohl, if he held the top spot in Bonn, would be in an even better position during his October visit to Washington to meet President Reagan.

It can be clearly sensed that the CDU/CSU is getting all kinds of encouragement from Washington. Reagan's aides are even trying to make the West Germans realize this fact very clearly. Things did not really "click" between the SPD and the respective Washington governments: Nixon and Kissinger viewed Brandt's Ostpolitik with mistrust and envy because it seemed to be ahead of their own policy; Carter and Brzezinski also had reservations regarding Bonns' policy, although for other reasons, and Reagan clearly has indicated to Schmidt who sets the political Guidelines on the transatlantic level.

Reagan is betting on the Bonn opposition which is beyond suspicion regarding anti-Americanism now that leading SPD politicians, taking the mood at the base into consideration, have made criticism of the United States their speciality and now that the Young Socialists are preparing to give a hot reception to Secretary of State Haig in West Berlin. The Americans, who are used to sharp political criticism in their own country, have become sensitive when this criticism comes from Europe and particularly from the Federal Republic. In Bonn they are frankly playing up to the old new allies.

STATE SECRETARY DISCUSSES INTRA-GERMAN TRADE

[Text] Leipzig, 8 Sep (DPA)--Opportunities continue for expanding intra-German trade, according to both sides. Following a 1-hour discussion with GDR Foreign Trade Minister Horst Soelle during the Leipzig fair, State Secretary Dieter von Wuerzen of the Federal Economics Ministry said today that a not unexpected pause in growth occurred during the first half of 1981.

Trade is characterized by very stable basic business which also offers opportunities for the future. During the first half of this year, intra-German trade increased by 4 percent to a volume of almost 6 billion marks, whereby exports to the GDR increased by 6 percent and imports to the Federal Republic, by 3 percent. In the previous year, on the other hand, an unusually high increase of almost 19 percent took place.

Von Wuerzen stated with regard to this development that there is a solid basis for German-German trade but new beginnings must also be sought. The state secretary also said that he drew attention during his meeting with Soelle to the GDR's strong pressure for offset deals which, in view of the GDR's surplus in pure goods trade, was not quite understandable.

As Von Wuerzen confirmed, the subject of "swing" was not discussed. The present agreement on interest free credit on overdrafts, whose upper limit is currently 850 million units of account and which the GDR extensively uses, expires at the end of this year. If no new agreement is concluded, the "swing" would automatically revert to 200 million units of account.

The state secretary merely said on this subject that both governments are aware of the situation. He drew attention to the Federal Government's statement last October, shortly after the drastic increase in the compulsory exchange rate for Western visitors to the GDR, saying that the "swing" problem is also part of the overall context of political relations between the Federal Republic and the GDR.

NEWSPAPER CITES NEED FOR U.S. MILITARY PRESENCE

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "A Macabre Vision"]

[Text] "Treaties wither like roses and young girls." With this lyrically formulated thesis, De Gaulle justified his decision to set up the force de frappe. The French chief of state did not believe that Europe could rely always on the nuclear protection of America. Moreover, he considered it unlikely that the great overseas ally would keep a whole army for an unlimited time in the French operative forefield, the Federal Republic. That was contradicted by all historic experiences, he claimed. De Gaulle, therefore, did not reckon with NATO's continuity. So Paris embarked logically on its own regarding armament.

Did reality disprove De Gaulle and his mistrust? The Americans continue to be militarily present in Europe. President Reagan indirectly even offered reinforcement of nuclear defense: The neutron bomb is being produced with a view to European security needs. So NATO is not "withering."

Not yet. The European allies make it difficult for the strongest partner to comply with the commitments of the alliance. The Norwegian and Danish allies toy in Scandinavia with the Soviet idea to set up a nuclear-free northern region.

Belgium, the Netherlands and, somewhat behind them, also the Federal Republic come up with always new arguments to prevent the execution of the military part of NATO's dual decision. In rejecting the neutron weapon, Bonn is heading the field of inner-Atlantic adversaries of American military-political initiatives. What would happen if the responsible people in Washington became tired of stepping in for Europe which does not want to be defended by America?

After all, governments are not immediately insulted if their decisions are being critically viewed. The frank word belongs to an alliance of democratic states. Military withdrawal of the Americans from Europe would be an historic event; such decisions are not being made overnight. But the Europeans seem to have forgotten that there was always the latent preparedness of the United States to clear the old continent. It has cost great efforts through many years to ward off the thrusts of Senator Mansfield. He demanded with amazing doggedness the withdrawal of several American divisions. The Federal Republic had to pay many an additional dollar to make the operative U.S. units stay. It has spent enormous sums on armament orders in the United States just to make the American soldiers stay.

The attempt of American military experts had to be warded off with much skill over and over again to move the forward defense line backwards.

All that seems to be eliminated from the memory. One takes it for granted that the Reagan government will not correct its Atlantic policy. It has gone even so far that the currently present good will of the Americans to reinforce the so-called forward defense is not being appreciated. General Meyer, the commander in chief of the U.S. Army, suggested moving the American divisions located in the Kreuznach-Mannheim area to a location east of the Rhine. The Bonn government reacted only halfheartedly to the ideas of the U.S. general. First, because of fears over the costs with which one would have to cope (they are too high). But mainly because the idea does not fit into the Ostpolitik concept of leftist Social Democrats. Moving American brigades into a forward position would improve not only the operative mobility of the NATO front, the military move would be a stabilizing element of the whole pact. It would be the most convincing evidence that the Americans want to defend Europe in a wide forward position. Such a transfer would demonstrate to the Soviet Union that the 7th Army and its air force units and the dependents are voluntarily prepared to enlarge their so-called hostage role in Germany. Washington cannot demonstrate more clearly that it wants to link its fate with that of the Germans.

But instead of partnership-like appreciation there are quarrels. Psychostrategically, Europe shows a lack of feeling in how to deal with the American allies. The British are an example. The French, too, show strategic understanding. Both have a more clear view than Germans, Belgians, Netherlanders and Norwegians regarding the consequences of an American withdrawal. Even the withdrawal of parts of the American units, the transfer of divisions and air squadrons to England or Portugal, would cause the collapse of the conventional defense system in Europe. France's military border would begin at the Rhine; the buffer zone Federal Republic would be gone. Great Britain would lose its maritime forefield in the North Atlantic, because without the middle front Norway could not be defended. It would mean that England and Scotland would become the most advanced frontline of Soviet air raids. The Federal Republic and the Benelux states would lie there unprotected and exposed to political blackmailing just like Finland. A macabre vision? It is still up to us to prevent it from becoming reality.

MITTERRAND MEETS WITH SAUDI ARABIA'S PRINCE FAHD

[Text] Paris, 8 Sep (AFP)--Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Fahd had a "long and cordial" talk here today with President Francois Mitterrand, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson said after the meeting.

Neither the prince nor Mr Mitterrand made a statement after the 45-minute talk, but Mr Cheysson said it notably concerned the visit the French president is to make to Saudi Arabia at the end of the month.

Observers said that apart from Mr Mitterrand's forthcoming trip--his first official journey abroad since taking power in May--the meeting had been expected to focus on the Saudi plan for peace in the Middle East, which Riyadh proposed early last month.

[Text] Paris, 9 Sep (AFP)--The Paris stock exchange today suspended dealing in shares of companies threatened with nationalisation, on the orders of the Ministry of the Economy.

Quotations were suspended as soon as the exchange opened this morning. The measure is aimed at speculators dealing in the shares of these firms, mainly in the aviation, petrochemical and arms sectors.

The share suspension covers nine major industrial firms, 20 financial houses and France's three main banks which are already nationalised--Banque Nationale de Paris (BNP); Credit Lyonnais; and Societe Generale.

The nine industrial groups are: Dassault Aviation, Matra, Compagnie d'Electricite, Pechiney-Ugine-Kuhlmann, Rhone-Poulenc, Saint Gobain, Thomson-Brandt, USINOR and SACILOR.

LE FIGARO DISCUSSES FRENCH FOREIGN POLICY

PM040930 Paris LE FIGARO in French 27 Aug 81 pp 1, 4

[Paul-Marie de la Gorce article: "Atlanticism and Third Worldism"]

[Text] As soon as he returned from his visit to India, Cheysson, our minister of external relations, started preparing for a visit to the Near East. Since he became minister, he has made long tours and everyone of them has enabled him to meet people and make speeches, remarks and statements. Undoubtedly, his strong personality has enabled him to set a special imprint on these activities, but since he has certainly expressed the president's views and since the latter has already had several opportunities to divulge his options and orientations, it has been possible to detect in them some indications of France's foreign policy.

The satisfaction shown by the United States with respect to French foreign policy's new orientations is an essential--or at least most spectacular--fact. This satisfaction is the greater because it contrasts with the concern first shown about the appointment of some Communist ministers whose aim may also have been to encourage the French Government to prove that its foreign policy would not be affected by this. Be that as it may, this satisfaction shows--in the American press, official statements and, especially, unofficial confidences and talks with American leaders. Obviously, it can be explained by a whole number of French stances consistent with Washington's wishes.

The French Government has made some most intransigent statements on Afghanistan and has let it be known that as long as the Red Army remains there it will not resume "normal" relations with the Soviet Union. Unofficial newspapers--they are numerous enough to compete for this title--have explained, anyway, that this means that, unless some major changes occur, there will be no more French-Soviet "summits." And Cheysson, who has met several dozen foreign ministers, has not yet met Gromyko--and he will not see him before the coming UN session. All this has ended for the time being the special relationship between France and Russia which has so long given rise to U.S. distrust and ill humor.

Furthermore, by publicly supporting--unlike his predecessor--the idea of deploying American Euromissiles in Europe, President Mitterrand has placed his authority and influence at the service of a venture of whose success Washington is not yet quite certain. In addition, he has on his own initiative practically put an end to the "European initiative" aimed at ensuring a comprehensive settlement in the Near East by letting it be known that he disagreed wtih some of its points and that he, on the other hand, approved of the "step-by-step" policy and the Camp David accords. This is what the United States has always wanted. And all this applies even to Iran where, as a result of a sequence of events, France has found itself, side by side with the United States, among the present regime's implacable enemies.

Presented in this way, French foreign policy seems to be marked with the seal of a long-forgotten Atlanticism. However, the government's supporters and spokesmen object to such an assessment. They assert that French policy has above all been marked by its bold and generous orientations with respect to the Third World. They recall the indeed solemn and lucid statements by the president on the importance of new relations between rich and poor countries and the emphasis placed on special relations with certain key Latin American, African and Asian countries, that is, Mexico, Algeria and India. They recall the categorical tone used by the government to condemn South Africa and to demand a rapid settlement in Namibia. And finally, they emphasize the significance of Cheysson's visit to Central America where he indeed was able to find the right words to show France's understanding for peoples who are seeking--often by radical means--to achieve economic and political liberation.

Does this mean that there is a French policy which is both Atlanticist and Third Worldist and corresponds in some ways to the old trends in the late French section of the Workers International and to the policy which it supported under the Fourth Republic, and later, against General de Gaulle, and in some other ways to some newer factions of the PS both on its right and on its left? If this is the case, this policy could well soon appear contradictory and imbalanced.

Imbalanced, because it shows the very narrow limits of this "Third Worldism." There is nothing new in the statement that no more arms will be sold to South Africa--such a decision was made at the beginning of Giscard d'Estaing's term of office. And when Francois-Poncet was in charge, the Quai d'Orsay was already impatient with American diplomacy's wavering and vaccilation with respect to settling the Namibian problem. Mitterrand's predecessor also visited Mexico, Algeria and India and it was, in fact, on the occasion of his meeting with Mrs Gandhi that his foreign policy was formulated most clearly. Since we have criticized here some of the French military interventions in Africa, we were bound to approve of the new government's desire to devise a new type of French-African cooperation. However, it has maintained our expeditionary corps in Central Africa and, rightly or wrongly, all Africans believe that by doing this it has enabled President Dacko to hold on to power. Francois-Poncet had already mentioned the need to find a "political solution" to the El Salvador problem and this obviously meant that he was not in favor of the purely military solution which the United States wanted. And if we were to allow ourselves to be ironical about such subjects, we could observe that even though Giscard d'Estaing showed much understanding with respect to the Iranian revolution, Socialist France has allowed monarchist organizations to operate on its territory....

In fact, the limits to French policy with respect to the Third World have not escaped the attention of France's interlocutors, especially in relation to a problem as serious as that of the Near East, where France has suddenly abandoned the role of leader and pioneer which it has played for so long. But perhaps Cheysson's visit there at the end of the week will provide an opportunity for restoring things to their proper order. And it is true that the tensions and crises which have been erupting in Africa, Asia and Central America have become challenges to a policy which, even though it is supposed to be settled and consistent, must face up to daily events.

The most serious question which arises with respect to it is that pertaining to its contradictions. For the French policy's authority and effectiveness in the Third World has always been and will always be a function of its independence. Now in our times, independence is determined in relation to the two superpowers, the freedom of action which can be preserved with respect to either of them and the special relations with are maintained with each of them. Three successive presidents, with no ideological affinity with the Soviet Union whatever, have established and maintained special relations with it because they have been conscious that a state which does not keep its options open and does not take advantage of them cannot have any autonomous existence in the present system of international relations. And experience shows that this rules out neither serious divergences with Moscow nor considerable convergences with Washington.

It must be said that the trends which have prevailed in the past 3 months are different and that this has jeopardized all the efforts which have rightly been made to give French policy a certain image in the Third World. Obviously, we would like to believe that we are unduly pessimistic in this respect and that this is merely a transitional stage or phase for, in fact, no foreign policy can be assessed after 3 months, and it will be possible to express and shape that of France more clearly in the future. It can only be hoped that this will be so since it must be said, disregarding any partisan prejudices, that it is of capital importance that the country preserve its role and stature in the world.

DEFENSE MINISTER ANSWERS AL-QADHDHAFI THREATS

[Text] Rome, 8 Sep (ANSA)--Libyan leader, Colonel Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi's September first threats against Italy, Greece and Turkey are being taken seriously by the NATO command and by Italy's defense officials.

Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio (a socialist) has granted several interviews on the subject over the past week.

Today CORRIERE DELLA SERA published another Lagorio interview which outlined Italy's defensive military strategy with great clarity. The minister said that while Al-Qadhdhafi's threats were not theoretically impossible to carry out it was so difficult as to be virtually unfeasible. He said the task of Italian defense was to create conditions whereby any such attack would be far too costly for Libya in all senses.

The installation of 112 cruise missiles in Comiso, Sicily, is party of Italy's modernization of its defensive system aimed at discouraging any offensive action by others. Another part of this scheme will be a strengthening of the air force squadrons in the south, and improved military training. Lagorio noted in this context that land, air and sea exercises are planned in Sicily and in the Ionian.

The defense minister also revealed that Italian arms supplies to Libya are about to come to an end, that the radar system in the south would be bolstered and that a civil and military lightning intervention force would become operative in 1983 at a cost to the state of 650 billion lire (around 500 million dollars).

IRAQI ENVOY MARKS ANNIVERSARY OF MIDEAST CONFLICT

[Text] Rome, 5 Sep (ANSA)--The Iraqi ambassador to Rome, (Taha Ahmad al-Dawud), has stated that his country is forced to continue a war that it does not want even though it is certain of victory.

The diplomat was speaking at a press conference organized here yesterday to mark what he called the first anniversary of the start of the Iraq-Iran conflict. He said that it was Iran to open the hostilities on September 4 of last year and not on the 22nd as Tehran maintains. [as published] He stressed that it was time to find a negotiated solution to the conflict.

The ambassador also said that civil war was rife in Iran which had become "a coffin of corpses."

POPE CALLS SOLIDARITY CONGRESS 'IMPORTANT EVENT'

AU071500 Rome ANSA in English 0930 GMT 7 Sep 81

[Excerpts] Castelgandolfo, 7 Sep (ANSA)--Pope John Paul II Sunday said that the congress the independent union Solidarity is holding in Gdansk is an important event in the life of Poland.

He also said he was deeply moved to learn that a cross taken down during Stalinism had been returned to its spot in one of the city's squares.

John Paul made these remarks to a group of Polish pilgrims here prior to reciting the Angelus.

A crowd of over 15,000 persons filled the courtyard and square in front of the pope's summer residence in Castelgandolfo, some twenty kilometers south of Rome. The pope appeared before the crowd for over half an hour, and his words were also heard by another 10,000 people in St Peter's Square in Rome which was hooked up with the summer residence by radio.

Turning to speak to two groups from Solidarity, the pope said he could not forget the important events that occurred a year ago in Gdansk, Szczecin and in other parts of Poland. "Nor can we forget the Solidarity congress which has begun in these days, the anniversary of the events of last year," he added.

He also said that he was moved to learn that a cross has been replaced at Westerplatte, one of the first points along the Polish border violated by Hitler 42 years ago.

Recalling the six million Poles who died during the Second World War, the pope said he was convinced that this sowing of so much death hau strengthened the people's will and right to live as a nation with its own culture, its own individuality and its own way of seeing social issues. He said taht these six million dead were the Polish people's contribution for their right to independence and the sovereign existance of their state.

He said he spoke of this a year ago and repeated this now in the context of the events of September 1, 1939. He concluded by saying that "respect for the right of our nation, like that of any other, is a condition for international harmony and world peace."

NOTE REJECTS SOVIET PUBLICATION OF MEMORANDUM

LD091222 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1130 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] The Soviet Union's publication of the memorandum, on which we reported yesterday and through which the Soviet charge d'affaires expressed his country's attitude toward Spain's joining NATO, has further complicated relations between the two countries. Spain immediately returned the document, considering it to be an intrusion into our country's internal affairs. The Diplomatic Information Office of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs has issued a note rejecting the publication of the document because it represents another and more flagrant attempt by the Soviet Union to interfere. The note also says that by publishing the document the Soviet Union is trying to influence Spain's decision, while there is no possibility of Spain taking a similar action in the Soviet Union.

The Spanish note also says that Spain does not believe that its membership in NATO will represent any danger to the Soviet Union and it restates the Madrid government's attitude of opposition to any foreign intervention in matters that are the sole interest of our country.

CONGRESS OF DEPUTIES DEBATES NATO ENTRY PROCEDURE

LD042345 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1730 GMT 4 Sep 81

[Excerpt] The officers of the Congress of Deputies have failed to reach the necessary unanimous agreement to allow the government's request for Spanish entry into NATO to be dealt with procedurally by the Foreign Affairs Committee. Therefore, in accordance with congress rules, the congress plenum at its first session--which is expected to take place on 15 September--will decide on the procedure to follow.

It is possible that in this debate the socialists will demand a ruling from the constitutional court on whether accession to NATO should be by ordinary or organic law and whether, therefore, it will require a simple majority of the deputies present or half plus one of the total number of congress deputies.

MINISTER WARNS OF NONRENEWAL OF U.S. TREATY

LD091120 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0600 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] Foreign Minister Perez Llorca is quoted as saying that Spain will not renew its friendship and cooperation treaty with the United States if it does not join NATO. The statement was made at a meeting in Madrid for foreign correspondents only. The report has been issued by AFP. In the view of the agency, this warning from the Spanish minister that there will be no bilateral pacts outside NATO [as heard] is aimed at Spanish public opinion and at European governments of the same political persuasion as the main opposition party in the hope that they will put pressure on Felipe Gonzalez [general secretary of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party] to accept the government's pro-Atlantic policy. We repeat that this judgment and the report itself comes from the French agency AFP.

SOCIALISTS EXPLAIN STANCE ON NATO, U.S. TREATY

PM030936 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 29 Aug 81 p 11

[Excerpt] Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] Deputy and Congress Defense Committee Deputy Chairman Enrique Mugica told the EFE news agency yesterday that the socialist party could reconsider its current policy of support for the renewal of the agreements with the United States for "strict reasons of patriotism and national security."

Enrique Mugica stated that the PSOE had declared itself in favor of the bilateral treaty with the United States provided that it remained independent from the NATO issue, but now, in view of the international policy of the Union of the Democratic Center [UCD], "which is characterized by pretense and deception," and in which it has been pointed out that the bilateral treaty is subordinate to entry into NATO, the socialist party could change its stance on the bilateral agreement with Washington.

Deputy Mugica also stated that the PSOE had set special conditions for the agreement with Washington, such as equal rights in the negotiations, the guaranteeing of the defense of Ceuta and Melilla, the modernization of Spanish arms, absolute primacy of Spanish jurisdiction and nonutilization of the bases in conflicts with third countries.

In addition, PSOE Secretary for Organization Carmen Garcia Bloise stated in Oviedo yesterday that if the UCD takes Spain into NATO, the socialist party, "when it governs," will decide in the light of international and national circumstances whether it will maintain Spain's presence in NATO. This assertion amends a previous assertion by Felipe Gonzalez in parliament, in which the opposition leader categorically stated that if the UCD government forced through entry into NATO with a vote in parliament approved by a simple majority, the socialist party would also take Spain out of NATO by a simple majority if it attained power.

CARRILLO DENIES SOVIET INFLUENCE ON NATO POLICY

There were two main subjects at the press conference which Santiago Carrillo gave at midday today: toxic pneumonia and Spanish membership of NATO. Santiago Carrillo said that his parliamentary group intends to ake a tough but responsible attitude at the congress plenary session on 15 September, which will debate the subject of the adulterated rapeseed oil which has caused more than 100 deaths.

On the question of Spain's joining NATO, Santiago Carrillo said that the Democratic Center Union [UCD] is pushing for membership in the Atlantic bloc in a hasty, shadowy and furtive way:

[Begin Carrillo recording] Our opposition to Spain's joining NATO is not so much opposition to NATO as defense of what we regard as national interests and the interests of the cause of peace. Some publicists have tried to identity our position with that of one of the [word indistinct] powers, with the Soviet Union. However, I should like to say that our position has nothing to do with the position of the Soviet Union. We said at our congress that the class struggle in the international arena is not waged through the confrontation between the two blocs existing in the world today but rather through their abolition. [end recording]

Santiago Carrillo stressed yet again that such an important decision as this requires that the people should be able to express their view in a referendum. For the PCE secretary general, if the UCD goes ahead with taking Spain into NATO without a referendum, a policy of accord between government and opposition will be impossible. Carrillo also criticized the Basque Nationalist Party and the Convergence and Unity of Catalonia for trading concessions for their respective communities for votes in favor of joining NATO, Finally, Carrillo said that if scapegoats are to be sought for the government crisis, if indeed there is a crisis, then the whole government ought to resign.

OLESEN REJECTS SITING N-WEAPONS IN COUNTRY

[Text] Copenhagen, 5 Sep (AFP)--Denmark will "never authorize the deployment of neutron bombs on Danish territory," Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen told a Social-Democratic Party rally at Aalborg tonight. The Danish minister criticized the U.S. decision to produce the enhanced-radiation weapon and suggested that the nuclear-free area should be extended in Europe. "It is a fact that the north (of Europe) is a denuclearized region, but this zone should be enlarged on both sides of the dividing line which runs between Eastern and Western Europe," Olesen said.

In a footnote addressed to both Moscow and Washington, he said Denmark "does not accept that the Soviet Union should automatically blame the United States for all the ills of the world, but on the other hand we cannot agree with (U.S. Defense Secretary) Caspar Weinberger when he suggests that the goal should be to gain military superiority over the Soviet Union.

Nuclear Policy Paper

[Excerpt] Copenhagen, 6 Sep (AFP)--Danish Social Democrats have agreed to delete the words "in time of peace" from an existing written policy opposing the deployment of nuclear arms in Denmark. Meeting yesterday for their anual conference in Aalborg, members of Denmark's ruling party decided to replace the phrase with a statement that the Social Democrats henceforth "wish to work for the non-deployment of atomic weapons on Danish soil."

Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen had cautioned against the move, warning that the deletion could be interpreted as meaning that Denmark would refuse to accept atomic weapons even in wartime. Jorgensen, who is also party leader, said he did not want a categorical statement because "no one knows how the world will be in five years, ten years or twenty years." He added that the question of a nuclear-free region would be discussed in the coming year.

JORGENSEN BLAMES USSR FOR EAST-WEST TENSION

PM071552 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 2 Sep 81 p 7

[Text] Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen, in his role as Social Democratic Party chairman, yesterday dismissed Soviet attempts to throw doubt on Western leaders' willingness to disarm, at the same time stating that Soviet rearmament is one of the most important causes of the deterioration in the international situation.

In a letter to the CPSU Central Committee, delivered to the Soviet Embassy in Copenhagen yesterday, the prime minister replied in his role as Social Democratic Party chairman to the 18 May letter from the Central Committee to the Social Democratic Party. In his letter Jorgensen said: "It is wrong of Soviet circles to cast doubts on the motives of Western leaders, because they have pointed to Soviet rearmament as one of the most important reasons for the deterioration in the international situation. The dialogue must take place in an atmosphere of mutual respect." Jorgensen also wrote that the Social Democratic Party is a supporter of continued dialogue between nations, "the necessity of which is further underlined by the considerable difficulties which have characterized the relationship between East and West since the end of 1979." That period saw the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

ROK PRIME MINISTER DEFENDS DOMESTIC POLICY

[Text] Helsinki, 8 Sep (AFP)--South Korean Prime Minister Nam Tok-u, here on an official visit, today defended his government's internal policy and claimed the Cabinet has already "made some progress in the human rights issue." Referring at a press conference to the "incidents" in Kwangju, the southern city where South Korean troops put down a mass uprising in May 1980, Nam said that all but one arrested in the city have already been released.

Commenting on his talks here with his Finnish counterpart, Mauno Koivisto, Nam said that the discussions had been "very frank and useful". According to government sources, the talks had focussed on economic issues.

Last night some 50 people held a demonstration near the government banquet hall where Koivisto gave a dinner in honour of Nam. This afternoon Nam paid a visit to Parliament and had talks with the speaker, Johannes Virolainen. Nam, who arrived here yesterday from Denmark after visiting Sweden, is due to leave tomorrow for Belgium.

HAMRE URGES EXTRA DEFENSE BUDGET FUNDING

PM041015 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 29 Aug 81 p 8

[Knut Falchenberg report]

[Excerpt] Kongsberg, 28 Aug--"If the defense forces are to be able to maintain their activities at today's level we will need additional funds of 225-250 million kroner in the present year," Defense chief Sverre Hamre told AFTENPOSTEN. Price rises are the reason why cracks are appearing in this year's budget.

At the final session of this year's national conference of defense force representatives being held at Heistadmoen, the defense chief touched on the economy. He said price rises this year had been greater than the defense budget had allowed. Present estimates now indicate that the budget's purchasing power in 1981 will be considerably reduced, Hamre said.

"Obviously the probability of full price compensation is limited, but naturally I hope the government will propose additional funds that will protect the defense forces," Hamre said, pointing out that in the revised national budget for 1981 the government stated that as part of its tighter financial policy it would only grant additional funds to compensate for price rises to the smallest extent possible.

Gen Sverre Hamre told AFTENPOSTEN that the defense forces would have to reduce their activities unless a significant level of compensation for price rises is achieved.

KIPRIANOU COMMENTS ON MISSING PERSONS COMMITTEE

NC041855 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 4 Sep 81

[Text] In a statement today on the question of missing persons, Republic President Kiprianou underlined: We are not prepared to become implicated in an intermittent dialogue on procedural matters at the missing persons committee, which would lead the most important humanitarian aspect of the Cyprus problem into a deadlock.

Kiprianou mentioned that right from its first meetings the committee found itself face to face with a number of procedural problems and that despite its 10 meetings, it unfortunately was unable to reach an agreement on these procedural problems so that it might proceed to the fundamental task, which is to search for and trace the fate of missing persons.

The president said that a satisfactory solution of procedural problems is an imperative condition if the committee is to start its fundamental task. Kiprianou also expressed disappointment, because, unfortunately, it was impossible to solve these problems despite the continual efforts being made on our part, undertaken with patience, good will and a spirit of cooperation.

Kiprianou stressed: We will continue to make every possible effort and we will exhaust all available possibilities for cooperation to find the indicated practical solutions which will quickly open up the way toward commencement of the investigation of the fate of missing persons in a convincing and total manner. The president, however explained that the other side must also demonstrate a similar spirit of cooperation and understanding.

PROTEST TO UNFICYP ON ROAD USE BY GREEK CYPRIOTS

[Text] The Greek Cypriots' attempts to forcefully use Karaolis Street in Ayios Pavlos, in Lefkosa [Nicosia], a road unused for 7 years, were protested at UNFICYP [UN forces in Cyprus]. Following the protest launched by the Turkish Cypriot side, UNFICYP did not allow the Greek Cypriots to use the road.

The Turkish Cypriot Security Forces Command issued a statement today in connection with this Greek Cypriot action which created tension. The statement says: A protest has been launchkd with UNFICYP in connection with the Greek Cypriot attempts to use Karaolis Street in Ayios Pavlos. Talks to prove that we are justified continue with UNFICYP.

The Greek Cypriots had tried to use Karaolis Street a while ago under the pretext of bringing food to the Greek Cypriot positions in the area. However, following a Turkish Cypriot protest, UNFICYP did not allow the Greek Cypriots to use the road. Despite that, the Greek Cypriot National Guard continued with the provocations and threatened to use the road by force.

DENKTAS TO LONDON, NEW YORK ON NORTH'S PROPOSALS

TA081214 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Text] President Denktas leaves Cyprus tomorrow for visits to London and New York. In London, he will be having talks with officials of the Foreign Office, and in New York he will have contacts at the United Nations. He is expected to stay there until September the 29th. Later this month, he will be joined in New York by the foreign minister, Mr Atakol, and a delegation from the legislative assembly. In a statement, Mr Denktas said that he aims to explain that the recent Turkish Cypriot proposals on a Cyprus settlement were constructive.

Denying that he would have a meeting in New York with the Greek Cypriot leader Mr Kiprianou, he said that he would be having further contacts in Europe on his way to Cyprus. He said: If the Greek Cypriots decide to break off the intercommunal talks and take the Cyprus problem to the United Nations again, no one would consider this to be a good-will gesture. Describing the Turkish Cypriot proposals as fair and comprehensive, President Denktas said: The proposals suggested a framework which would not allow the repetition of the persecution of the Turkish Cypriot people by the Greek Cypriot leadership during the years from 1964 to 1974. Referring to the tension created by the Greek Cypriots with regard to Karaolis Street in the buffer zone in Nicosia, Mr Denktas said that it was a matter which should not be exaggerated by the Greek Cypriot side. It was a question of maintaining the status quo there and negotiations were continuing within that framework.

PAPER SCORES LUNS STATEMENT ON STRONG TURKEY

NC060905 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 6 Sep 81 p 3

[From the "Freely" column: "But Also a Factor of Oppression"]

[Text] In a statement at Smyrna, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns said that a strong Turkey is a stabilizing factor in the eastern Mediterranean. From his point of view, Mr Luns is not at fault. But a strong Turkey is also a factor of oppression against Cyprus. It is a factor that tries to arbitrarily impose its views on a solution of the Cyprus issue.

As the highest NATO official, Mr Luns should know that with whatever the Turks have done in Cyprus, they have violated the first article of the statute of the alliance of which he is the head. Is this what the NATO members and leaders want? Let them tell us, so we will become aware of it. They should do and support what they say.

AKEL LEADER CITES OPPOSITION TO NORTH'S PROPOSALS

[Text] Addressing a meeting of party cadres on current developments of the Cyprus issue, AKEL Assistant Secretary General Fandis explained AKEL's position on the latest Turkish proposals. He said the AKEL Political Bureau, after studying the proposals, established that they do not assist the conduct of a substantive and constructive dialogue and they cannot be a basis for a proper, just and viable solution to the Cyprus issue.

Consequently, he added, they cannot be considered satisfactory. He stated that the principles which rule the Turkish proposals and the structure of federation as it is defined by the Turkish side violate the four guidelines and specific points of the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement, the UN resolutions and the Waldheim formula of 9 August 1980.

Fandis stated that the AKEL Political Bureau also resolved that it would not be correct tactics on our part to limit ourselves to the submission of a written document and to attach continuation or suspension of the talks to the intent of the other side. For this reason, he added, in parallel with the submission of our reasoned views, our side must also make it clear that it remains devoted to the process of intercommunal talks which must be substantial and constructive, and that it is willing and determined to make a positive contribution in this direction by expanding and analyzing our proposals and, wherever necessary, improving them both on the constitutional and territorial issues.

In reference to an appeal to the United Nations, the AKEL assistant secretary general said that his party's position on insistence on substantive and constructive talks in no way excludes a parallel preparation for such an appeal which must be presented to the UN at the suitable moment, and, he concluded, we can state that such a preparation is already in progress.

O AGON CRITICIZES AKEL POSITION ON TALKS ISSUE

[From the "My Opinion" column by "Observer": "Improvement for Whom?"]

[Text] AKEL will have to furnish an explanation on its new position to improve the Greek Cypriot proposals on the constitutional and territorial issues, because what Fandis said leads one to certain conclusions which, in themselves, raise questions.

Fandis spoke about an expansion and analysis of our 1977 proposals and, to a degree, this position is most certainly clear and understandable. He, however, went beyond this and also spoke about improving the proposals without explaining what he means about the term "improving." We ask: Improvement for whom? Improvement for our side or for the Turks? It is on this very point that AKEL has to supply an answer because the most logical explanation--also accepted by most people--is that with what he said, Fandis has fundamentally introduced the question of new concessions by the Greek Cypriot side. Apparently AKEL asks for a readjustment of our 1977 proposals--described by Makarios himself as "painful concessions"--for the worse, or it asks for the submission of new ones--under the excuse of improving the old ones--which, however, will be even more painful than the Makarios proposals.

When does AKEL make such a recommendation? It makes it at a most unsuitable and inopportune moment. It makes it at a time when Turkish intransigence and provocation are climaxing, at a time when the Turkish side, as AKEL itself admits, submits unacceptable constitutional proposals which provide for partition and two separate states and territorial proposals--a fallacy--which return a percentage of territory amounting to only 2.85 percent.

We are realistic enough to understand that a time will come when we will have to consider some sort of amendment to certain points of the Makarios proposals. The time, however, cannot be today. This issue will arise when the Turks decide to submit debatable and logical proposals both on the constitutional and the territorial issues. It is only then that we will also consider whether it would be useful to take a step beyond that which we took in 1979. Today, however, every step toward crossing the safety margins set down by the Makarios proposals would be out of the question, untimely and dangerous.

We very clearly declare that we strongly oppose any new concession on our part, whether small or large, before the Turks make similar concessions. We cannot retreat simply in order to satisfy and allegedly convince the foreigners as some people argue we must. While the foreigners are neither satisfied nor convinced by our concessions, such a policy, by contrast, only benefits Denktas, who slowly pushes us, with the tolerance of some people on our side, into the corner he wants us in.

We will recall the statement of a Greek mainland politician who is well versed in Turkish diplomatic strategy: On every point of dispute, he said, the Turks never or very rarely proceed to submitting their own proposals. Under various pretexts, and with different maneuvers, they force the other side to submit one proposal after another and to proceed from concession to concession until such proposals approach the Turkish positions. The difference is then resolved in such a way that it conforms to Turkish views.

This is the trap that Denktas is setting for us today. Without submitting any debatable proposals, without retreating a single step from what he demands, he wants us to submit proposals which he then rejects as unacceptable and asks for new concessions from us at a time when we have absolutely nothing more to give--until he leads us where he wants to. We, or some of us, play his game and we recommend new concessions in order to satisfy and allegedly convince the foreigners, as if the degree to which the foreigners will be satisfied depends on the degree of our concessions instead of on the firmness of our support for certain positions and principles which will guarantee our natural survival on the land where we were born.

O KIRIKAS ON DISAGREEMENTS WITHIN COUNCIL

NC081346 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 8 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] The National Council met yesterday under President Kiprianou and exchanged views on the further handling of the Cyprus issue. The 2 and 1/2 hour meeting, which will be continued today, was attended by Papaioannou and Fandis of AKEL; Kliridhis and Matsis of the Democratic Rally; Lissaridhis and Khatzidhimitriou of EDEK; Poskotis and Galanos of the Democratic Party; Interior Minister Veniamin, acting for the foreign minister; Interlocutor Ioannidhis; and advisers M. Triandafillidhis and Mrs Stella Souliotou.

According to authoritative reports available to O KIRIKAS, the meeting extensively examined views on: one--the necessity of submitting or not submitting a second document or counterproposal to the proposals of the Turkish side; and, two--in case of such a submission, the exact content.

According to our information, the socialist party EDEK was against the submission of any counterproposal to the Turkish side because this would constitute "a new and painful concession" by the Greek Cypriot side. EDEK insisted on the further internationalization of the Cyprus issue and to a new direct resort to the United Nations, an eventuality which would restore the Cyprus issue to its proper dimensions.

AKEL, in constrast, although it described the Turkish proposals as unacceptable, strongly insisted on the preparation and submission by the Greek Cypriot side of new "improved" proposals for the solution of the Cyprus issue. Analytically, AKEL argued that the Greek Cypriot side must prepare an integral constitutional plan on the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus issue and to considerably improve proposals on the territorial aspect.

As we were informed, an intensive discussion was carried out on this point between the leaders of AKEL and EDEK, the chairman of which at one point asked: "Who is going to prepare the new map? Who will give away our territories?"

According to our information, the leader of the Democratic Rally, Kliridhis, appears to favor the submission of counterproposals to the Turkish side, but with particular emphasis on the question of priority to the resettlement of Varosha. Kliridhis argued, as he did on the first document, the memorandum, in favor of a special and convincing reference to the second document submitted to the Turkish side on the question of Varosha.

The position of the Cypriot Government, and particularly that of the president, remains totally unclear because during yesterday's meeting Kiprianou was satisfied to "listen" rather than to "talk," simply arguing that the handling [of the issue] should be on the basis of developments. According to reports available to O KIRIKAS, Interlocutor Ioannidhis strongly disagrees with this position and insists that there must be a perpetual study and planning of each one of our moves so that we may act in advance of developments instead of moving after developments.

According to our information, Ioannidhis supports a detailed preparation of our proposals on the constitutional issue, but rejects the submission of new proposals on the territorial issue. Ioannidhis insists that on the territorial issue we must in no way deviate from the proposals already submitted to the Turkish side.

It is, in conclusion, mentioned that the Turkish side, as underlined by Turkish Interlocutor Onan at the last meeting of the intercommunal talks, will wait for Greek counterproposals in order to continue the dialogue. Otherwise, as he let it be understood, the dialogue could not be continued. It is recalled that during the Vienna talks of March-April 1977 the Turks had rejected our proposals both on the constitutional and the territorial issues, particularly describing the map submitted by us on the two regions as a snake.

LIBYAN ENVOY COMMENTS ON AL-QADHDHAFI STATEMENT

NC081716 Athens NEWS in English 8 Sep 81 p 4

[Text] The secretary of Libya's Bureau in Athens 'Ali Maris reiterated his country's oft-declared traditional friendship with Greece and said that the recent statement made by Col Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi on the U.S.-Libyan aerial clash were misinterpreted. A strong confirmation of friendship for Greece was also re-stated in an announcement by the council of Arab ambassadors accredited to Athens.

Addressing a press conference at the Holiday Inn hotel yesterday, Mr 'Ali Maris explained that at his recent meeting with the Greek foreign minister no protest had been made. The minister had only expressed his surprise at the reported words of the Libyan leader, which, said Mr 'Ali Maris "were distorted by the mass media."

He stressed that Col al-Qadhdhafi had made no threats, as widely reported by the media, and quoted the Libyan leader as saying that "if American bases in Western Europe and the Mediterranean Sea take part in...(a future) attack by the U.S. Sixth Fleet...(then) when it attacks us, or if NATO backs it we will have the right to attack these bases."

He further quoted Col al-Qadhdhafi as saying: "Let Sicily, Crete, Greece, Turkey and Western Europe hear that America places these peoples in danger." He said this should be considered as the official reply to the Greek Foreign Ministry statement.

MESIMVRINI CRITICIZES LUNS IZMIR STATEMENT

NC051635 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 5 Sep 81 p 4

[Editorial: "Joseph Luns' Dutch Jokes"]

[Text] Mr Joseph Luns, who has been for many years NATO's secretary general and who sometimes is very talkative and sometimes behaves like the Sphinx, is not always fortunate with his statements. Although he is an experienced statesman with noteworthy honors from his past democratic activities (including his disgust for the Greek dictatorial government at the time when he was foreign minister of the Netherlands), it has been quite sometime since he has made statements which are not tantamount to nonsense or which are not infuriating.

In his most recent statement--yesterday's statement--made on Turkish territory (his Ismir press conference) Mr Luns has copied the legendary Marquis (de la Palisse) who used to repeat himself: "Greece's position in NATO will depend on the attitude of the new Greek Government which will come out of the elections," he said.

And he completed his view with an equally important remark which is obvious to free people: "Since we are not in a position to know who will win the elections in Greece, I am unable to predict anything on this question." (That is, the relations between Greece and NATO). However, Mr Luns' hosts could not be enthusiastic with this reply. The Turks, who systematically embark on NATOite zeal, would like Greece to be a partner of secondary importance, since they had tried for so long to prevent it from rejoining the military wing of NATO.

Answering a question about a likely mediation mission by him among Greece, Turkey and Cyprus to solve the Cyprus problem, Mr Luns says: "Both Turkey and Greece are members of the same alliance. Therefore, such a mission should enjoy the consent of both countries. In any case, the alliance has been watching Greek-Turkish relations very carefully."

Should one recall to Mr Luns, who is now watching Greek-Turkish relations "very carefully," that when Ankara was launching in Cyprus Attila II, he failed to respond to Greece's application for the immediate convocation of the NATO Council to deal with the question, with the notorious excuse that all the members of the Council were absent because of the ... summer vacations! During the same press conference, Mr Luns seized the opportunity to stress that he noted that the majority of the Turkish people(!) "are much more optimistic" now than what they were prior to the 12 September military coup.

This recent high note proves why Mr Luns is unfortunate with his statements. For the sake of the "realpolitik" which he has been following, he does not feel ashamed even when he appears to be ridiculous. Indeed, how could the guest of the Turkish dictatorial government, who is on summer vacation, be able to find out the beliefs of the majority of the Turkish people who have been gagged by the Turkish military regime?

EVREN SPEECH CALLS FOR FRIENDSHIP WITH GREECE

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that he wants the Aegean Sea to be a sea of friendship bringing Turkey and Greece closer together and not a sea provoking enmities.

In a speech at the ceremony marking the anniversary of Izmir's liberation, Evren noted that both Izmir and the other cities that were occupied by the enemy suffered great pain. However, the wounds were later healed and the two neighboring countries became friends in accordance with Ataturk's principle of peace in the world. Evren said that Izmir's liberation day is being marked to ensure that the same suffering is not experienced again, and not in order to renew enmities.

Referring to anniversary ceremonies held prior to 12 September, Evren said that those ceremonies were not commemorations; they were merely a show of force by all the political parties and rightist and leftist factions. He said: Those painful days are behind us. You will celebrate your liberation days forever under our flag.

PRESS REACTS TO AL-QADHDHAFI THREAT AGAINST BASES

NC081130 [Editorial Report] The Turkish-language Istanbul press for 3-6 September comments on Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi's threat to bomb U.S. bases in Turkey and other Mediterranean countries.

On 3 September, HURRIYET quotes various news agencies reporting from Tripoli that Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi threatened to attack U.S. bases in Turkey. HURRIYET carried the banner headline: "Without the Slightest Provocation, Al-Qadhdhafi Has Maligned Turkey."

On 3 September, MILLIYET carries an editorial "Meaningless Attitudes" by Mehmet Barlas, who says: "Frankly speaking, it is quite possible to understand Al-Qadhdafi's fury. Supported by the funds he obtains from oil, the Libyan leader is seeking to fill the vacuum created by late Egyptian President 'Abd an-Nasir. He believes that such principles as 'the Arab League,' 'Islamic solidarity,' and 'anti-imperialist solidarity,' have remained unclaimed. Inspired by such beliefs, Al-Qadhdhafi instigates various militant movements. It is even said that he supports some international terrorist organizations by providing them with funds and arms."

Barlas then says that the Gulf of Sidra incident is the first really serious issue Al-Qadhdhafi has so far encountered and adds: "The U.S. behavior is based on various reasons. One reason is that President Reagan seeks to prove to the American public 'the image of the tough and uncompromising man' through such displays. The second reason is that the relations which Libya has established with the Soviet Union in the past year or so has seriously disturbed various American sources. However, surely the way to resolve international disputes is neither through such utterances by Al-Qadhdhafi as: 'I may bomb the U.S. bases' nor through shooting down any and every plane it sees in the air, as done by the United States."

Barlas then quotes remarks made by former U.S. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, who said: "Is the present U.S. administration trying to prove that it is weaker than the Soviet Union and stronger than Libya?" The writer concludes: "On the other hand, Al-Qadhdhafi should know that the welfare and happiness of the Libyan people is a more serious pursuit than kindling sparks of disputes in the international arena."

On 4 September, HURRIYET carries an editorial by Oktay Eksi, "Is He Furious or Crazy?" which refers to the threats uttered by Al-Qadhdhafi against the U.S. bases in Turkey and other Mediterranean countries. Eksi contrasts the friendly behavior of the Turkish Government toward Libya with Al-Qadhdhafi's speech on the occasion of the 12th anniversary of the Libyan revolution in which he threatened to bomb U.S. bases in Turkey and continues: "And yet, yesterday's papers carried reports not about the Libyan revolution, but about the threat uttered against Turkey by Al-Qadhdhafi, the unbalanced leader of the Libyan revolution. Al-Qadhdhafi is quoted as having stated in Tripoli the following in the presence of Turkish Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Serbulent Bingol who attended the ceremony on behalf of Turkey. 'We warn the peoples of Sicily, Crete, Turkey and other Mediterranean countries that if the U.S. launches another attack on the Gulf of Sidra, we may attack the U.S. bases in these countries and cause an international disaster.'"

Referring to various short-lived alliances Al-Qadhdhafi concluded with such countries as Egypt, Tunisia and currently with Syria, Eksi says: "Such a man cannot be considered normal. While, on one hand, we laugh at such absurdities as 'attacks on the U.S. bases in Turkey,' on the other hand, we have to be cautious since we cannot trust this gentleman's mental faculties."

Oktay Eksi concludes: "Someone must get hold of this 'strange' leader and tell him: 'All those bases you are talking about belong to Turkey, not to the United States. The brave lad to attack these bases--particularly a lad called Al-Qadhdhafi--has not yet been born. If such a warning is not given, it is impossible to guess what stupidities this crazy fellow may commit "

On 5 September, MILLIYET carries an article by Mumtaz Soysal "Al-Qadhdhafi and the Mediterranean." Soysal refers to a seminar held last week in the Italian town of Bellagio and "the security of the Mediterranean" at which 2 professors from the University of Pennsylvania submitted a joint statement. According to this statement, the presence of the 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean had provoked the Soviet Union into building a second fleet in the Black Sea, which has been flying the flag of the Soviet Union in the Mediterranean since the sixties. Soysal then quotes the final part of this statement which calls on both the United States and the Soviet Union to withdraw their fleets from the Mediterranean, and continues: "Looking at the situation from this angle, when Al-Qadhdhafi says 'both superpowers should withdraw their nuclear weapons from the Mediterranean and allow this sea to become a lake of peace' he is not actually saying anything different from what the 2 U.S. professors are saying."

Turning to Al-Qadhdhafi's speech on the 12th anniversary of the Libyan revolution, Mumtaz Soysal says: "Probably the man leading Libya is not capable of making refined speeches like those Western diplomacy is used to, and probably in trying to express what he believes, he says things that are capable of hurting even his closest friends. But, in essence, what he says is correct. Therefore, Turkey stands to gain a lot if it takes Al-Qadhdhafi seriously and enters into a serious dialogue with him, since it is under the double pressure of nuclear weapons in the Mediterranean. Turkey stands to gain nothing if it considers Al-Qadhdhafi's words as mere rhetoric for the purpose of distracting his people's attention from the several troubles he has brought upon himself."

On 6 September, CUMHURIYET carries an article by Ali Sirmen "An Important Discussion." Referring to the Turkish Foreign Ministry's reaction to Al-Qadhdhafi's words that U.S. bases in Turkey could be a target of attack, Ali Sirmen says: "We should consider Ankara's reaction to such a speech absolutely natural. It is also natural for Ankara to say that such utterances do not befit Turkish-Libyan friendship."

Ali Sirmen then continues: "The issue at this moment is being discussed by the foreign ministers of both countries. The Libyans persistently reiterate that it is out of the question for them to attempt to intimidate or threaten Turkey. We wish to repeat the fact that we justify our Foreign Ministry's reaction--if such a statement was made--and to concentrate on the essence of the matter. Turkey is a member of NATO. Apart from this, our country houses certain other U.S. bases on its territory.... Unfortunately, the U.S. foreign policy, which has been seized by the hawks soon after Ronald Reagan established himself in the White House, tends to increase the political and military dangers for Turkey."

Finally, Sirmen says: "Under present conditions, the first victims of the Reagan policy will be the overseas partners of the United States."

SECURITY COUNCIL CUTS SUSPECTS DETENTION PERIOD

[Text] Ankara, 5 Sep (AFP)--The Turkish National Security Council has cut from 90 to 45 days the maximum detention of suspects held under the country's state of siege laws. However, the new measure, to take effect on Monday, will not be applied retroactively, sources said.

Several European Parliament missions to Turkey over the past year had denounced Turkey's severe detention laws, which raised the detention period from 30 to 90 days after the military takeover in September one year ago. Observers noted that the cutback in preventive detention anticipated the start of parliamentary talks in Bonn on Wednesday on proposed major West German aid to Turkey.

Allocation of 460 million Deutsche marks (145 million dollars) in economic aid and 130 million Deutsche marks (52 million dollars) in military aid is to be considered by the West German Bundestag after it reviews a report on the economic and political situation in Turkey.

Law Amended

[Text] The law reducing the time of detention--as stipulated in the law on martial law--from 90 to 45 days has gone into effect. According to the law, which was published in the Official Gazette today and which amends Martial Law No 1,402, suspects can be detained for 30 days until it is determined whether or not they should be referred to a military court and arrested. However, in view of the fact that it could take time to investigate and determine the evidence, this period can be extended to a maximum of 45 days.

According to a temporary provision added to the law, which went into effect today, those who are currently detained for 35 or more days must either be brought before an authorized judge or released within 15 days. The temporary provision stipulates that the total time of detention, including the time allowed for the necessary procedures, not exceed 90 days under any circumstances.

CENTRAL BANK DIRECTOR ON INFLATION, CREDIT POLICY

[Text] Central Bank Director Osman Siklar has announced that prices for the first 7 months of 1981 increased by 14.5 percent. In a meeting of banks in Istanbul today, Siklar said that sufficient funds to enable the economy to grow have been secured, but the tight-credit policy is being continued out of necessity, as inflation has not been curbed completely. He said: Actually, it is not right to try to further reduce the rate of inflation in such a short time.

Siklar noted that export loans, which amounted to 48 billion Turkish liras at the end of 1980, increased by 79 percent and reached 86 billion Turkish lira as of 21 August 1981. He added that exports increased by $1.85 billion compared to the first 7 months of previous years.

In his statement, Turk Ticaret Bank Director Behset Tuncer, who organized the meeting, expressed the belief that the decisions most suitable to the needs and conditions of economic life will be made. The representatives of 44 banks are attending the meeting. The various problems of banks and the capital market are being discussed at the meeting.

KREISKY QUESTIONED ON HUSAK VISIT POSTPONEMENT

[Edgar Sterbens report]

[Excerpts] The initiative for postponing the Husak visit to Austria came not from Vienna but from Prague, according to Chancellor Kreisky. The affair last summer around CSSR agent Hodic, who snooped in CSSR emigre circles in Austria and whose testimony was used as evidence against Prague regime critics--this Hodic case certainly played some part in this, Kreisky said, but he did not want unduly to dramatize the ensuing deterioration of the climate of Prague-Vienna relations. In reply to a question about the official explanation for canceling the visit, the chancellor said:

[Begin recording] [Kreisky] We actually need not give any explanation, but as far as I know there have been deliberations in Prague as to whether it would not be better, in view of the various events, to postpone the visit. On our part certainly no initiative was taken. Presumably it was felt in Prague that it would be better to wait until the climate was a little better.

[Question] Do you expect an improvement of the climate in the near future?

[Answer] Well, in relations between states it is always necessary to proceed from the working hypothesis that when relations deteriorate, they will improve again.

[Question] Do you expect Prague to give some signal for such an improvement?

[Answer] I believe we have to leave most of this to time. Time will probably bring about an improvement in the climate. You see, ladies and gentlemen, we cannot pick and choose our geographical position. We are where we are, next to us is Czechoslovakia, we are situated next to it, and we have probably the longest borders with it or at any rate very long borders. And for reasons of commonsense, regardless of sympathies for a system or antipathy toward a system, we have to see to it that we are good neighbors. That is the only reasonable course in such a situation. And if some minor clouds appear in the sky one simply has to wait until they pass again. Then the whole thing will look quite different, you see? [end recording]

KREISKY EXPECTS 'NEW WAVE OF TERRORISM'

AU091110 Vienna PROFIL in German No 36 7 Sep 81 pp 28-31

[Helmut Voska interview with Chancellor Bruno Kreisky; date and place not given]

[Excerpts] PROFIL: Mr Chancellor, owing to your wise policy--as you always say--"no other country in the world has better relations with the Arabs than Austria." Do you believe Ulrike Kohout, Nathan Fried and Heinz Nittel would share your view if they were still alive?

Kreisky: I know how Heinz Nittel felt. He was the only one who expressed cautious objections to my policy in the party executive board. He was always moderate in his criticism. I can actually even turn your question around. There are hundreds of people who are alive today because we have pursued this policy. Aren't you forgetting what a burden we took on ourselves when we declared our readiness to allow entry and transit for Russian Jews?

PROFIL: But this is certainly a matter of course, is it not?

Kreisky: Yes, but the fact that to date there has not been a single death--though I do not know what the future will bring--I attribute to the fact that this good relationship with the PLO has existed.

PROFIL: Are you afraid of the future? Do you now also expect terrorist attacks against Jewish emigrees?

Kreisky: The reason I am greatly worried about the future is that it appears at present that terrorism by extremists is strongly increasing, not only in our country but everywhere. We are standing at the beginning of a new wave of terrorism. I am not seeing ghosts...

PROFIL: But Palestinian terrorists?

Kreisky: No. I see a great destabilization concept. The strings are not being pulled in any one place but in several places.

PROFIL: But you yourself have declared repeatedly that only the big powers can enforce peace in the Middle East. Having realized so clearly the hopelessness of your mission, why has neutral-nobody Austria exposed itself in such a way?

Kreisky: Because Austria too would be affected by the world catastrophe threatening in this region. It goes without saying that our oil supply will be eminently endangered if a war breaks out in this region. The fact that I recognized Austria's and Europe's dependence on the Middle East for energy--beyond my socialist views--has induced me to become active. Meanwhile, everyone has realized that. In fact there is no difference between my views and those of Lord Carrington, the French foreign minister and the president of the European Community. This is what I actually wanted to achieve: that the basic nature of the problem be recognized worldwide at long last.

PROFIL: Thus your task would have been fulfilled?

Kreisky: Yes. That is why I have attempted repeatedly to withdraw from the whole affair. Only the Americans, who are the only ones not to recognize this, not yet to recognize it, are depriving themselves of the great opportunities they would have in the Arab World. If the Americans were able today to have a balanced relationship with both Israel and the Arabs, the doors of the Arab World would be wide open to them. It is a piece of luck for the Soviet Union and for the extremists that the Americans do not realize that.

PROFIL: With the conclusion of the cease-fire between Israel and the PLO after the Lebanon conflict, the situation has obviously also changed for the Americans?

Kreisky: Quite right. This treaty has given the PLO a new de facto status. The PLO has struggled for years for recognition as a belligerent party--which does not preclude the possibility of its making peace. This happened as a result of a predicament: Neither the Soviet Union nor the United States was interested in escalating the Lebanon conflict, for example, to a Syrian-Israeli war, which would automatically have involved the two superpowers. In this new situation for the PLO, it is in the interest of certain circles that this process does not continue.

PROFIL: And we are experiencing that now in Austria.

Kreisky: Not only in Austria, we are experiencing it everywhere.

PROFIL: Since 1 May, three people have been killed and several have been injured in Austria....

Kreisky: Things developed in such a way in Austria because somehow people felt that the understanding for the [Palestinian] problem emanated from Austria. Even among the Palestinians there are people who do not want any solution, even if it were the best one conceivable--if such a solution were possible at all. To live as a professional Palestinian....

PROFIL: As a professional killer....

Kreisky: ...is extraordinarily profitable for some people in view of the tremendous wealth of the Arab states.

Nor must it be overlooked that some states want to buy themselves out of responsibility. It is amounts running into millions of dollars that are involved here.

PROFIL: On which your friend 'Arafat's PLO, too, has been living for years.

Kreisky: The PLO must be defended. It understands that such acts of terrorism in Europe are doing it more harm than good. It would indeed be nonsensical to struggle to win over European opinion and at the same time to antagonize it in the extreme.

PROFIL: In your opinion is the PLO too incompetent or too cowardly to proceed against the radical Palestinian splinter groups such as the Nittel murderers, who actually are also threatening your life?

Kreisky: No, I do not think so. I know there is a certain amount of cooperation with our authorities.

PROFIL: But only a certain amount. That should not satisfy you. With whom have you entered into relations here, Mr Chancellor?

Kreisky: The PLO has given concrete proof that it is combating these terrorist activities. I received a leaflet today from the Abu Nidal group from Istanbul in which the cooperation between the PLO and the Austrian security police is branded as "treacherous." I can even claim that there have been some things that we were able to prevent because of this cooperation.

PROFIL: Can you give any specific details?

Kreisky: I cannot do that, for understandable reasons. But the fact that we were able to uncover the arms smuggling attempt is certainly evidence. In this case, [PLO delegate Ghazi] Husayn was at the airport to meet the two Palestinians. Normally the authorities do not interfere in such a situation.

PROFIL: But that raises the question of the quality of your personal friendship with 'Arafat. What has he told you about the further fate of Husayn and the two arms smugglers? Are they not at large again and can plan new attacks in Austria, on Syria's orders?

Kreisky: I have been told that the two have been arrested and are being interrogated. The former PLO representative in Vienna has been summoned too.

PROFIL: Has it been ensured that the arms smugglers will actually be punished?

Kreisky: I believe at any rate that the two of them have to reckon with some punishment. Don't forget, Dr Husayn has powerful sponsors in Syria. The PLO and 'Arafat are at the moment under terrible pressure. One has to understand that.

PROFIL: In other words, we should consider the possibility that in the near future the two arrested Palestinian murderers will be blackmailed out of Austrian prisons, that they will be seen off by the interior minister with a handshake and will get ready to commit new murders?

Kreisky: Well, I cannot preclude that. Such things have happened again and again, not only in Austria but all over the world, even in Switzerland.

PROFIL: Minister Lanc has announced officially that "the perpetrators named the Austrian Government's Middle East policy as the motive for their attack." Can it really be justified to risk the life of even a single Austrian for this policy, which to date has not brought any tangible results?

Kriesky: It was not I who initiated the peace process. All I did was express my opinion as to what the crux is of the Middle East problem. That has nothing whatever to do with endangering the life of Austrians. The terrorists would have found dozens of other reasons to become active in Austria, in the same way as they are active in other countries.

PROFIL: Thus you will continue to stick to your policy?

Kreisky: Of course. One cannot, so to speak, let the terrorists have their way and allow oneself to be intimidated by them. It is necessary to stick to a correct policy even if this involves certain dangers. There is no getting away from that.

PORFIL: You will not submit to further terrorism in Austria?

Kreisky: I will not submit; I do not yield to force.

PROFIL: What will happen in the Western democracies, in your opinion, if the process that has begun in the Middle East does not continue?

Kreisky: The European states, all of them, have serious budget problems at the moment, some because they have hundreds of thousands of unemployed, others--such as Austria--because they have to preserve workplaces for hundreds of thousands of people. Nearly all of us have deficits that need to be financed. As a result of the high oil prices, the European states have large balance of payments deficits. In the oil countries the corresponding surpluses are accumulating. These states are channeling part of these petrodollar billions back into the European capital circulation. And now I ask you: Does any reasonable person really think it is possible in the long run to ignore the Arab World, which today possesses the world's largest capital amounts and largest oil resources? It is known, on the other hand, that all these countries are most deeply interested in a solution to the Palestinian problem.

PROFIL: Is Ronald Reagan a reasonable person?

Kreisky: Reagan also knows all this, and I am convinced that America's policy will take it into consideration sooner or later. France and the FRG have raised billions worth of loans in Saudi Arabia. Many of our banks and European banks are working with Arab money.

PROFIL: All this smacks a little of opportunism.

Kreisky: I am not saying we have to indulge in a particular opportunism, but we have to take reality into account, just as we have to take into account the reality that America is the world's most powerful and biggest nation.

PROFIL: Thank God.

Kreisky: Thank God for this--I say so too. It is only necessary to see that a dialogue comes about, that there are not too many misunderstandings between Europeans and Americans. It is certainly one of the great tasks of the European democracies to bring about a better relationship between Americans and Arabs. The moderate Arab states, on which America too relies so much, will only be able to hold their own if they can prove that they have achieved a greater understanding for the Palestinian problem through their close relationship with the West. I have been told that repeatedly by the leading statesmen there. Unless they succeed in that respect, these states will not remain much longer. I would like to draw attention to a phenomenon that many have not noticed. Nearly all Arab states have sent condolences messages and have publicly dissociated themselves from the Vienna synagogue crime, as they specifically called it...

PROFIL: Cheap words...

Kreisky: No. No. The PLO and the West Bank mayors have also sent condolences messages. True, that does not bring the dead back to life, but as regards its effect on the Arab World it means that the Arabs have described as a crime what the Arab extremist group has done. And now compare that with the eloquent silence that reigned in the Arab World on the occasion of such terrorist attacks as recently as 10 years ago. There has been a development here that must be recognized: namely that nearly the entire Arab World is letting us know how much it regrets this crime and the fact that it occurred in Austria of all places. That is a fundamental change and at the same time a great hope.

U.S. FIRM SAID OFFERING JOBS FOR F-16 ORDER

[Special report by Andreas Unterberger]

[Text] Vienna--In the bidding for the planned purchase of 24 interceptors by Austria, a new offer has come from the American side: In contrast to earlier quoted figures, General Electric now intends to guarantee investments providing 6,000 jobs in Austria in the event Austria buys planes (F-16's) partly produced by this company.

As learned from a well-informed U.S. source, the company would at present even be satisfied with a basic decision in favor of this type interceptor. According to Finance Minister Salcher, the 1982 and 1983 budgets cannot provide for such expenditures. So far the French Dassault company (Mirage) has been in the lead, as the National Defense Council already made a basic decision in its favor before the summer.

BRIEFS

OIL IMPORTS--In the first half of this year Austrian consumption of oil products declined 7.4 percent compared to the same period in 1980. Crude oil imports were 5.2 percent lower and imports of oil products 22.5 percent lower than a year ago. Despite the lower imports in terms of quantity, the value of crude oil imports in the first half of this year was 34 percent higher than a year ago--16.9 billion schillings, compared to 12.6 billion schillings--as a result of the higher dollar exchange rate. [Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 1 Sep 81 p 8 AU]

EXPORTS TO BULGARIA--Austrian exports to Bulgaria in the first half of 1981 were 800 million schillings, 7.4 percent higher than during the same period last year. These exports consisted mostly of semifinished goods such as iron and steel, paper and cardboard, nonferrous metals and refractory products. Bulgarian exports to Austria in the first half of 1981 went up 100 percent to 367 million schillings. [Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 2 Sep 81 p 8 AU]

SCHMIDT CITES READINESS TO TALK WITH HONECKER

[Text] Bonn, 9 Sep (DPA)--Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has spoken in favor of an "unconditional readiness to talk" with regard to his planned meeting with Erich Honecker, chairman of the GDR Council of State. In an interview in the SPD weekly VORWAERTS, published in Bonn today, the chancellor said that he was not pleased to read that "the newspapers are already taking up the subject for the third time and are now guessing again, if you please, at all that must result from a talk between Mr Honecker and me. This is an attempt to place hurdles in advance."

Among mutual German interests, the chancellor included the fact that a war must not break out in Europe because, predictably, in a war, the territory of the two German states would be the main theater. He said that Germans as a whole are interested in setting the conditions which would keep the risks of future wars as low as possible. Consequently, both German states have to contribute to the balance of military threats and counterthreats and military deterrence and counterdeterrence.

The chancellor warned against expecting too much from the first meeting between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko in New York at the end of this month. He said the theme of this talk is not only the Eurostrategic weapons but also world conflicts. Schmidt also stressed that the process of making efforts for [words indistinct] balance with regard to these weapons, which he has been encouraging for 4 years, "is experiencing important progress now in September 1981," but a result would still be a long time in coming.

FDP CHAIRMAN COMMENTS ON BUDGET PROBLEMS

["Excerpts" from reporter Fides Krause-Brewer interview with Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] During the past few weeks, did you and Graf Lambsdorff negotiate somewhat harder and riskier than some people of the faction would have liked?

[Answer] It became obvious during the faction session that all our colleagues were aware that the government coalition together achieved a great deal. We do not want to contribute to talking this achievement to pieces -- an achievement jointly made for our country and for the our citizens, as well as particularly to overcome unemployment.

[Question] Do you think that the personal frictions involved can be removed?

[Answer] I don't know what you mean by personal frictions. We did not contribute to any such thing. We presented our position in a businesslike but firm manner. It isn't our political style to personally attack other politicians.

[Question] The budget certainly will contain some risks. There is talk of DM1-2 billion still needed. In filling these gaps, should we expect the entire fight with the SPD to start over again?

[Answer] If there are predictable problems, we will -- as far as we are concerned -- handle them in the same businesslike way we handled what is now considered the common achievement.

[Question] Do you stand by your absolute "no" regarding tax increases to fill budget deficits?

[Answer] We have said that we don't think much of a special levy or of a heating oil tax.

GERMAN-POLISH CONSULTATIONS CENTER ON DISARMAMENT

LD091333 Hamburg DPA in German 1213 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 9 Sep (DPA)--Disarmament problems, particularly those connected with medium-range missiles, were at the center of German-Polish consultations at the Foreign Ministry in Bonn yesterday. The ministry said that at the talks, which have been taking place regularly since 1977 and which are also held with other East bloc states, "all relevant worldwide and specifically European themes in the disarmament sphere" were discussed. The emphasis was on medium-range missiles. The German side stressed the West's interest in achieving agreement at the Madrid CSCE followup on the convening of a European disarmament conference.

PRESS CRITICIZES PLANNED ANTI-HAIG DEMONSTRATION

DW090927 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 9 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Excerpts] RUHR-NACHRICHTEN of Dortmund deals with the announced protest action against U.S. Secretary of State Haig slated to take place in Berlin on Sunday: The Young Socialists have frequently embarrassed their mother party. This time, however, the matter is particularly embarrassing. A demonstration against U.S. Secretary of State Haig must seem to the party leadership to be rather uncalled for. The fact that this demonstration of antipathy is supposed to take place in Berlin when the American visits the divided city is being rightly considered a scandal by sober-minded Social Democrats.

ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz notes: It certainly does not indicate a sense of reality when one wants to cut off the branch on which one is sitting just because of some momentary irritation. The Berlin Young Socialists pretend that the old capital of the Reich is a city like all others in the world and not the place where freedom and democracy depend directly on the guaranteed protection of the world power America. A demonstration against the U.S. secretary of state on the Spee River assumes a completely different quality than one taking place in the streets of Rome or Athens.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE

[Commentary signed Rm.: "That Is What Our State Is Like"]

[Text] Mass violence could erupt when the demonstration announced by the Young Socialists takes place on the occasion of U.S. Secretary of State Haig's visit to Berlin. But obviously, no one is considering prohibiting the demonstration. Berlin's Senator of the Interior Lummer just announced that restrictions will be placed on the organizers if need be. You can imagine what would become of such restrictions. It is already questionable whether the Young Socialists would abide by them even if they wanted to. More than 20 other groups plan to take part in the demonstration including communists.

Do the years of experience with leftist extremists really allow the expectation that they would, in a law-abiding way, really not do what the police forbid? This seems to be why Berlin's senator of the interior is not considering issuing a ban; he doesn't think it can be implemented. It may be that the police in Berlin, which cannot be assisted by police units from other federal laender--would reach their limit if they had to dissolve a banned demonstration on Sunday. But if a ban is abandoned too early, it will become unusable later on. The whole affair is a horrifying segment of our reality. The constitutional state has deteriorated so much that it does not dare counteract the mass violence threatened by political extremists.

The state feels helpless. But the party leaders were the first to fail. The Sunday plan is the work of "the Young Socialists of the SPD." It is not a kindergarten attached to the SPD nor is it a group of Social Democratic youths. One-third of the SPD belongs to it. The Berlin Land Executive Board has condemned the planned demonstration, but it did not set any consequences for the participants. SPD Chairman Brandt strongly advises against participation, but that is all. SPD Federal Manager Glotz reprimands the chairman of the Young Socialists, who can ignore it. The SPD has been led in this way for many years, with the result that party functionaries can go unpunished in urging the denunciation of our most important ally.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG

DW100825 Munich SUEDDUETSCHE ZEITUNG in German 10 Sep 81 p 4

[Commentary signed RL: "Beyond Acceptable Criticism"]

[Text] If one recalls how visiting American politicians have been jubilantly greeted in earlier times, the planned Berlin demonstration of Young Socialists against U.S. Secretary of State Haig seems to introduce a changed era. In fact, however, both welcoming attitudes are rather close to each other: The earlier ovations and the current shrill rejection are also connected with the complexes Germans have whenever they feel particularly self-confident.

Reagan's policy gives ample reason to feel concerned. It must be possible to criticize the U.S. Government without being considered an adversary of the American nation. (After all, people in the United States also have ideas differing from official policy.)
The initiators of the anti-Haig demonstrations, however, lose the claim for differentiation between serious criticism and mere anti-Americanism due to the shallow polemics of their phrases. Haig is certainly not a saint, but denouncing him as a warmonger with the help of a distorted quotation lies far beyond the limit between criticism and propaganda. Haig merely said that peace should not be bought for the price of subordination to the ideological adversary. As a pacifist, one may criticize even that. But what is natural for every kind of self-defense and territorial defense must not be twisted to appear as the personal perfidiousness of Haig--if one wants to be taken seriously politically.

Those who want to demonstrate in Berlin against American policy must not be so foolish or bold as to forget that they can do so there simply due to the presence of the Western allies--regardless of who happens to be the secretary of state in Washington. This fact is more concrete than the slogans of Young Socialist or democratic activists who have no historical background.

PAPER: GOVERNMENT 'GOOFED' ON LAW OF THE SEA

[Guenther Gillessen editorial: "The New Law of the Sea Is Not Good Enough"]

[Text] The probably penultimate round of the UN Law of the Sea Conference has come to an end in Geneva. The next round will offer the last opportunity for improvements. A redistribution of the earth is taking place in the form of negotiations on a new law, the rule of states is being extended over the sea, its treasures and the land under the sea. This last conquest is accompanied by some wrestling about the future world economic order and rules of international raw material trade.

These exciting developments, however, do not seem to interest the government, parliament and the public of the Federal Republic. The Germans have not learned in their national history why greatest political attention must be given to changes of the Law of the Sea. Their geographic location taught the Germans to consider themselves a land power despite their coasts. In the meantime, they long ago became an industrial nation, importing raw materials and paying for them through exports. But in this "second educational development," they have not realized what value the freedom of the seas and the dominating idea of the classic law of seafaring nations ought to have for them since the states with long seacoasts do not defend them any more, seeking their greater advantage in nationalizing the sea and closing the free sea. The Federal Republic has goofed in this matter. The government left its diplomats very much to themselves. The matter was hardly mentioned in the Bundestag.

Two events of the recent round of negotiations must be assessed for the further course to be followed by the Federal Government on this conference. One is the selection of Hamburg as the location of the International Court of the Sea which is to decide on quarrels related to the interpretation of the future convention. The selection of Hamburg is a prestige success; it means little for the Federal Republic. The weight carried by Bonn in the United Nations is being determined by completely different factors than by being the host of one of its organs. But the Federal Government should not be irritated by the selection of Hamburg. The location of the court is not worth a concession in the matter. Only if the Federal Republic will be able to keep its decision to join the Law of the Sea convention open in a credible way, can it hope to improve the draft.

The other event is the changed attitude of Washington. It has become doubtful under President Reagan whether America will join the convention. Maybe it will demand additional negotiations. All other states must ask themselves about the value of a new Law of the Sea if the world's most important naval power will not accept it. In such a case, all other states would have to examine their earlier decisions on the draft of the convention. Some feel that too much of the high seas will be sacrificed to the claims of coastal states. Others maintain that their gains are not big enough. Others again will hold that the achieved compromise cannot be improved any further and that it could be lost in case of new negotiations. There also are states who feel that deep sea mining is too handicapped in the current draft; others, in turn, feel that there is not enough curtailment, different interests are being fanned by American hesitation. This contains a danger but also a chance.

The Federal Republic has reason to be rather discontent with the current results of the Law of the Sea Conference, particularly for two reasons. The establishment of extended "economic zones" under national control must be viewed with suspicion. Some day they could become a national coastal sea. The greater part of German high seas fishing has already become a victim of the beginning of such developments. Naval research and navigation must fear being handicapped.

Deep sea mining is the other issue. Dirigism and market economy are involved here as well as the danger of creating an intended shortage of raw materials; also involved is an opportunity to keep the few nations able to technically perform deep sea mining, with the help of the convention, from breaking up cartels of raw material producers.

Completely parallel interests exist in this matter between America and the Federal Republic. It is regrettable that France and England stay on the sidelines but it is due to the fact that they have great advantages because of their long coasts and that they want to preserve them for later exchange deals. Under Mitterrand, France is even less willing than it was under Giscard to become involved in a dispute with the Third World.

It is urgently necessary for Bonn to reconnoiter whether the Americans really want to have additional negotiations on the almost ready convention. Bonn ought to prompt Washington to see to it that economic zones should legally be formed more in the sense of the high sea so that future nationalism of economic zones will be firmly halted.

Chances for additional negotiations are not so good, but they are not bad either. A new Law of the Sea hardly can be implemented if resistance is organized among the five most important industrial states. In this connection, very much will depend on America and the Federal Republic.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU SCORES REAGAN POLICY

[Commentary by Washington correspondent, signed Ter: "Reagan's Melody"]

[Text] Reagan came to power with the promise that he would "make America strong again." The Republican Party platform adopted at Reagan's nomination demands the reestablishment of U.S. strategic superiority over the Soviet Union. The government has not used the term "superiority" in its official language, but the world illustrates very well the mood under which the change of power took place in the United States.

If insufficient money is now available for American armament, this will have a devastating effect on the internal credibility of the government. The economy is not reacting as planned by the Reagan government ideologists. According to their dogma, tax cuts would practically finance themselves through the cranked up economy and the accompanying higher tax revenues. This is probably not quite the case. The defense budget has been increased despite tax cuts and now there is a gap in the budget.

A rather sensational withdrawal is in the offing. To cover up the political withdrawal, Ronald Reagan will double his rhetorical output. The President's recent remarks have already established the tune--Moscow should not think that the United States can not do what it wants to do. Naturally, it would win any arms race, that is clear.

Doesn't this give the impression that threats are being made with a big stick that can't be bought at the moment because debts still exist?

CABINET APPROVES DETAILS OF NATIONALIZATION BILLS

NC091816 Paris AFP in English 1811 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 9 Sep (AFP)--Bills to nationalise nine major industrial groups, 20 banks and 16 finance houses were approved in most details by a cabinet meeting here today, a presidential spokesman said.

The expected announcement coincided with a decision by the Economy Ministry to suspend quotation of shares in the companies involved until the final draft is put before parliament. Observers said this was a move to forestall speculation in some of the stock.

The presidential spokesman today detailed the range of nationalisation, methods of compensation and the future organisation of the companies.

Under the bills five of the industrial groups will come under full state control. They are the Companie Generale d'Electricite, Saint Gobain (glass and chemicals), Pechiney-Ugine-Kuhlmann (chemicals), Rhone-Poulenc (pharmaceuticals) and Thomson-Brandt (electronics and arms).

On the Dassault aviation firm, talks have begun to permit state participation of 51 percent immediately and 100 percent within five years. A 51 percent stake in the Matra arms division is also being negotiated, the spokesman said.

The USINOR and SACILOR steel firms will be nationalised by simple conversion of large state credits into shares.

Talks on capital restructuring are being held with shareholders of the Roussel Uclaf, CII-Honeywell Bull and ITT firms which have large overseas interests.

The nationalisation of the credit sector will affect 36 large finance houses--but as promised, 136 foreign banks or houses controlled from abroad, and 65 French mutual (co-operative) banks will be left untouched.

The spokesman stressed that the government has agreed on a "fair" system of compensation for shareholders, based on an exchange of shares against bonds repayable over 15 years carrying an unspecified interest rate.

The meeting also agreed on measures affecting immigrants and private local radio. The previous administration's law controlling immigration since 1980 has been abrogated, and so-called "administrative expulsion" will be used only against foreigners seriously threatening public order. Those who are illegally in France will be taken to the frontier only on the decision of a court.

A bill legalising private local radio should preserve the media and avoid domination by financial or political interests, the spokesman said. Advertising will not be permitted as a source of revenue.

MINISTER DISCUSSES INTERNATIONAL TRADE ISSUES

PM090906 Paris LE MATIN in French 27 Aug 81 pp 6-7

[Excerpts] LE MATIN: East-West relations were discussed in Ottawa. As minister of state for foreign trade, you are one of the people most interested in the development and nature of the major trends in international exchanges. It now appears that Europeans do not completely share U.S. views on relations with the Soviet Union?

Jobert: As far as the Ottawa meeting and East-West relations are concerned, everything is clear. Six of the partners informed the seventh that they had no intention of depriving themselves of any contacts in general, and trade contacts in particular, with the Soviet Union. This is irrespective of the U.S. desire that they either be ended or reduced. Obviously, the aim of the American tactics is to group the six partners together under U.S. auspices and then to embark on a bilateral dialogue with the Soviet Union and to negotiate an exchange balance with that country to the benefit of the two superpowers. If I were American, I would, doubtless, be making the same moves. But since Ottawa, I would have more doubts about the possibility of pressuring my partners to persuade them to join in the old game of undivided power.

LE MATIN: Was the Europeans stance expressed as clearly as you say?

Jobert: Communiques always present an agreeable, acceptable version of reality. But the reality is that the Europeans--Germany in particular--do not intend to restrict their freedom and ability to hold a political and economic dialogue, above all, with the Soviet Union. In particular, I am referring to gas questions. The USSR is potentially a gas exporter; Europe is a substantial gas consumer. If we want detente to exist, it can only exist on the basis of established ties. Since Europe's dependence on Soviet gas is not great, why should European countries deny themselves this resource? I do not really think the United States is capable of ensuring that Europe receives the quantities of coal, oil and gas it needs for its development. Moreover, this would mean substituting real tutelage for the threat of tutelage. European heads of state and government are well aware of all this....

LE MATIN: Can one speak of divergence from Washington?

Jobert: Policies must adapt to each other and will do so. I spoke of feelers. Indeed, the United States is putting out feelers in the direction of its industrial allies so as to find out exactly what they will accept and what they will refuse. To this end, the allies have to express their views!

LE MATIN: Touching on our relations with the USSR, Claude Cheysson has said, in essence, that they cannot be normal as long as the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan persists.

Jobert: To counterbalance the remarks you cite, I will say that relations between states are generally abnormal and seldom normal. True, the Soviet Union's occupation of Afghanistan has created a situation which many states cannot endorse.

LE MATIN: Is our trade with the Soviets suffering as a result?

Jobert: Our relations with the Soviet Union, as we conceive of them, are necessarily suffering.

LE MATIN: Rightly or wrongly, people expect much more of a socialist government with regard to relations with the developing countries. But it is one thing to speak of the need for new North-South relations. It is another matter to put these attractive ideas into practice....

Jobert: True. But this is nothing new. I remember that one of my difficulties with Kissinger, in 1973, was to make him understand that the policy adopted by France in the Near East had nothing to do with the "tentative political steps" he was taking at the time to bring Egypt closer to the United States and to Israel. A policy whose results were necessarily limited. And I tried to make him see that our vision was one of long-term codevelopment between countries which were complementary in their economic activity, in Europe, Africa and the Near East. This was a very difficult task to carry out and would necessarily develop into an incoherent mass of means and intentions.

But that was our vision. And I think that today, when we talk of North-South dialogue, or of Euro-African-Arab dialogue, we are talking, first, of countries which are complementary in the economic sphere, second, of countries which are close at hand--and proximity facilitates complementariness, and third, of countries which need to support each other politically in order to exist. The political vision results from this desired economic unity. It is no easy task because it can only develop either on the margin of dominant commercial factors--this is true of the Lome convention--or in the face of the system of exchanges which prevails today on the basis of international finance which is entirely dominated by the power and the actions of the United States, and on the basis of a concept of exchanges which, in the name of freedom, favors those who are in a position to benefit virtually completely from it.

LE MATIN: North-South dialogue means, to some extent, rejecting imposed ideas...?

Jobert: In the first instance, it is essentially a reaction against two well established systems: the international monetary system and the international commercial system. That is to say, not everybody likes to see groups of countries making moves--albeit only in the form of preliminary talks--toward planning their development and, in the initial phase, trying to even out differences in living standards which can manifest themselves not only in suffering for some people, but in tensions for everyone.

True, it is necessary to create the means, particularly monetary means--stable outlets for products, sufficient remuneration for the output of the least advanced countries. If people are reluctant to take a close look at these matters, if people stick to polical talks alone, it is clear that the North-South dialogue has no chance of getting underway. World talks on this subject will meet two obstacles: international finance and international trade. It is vital, and good practice, to encourage regional unions. Groups of countries must feel themselves to be linked by the living reality of their needs and their exchanges, as happened as a result of the Lome convention--and that was only a beginning. It is true that there is a major step to take before launching the North-South dialogue. This step must remain marginal to realities, unless it disrupts them. But in that case, the end of the road would be failure. There will come a time when this marginal step will become the main direction. We have not yet reached that point.

An approach which is both realistic and prudent is the best that can be tried today. There is the Cancun meeting at the end of October. Twenty-four countries will meet there to decide on the need to revive the dialogue. World equilibriums depend on this reality of a rapprochement between a suffering world and a world of high technology and considerable intellectual gains (but for which it is absolutely necessary that the other world respond through its own development). France hopes that this reality will make itself felt. The doors are now open.

LE MATIN: You have not answered me on the subject of ways and means. One has to be realistic...

Jobert: Being realistic also means that you must not always think of the market, and nothing but the market, from day to day, but that you must sketch the long term development of societies. Commercial agreements exist. Bilateral or multilateral development plans also exist. These are directions where it is possible to be rapidly effective, even with limited ambitions. Well, all these limited ambitions taken together will mean that one day it will be possible to raise the question of international trade and international finance without anger and without failure.

LE MATIN: Do you feel that some of our European partners are sensitive to this approach and are inclined to subscribe to it? And if so, which?

Jobert: They will have to get used to it. It is very difficult to change the predominant way of thinking. Thus, it is hard to ask certain countries--I am thinking, for instance, of Germany, which has based all its prosperity, past (since Bismarck's day) and present (in Chancellor Schmidt's day), on a philosophy of free exchange- to believe, all of a sudden, that a world of planned exchanges, oriented toward greater well-being, is now the right solution. One can understand the interest and convenience of the former theory. But when you look at the real and potential dramas which are being created and will be created by mankind's life, you realize that applying theories--however convincing they may be--is not the best attitude.

ENVOYS COMMENT BEFORE 9 SEP INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[From the newsreel]

[Text] A new session within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon. In a statement before the meeting, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, said that he expected encouraging developments at today's session. In answer to a question on the basis of his statement concerning encouraging developments, Mr Gobbi replied that he had certain information which, however, might not be accurate. In answer to another question, Mr Gobbi did not rule out the possibility of his going to New York for consultations with UN Secretary General Waldheim.

In a statement, Mr Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot side's representative, said that, as it is known, the Greek Cypriot side submitted at the initial meeting, within the framework of the intercommunal talks, in October 1980 specific and detailed proposals for a comprehensive solution of the Cyprus problem as well as specific proposals on the priority issue of the resettlement of Varosha. He added: These proposals were within the framework of the two summit agreements and the UN resolutions. Today, Mr Ioannidhis continued, we will expand our positions with the submission of further proposals for a just solution of the Cyprus issue in our desire to pursue a just and viable solution of the Cyprus problem.

In answer to a question on what he exactly meant by the term "further proposals," and if these are new proposals or counterproposals, Mr Ioannidhis replied: There is no significance in what one calls these proposals. This is about further proposals. In answer to a question about whether today's document was the last one that the Greek Cypriot side will submit in reply to the Turkish proposals, Mr Ioannidhis clarified that during today's session he will submit a set of documents.

In answer to another question regarding Denktas' recent statement that the Turkish Cypriot proposals constitute a significant step toward a comprehensive solution of the Cyprus issue, Mr Ioannidhis replied: What I can say is that the Turkish Cypriot proposals on the constitutional issue are the same as those submitted by the Turkish side in January 1981. On the territorial issue, on the other hand, their proposals were considered by the Greek Cypriot side as totally insignificant and as not constituting the basis for a solution of the Cyprus problem.

In a statement, Mr Onan, the Turkish Cypriot representative, said that during the session he expected the expanded proposals or counterproposals of the Greek Cypriot side to the proposals that he himself submitted on 5 August. The issue is, he added, whether the proposals that will be submitted will truly be counterproposals that will lead to a substantive dialogue in the pursuit of a solution.

Communique Issued

[Text] In today's session at the intercommunal talks held in Lefkosa [Nicosia], the Greek Cypriot side submitted documents and counterproposals concerning the constitutional and territorial issues of the Cyprus problem. The intercommunal talks aimed at finding a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus problem were held in the Ledra Palace Hotel today.

The Turkish Radio and Television center reports that a UN communique was released following the talks. The communique says that the Greek Cypriot side has submitted documents and counterproposals concerning the constitutional and territorial aspects of the Cyprus problem and that other issues included in the agenda were also discussed during the meeting.

The communique adds that the Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the talks disclosed his preliminary views on the documents submitted by the Greek Cypriot side. Final views on these documents will be expressed following the examination of the proposals. The intercommunal talks will resume next Wednesday.

SPOKESMAN CITES PLANS TO 'INTERNATIONALIZE' TALKS

[Text] The government spokesman today stated that the government is exerting every possible effort to promote a solution of the national issue and that it is in contact with both the nonaligned and socialist states as well as with the Western countries.

The spokesman stressed that despite the sensations that were initially created by the submission of the Turkish Cypriot proposals, today the world has generally become aware that these proposals cannot constitute the basis for a solution of the Cyprus issue. The spokesman further stressed that the Cyprus Government has silently exerted tremendous efforts toward creating the correct impressions.

The spokesman added that the effort to internationalize the Cyprus issue has not been abandoned because a dialogue is still in progress. He added that in connection with the UN efforts, systematic plans have been laid in the event that no substantive progress takes place in the dialogue. The spokesman said that within the framework of the internationalization, the president of the republic plans a series of high-level visits and contacts, including participating in the Commonwealth summit conference, during which he will have the opportunity to discuss the Cyprus issue and explain our position to 41 country leaders.

NATIONAL COUNCIL ADOPTS IOANNIDHIS' PROPOSALS

[Text] The National Council rejected an AKEL suggestion for the submission by the Greek Cypriot side of fresh proposals on the territorial aspect at the present stage of talks, but it decided to adopt fresh improved proposals which were prepared by interlocutor Ioannidhis and his advisors to the talks.

According to authoritative information, the fresh constitutional proposals which Mr Ioannidhis already submitted to the Turkish Cypriot side yesterday provide for the following:

1. The president of the republic will be Greek Cypriot and will be elected by the entire population of Cyprus.
2. The vice president will be Turkish Cypriot and will be elected solely by the island's Turkish Cypriot community.
3. The members of the upper house will be 70 percent Greek Cypriots and 30 percent Turkish Cypriots.
4. The members of the lower house will be elected on the basis of the proportion of the population in the various constituencies.
5. The Greek Cypriot side is ready to discuss broadening of the authorities of the two separate administrations provided that the central government will exercise increased authorities so as to ensure the unity of the country and the sovereignty of the state.
6. The same standard of living and per capita income will be ensured to both communities.
7. The increased participation of Turkish Cypriots in the executive authority is accepted but this should always be within the security limits of the federal state.

The fresh constitutional proposals of the Greek Cypriot side are always in agreement with the concept of a federal state and of a united country.

In connection with the territorial aspect, with the document which it has submitted, the Greek Cypriot side stresses that it will be flexible but it does not submit fresh proposals because the side which is to return territory is the Turkish side.

Council Disagreements

[Editorial: "The Disagreements"]

[Text] A few weeks ago the thinking portion of the people wondered: Will there be progress in the Cyprus issue? For a few days, prior to the submission of the Turkish proposals, there was a relative euphoria over the fact that the Turkish side could possibly demonstrate an elemental spirit of concession. After the proposals this euphoria evaporated. No thinking persons today considers that there can be progress during the present phase of the talks. It is certain that the talks will fail officially in the same way that they failed in practice.

The National Council is now in session. Under pressure of developments it is called upon to decide what will be done... will our own side submit its own plan for the solution of the Cyprus issue? Will it submit a plan only on the constitutional aspect? Will there be "improved" counter-proposals on the territorial aspect? Will there be inaction based upon the argument that our proposals were submitted in the past and that we have nothing new to propose? These are the questions facing the National Council. Naturally, no answers are likely to be given....

It is being said that approximately three positions are being supported at the National Council:

1--The Turkish proposals are not proposals but only counterproposals to our proposals. They are unacceptable. They merit no discussion. Consequently, we must return to the United Nations and to internationalization....
2--Our own proposals or counterproposals on the territorial issue must be avoided and specific positions must be presented only on the constitutional issue....
3--There must be a complete constitutional plan and our former proposals on the territorial aspect must be improved....

It becomes obvious that there is no unanimity on either the essence of the matter or on the procedure. Lack of unanimity is not a negative element. On the contrary, disagreements could lead to indepth examination and more correct probable decisions. In the final analysis, the disagreements are not related to examination. These disagreements incorporate an excessive dose of party expediency together with an even more excessive dose of fear of responsibility. In other words, who will be the first to dare tell the bitter truth to the people, the bitter truth which is being examined, discussed and accepted by the group of political leaders who, however, are afraid to present this to the people.

This particular situation makes the discussions of the National Council tantamount to political prattling and identifies them as political vagueness. Each and every one of the political leaders is afraid of his colleagues and apparently all together they are afraid of the people. Leaders, however, are only those who lead the people, who can even disagree with the people and who often clash with the people over serious issues. Leaders are only those who say and do what in their opinion is correct and will save the people, but not those who nourish false expectations among the people. True leaders are only those who, by sacrificing their own popularity, embitter the people, even if only temporarily, in order to save them in the end.

The people can have doubts on many things. The people can hold their political leaders responsible for all the slogans, promises and declarations directed at them during the past 7 years.

The people, however, cannot have doubts about the leader's lack of willingness and even fear to speak openly to the people. The people understand what their leaders are afraid to express. In the last analysis, the bitter truth is that these people are not being prepared either for war or for peace.

We need no reference to the history of older times and to other people. The history of the Greek nation and the recent history of Cyprus both show that what is being done today may be correct and a salvation but may be wrong and calamitous tomorrow. They also show that, for the past 25 years--without a shadow of a doubt--time has worked against the struggles of Cypriot Hellenism...the superficial and uncalculated slogan of the inactive long-term struggle was the main blow against the current phase of the Cyprus issue.

The National Council can lose itself in discussions on federations and confederations. It can be unable to shoulder its own responsibilities. It can reach unanimous decisions on painless conclusions and disagree on necessary decisions. It cannot, however, forget that only a few years ago we had both international interests as well as the embargo; a plan for the solution of the Cyprus issue; democracy in Turkey; and a strong government in Greece. Today none of any of these things exist. Consequently, the future is obviously much murkier. The National Council should look at both the present and the prospects, and it ought then to adopt its...strictly advisory decisions, since the last analysis it is only the Kiprianou government which decides and Greece supports....

FOREIGN MINISTER ROLANDHIS' 9 SEP UN SPEECH

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis spoke this evening at the UN General Assembly's special session on Namibia. Mr Rolandhis stressed: Cyrpus fully supports the UN plan on Namibia's independence which provides the only peaceful process to settle the issue with negotiations. Mr Rolandhis stressed that we recognize SWAPO as the only and authentic representative of the people of Namibia and hope that the struggle's outcome will soon result in an independent and territorially integral Namibia.

In his speech, Mr Rolandhis also referred to the Cyprus issue and stressed that the developments are rather gloomy and that a substantive, qualitative and quantitative improvement of the other side's proposals is imperative if there is to be progress.

MINISTER VENIAMIN OUTLINES DEFENSE PROGRAM

NC081603 Nicosia Domestic Serivce in Greek 1400 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Text] Defense Minister Veniamin has stressed that the government is exerting every possible effort to strengthen the island's defense shield, adn to create an effective local defense cognizant of its responsibilities and always guided by the mandates of national interest.

Referring to critical comments by part of the local press, Veniamin added that much is being done in the defense sector and no uneasiness is justified either concerning the effectiveness of our defense or the relevant efforts and work by the government.

I wish to reiterate and stress once again, Veniamin added, that the government is handling and dealing with the defense issue with the necessary responsibility and prudence. We shall not, he stressed, be swept into a noisy dialogue around this serious issue regardless of how much some people may desire an open discussion. He also observed that such a discussion will only cause damage to our national issue and only damage is caused by irresponsible publications and comments on our defense.

We have repeatedly stressed, Veniamin added, that the delicacy of the national defense issue--in the critical circumstances we are passing through--does not allow irresponsible verbosity and forbids a purposeless and dangerous furor. Concluding, Veniamin said that although some people are able to understand the issue's seriousness, yet they persist in exploiting the government's appropriate silence and behaving like demagogues undermining the efforts and work of the country's leadership in the defense sector.

DENKTAS COMMENTS ON RECEPTION OF PROPOSALS

NC100740 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 7 Sep 81 p 12

[Text] Lefkosa [Nicosia]--After a long silence, TFSC President Rauf Denktas commented for the first time on the Turkish Cypriot proposals and on the attitude of the Greek Cypriots. Inaugurating the festival in the Yeni Iskele [Trikomo] area, he said the Greek Cypriot side had not yet definitely rejected the Turkish Cypriot proposals "but," he said, "they are looking for a pretext to do so. They should clearly know that they will not be able to grab our land and our rights from us through certain constitutional intrigues." Denktas then reiterated that the TFSC will never forgo Turkey's guarantees and added that he would leave for London in the next few days where he will conduct serious talks on the Cyprus question.

Further Remarks

[Text] President Rauf Denktas spoke to reporters this morning. Upon being reminded that Greek Cypriots are making various interpretations because they are suspicious of his international contacts, Denktas said: Naturally, the Greek Cypriots do not want us to take any initiative concerning our national cause. This is their wish. Our duty is to do everything that we consider is right and deal with this cause as a unified force.

In reply to another question, Denktas said that it is very regrettable that an opposition leader claimed that his departure from the island is connected with the no confidence motion to be tabled at the legislative assembly. Denktas said: I am on my way to defend our national cause. I have an appointment in London on 11 September. I can leave today, at the latest, and prepare for my meeting. This is in no way connected with assenbly voting strength. It is not right to render the president incapable of conducting international contacts through such [word indistinct] statements. It is not beneficial to our cause, because such contacts will intensify in the coming months.

In reply to reports that the Greek Cypriots will avoid submitting proposal on the territorial issue, Denktas noted that whatever will be submitted to the negotiators will be seen today. He said: Our agreement consists of both sides submitted to each other comprehensive proposals. If the Greek Cypriot side doesn't submit a proposal on the territorial issue, it will have evaded this agreement. However, let us first see what they do, and then make an assessment accordingly.

Departs for London, New York

[Excerpts] President Denktas left the Federated State today for London and New York for contacts. President Denktas will first fly to London via Istanbul for talks with British Foreign Office officials. He will then go to New York for talks with the United Nations secretary general, Mr Waldehim. In New York, President Denktas will be joined by the minister of foreign affairs, Mr Atakol, and a parliamentary delegation. After completing his contacts in New York, President Denktas will pay a visit to the capitals of several European countries.

When it was pointed out that defense minister of the Greek Cypriot administration, Mr Veniamin, had said that the Greek Cypriot defense had been strengthened, President Denktas said that the Greek Cypriot side could arm themselves as much as they liked because no one would attack them, but if the Greek Cypriots attacked the Turkish Cypriot side they would be making a big mistake.

Commenting on Greek Cypriot claims that the representative of the United Nations secretary general on the missing persons committee was following an anti-Greek policy, President Denktas said that this was a usual claim by the Greek Cypriot papers. He said that anyone who acted neutrally and not in a pro-Greek way faced the attack of the Greek Cypriot papers. He said that this was not right and the Greek Cypriot side should stop its obstructions of the work of the missing persons committee and from making such accusations.

Asked whether the AHEPA delegation, which will be visiting southern Cyprus, would also be invited to the north, the president said that this was an organization which has been working in the United States for the union of Cyprus with Greece; and in past visits they have been invited to the north and shown the Greek Cypriot brutality on the Turkish Cypriots, hoping that they would be humanely affected, but no such effect had been seen. He stressed that the organization had continued to act in its usual aims. He described AHEPA as a Greek and Greek Cypriot propaganda organization who would never speak of the realities.

Statement on Departure

[Statement by Rauf Denktas on 9 September before departing Cyprus for New York--recorded]

[Text] It is in a bid to make some contacts during the coming UN General Assembly sessions, to meet with UN Secretary General Waldheim and to brief all those concerned on the well-intentioned and comprehensive proposals we submitted to the Greek Cypriot side that I am departing the island for New York. I am planning to stop in London to have talks with British officials on my way to the United States. On my return, I will stop in certain European countries for talks.

As it will be recalled, we have already submitted to the Greek Cypriot side our well-intentioned and comprehensive proposals for the solution of the Cyprus problem which has continued since 1963. These proposals concern the territorial, and the constitutional aspects of the problem as well as other aspects. As far as we can learn from reports in the Greek Cypriot press and from other official sources, though the Greek Cypriot side is ready to discuss our proposals on the constitutional aspect of the problem, it will refrain from making any proposals on the territorial aspect. We would consider such a stand far from being good-willed. The Greek Cypriot side must draw a map encompassing its territorial proposal.

Arrival in Istanbul

TA019759 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1610 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] Istanbul, 9 Sep (AA)--The president of the TFSC, Rauf Denktas, who is on his way to London for talks with British officials and New York for a meeting with the UN secretary general, arrived in Istanbul today.

In a statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport, Denktas said: During my contacts abroad I will brief officials on the content of the comprehensive proposals we have submitted to the Greek Cypriot side in a bid to prove that the Greek Cypriot propaganda on this issue is not valid. I will also explain that we are now expecting comprehensive proposals from the Greek Cypriots and that they must come up with meaningful proposals particularly on the territorial issue.

After recalling that he would reach New York on 20 September and that a Turkish Cypriot parliamentary delegation would meet him there, President Denktas said he was expected to meet with UN Secretary General Waldheim and would have talks with the UN representatives of various countries.

In reply to a question, Denktas said his trip abroad, which would last a month, was misinterpreted. He denied allegations to the effect that his aim was to delay a noconfidence motion against the government by opposition parties in the Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly. Such a thing is definitely out of the question, he said. Government and state affairs are conducted with care, he added, and said a head of state will not cancel all his appointments abroad just because a vote is to take place in the assembly.

KKE DENOUNCES U.S. ENVOY'S REMARKS ON ELECTIONS

NC092026 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 9 Sep 81 p 1, 9

[Text] Washington has attempted a new, undisguised intervention in our domestic affairs, in view of the elections and the prospect of the right's defeat, with provocative "advice" to the Greek people.

In the first interview he has given since assuming his duties as the new U.S. ambassador in Ankara, Robert Strausz-Hupe stated in connection with the Greek elections and their possible "repercussions" on the area and NATO that "he does not know what the election results will be." But he added: "The issue's most important aspect is the fact that Greece, too, is a part of NATO and I believe--he continued--that the great majority of the Greek people are very attached to their bonds with NATO."

Presenting our country's participation in the Atlantic alliance as an "irreversible fact," he added in the same provocative tone: "We are all in the same boat. This boat happens to be NATO, and I think this fact should be decisively taken into consideration in the formulation of Greek policy, regardless of who the prime minister will be."

Strausz-Hupe's "suggestions," which revive the era of the notorious Purifoy [U.S. ambassador in Athens in the postwar era], are already being practically expressed through the U.S. exercises that have been planned in the Aegean for the eve of the elections. Such activities by Washington only aim at exercising psychological blackmail on conservative voters to prevent their flight to progressive quarters.

In a statement yesterday, the KKE Central Committee press office stressed that:

"The statement of the U.S. ambassador in Ankara on the Greek elections constitutes an unacceptable and blunt intervention in our domestic affairs. The Greek people know very well what NATO is, what role it has played in the imposition of the dictatorship, the Cyprus problem and the country's other hardships, and they do not need the recommendations of U.S. officials. This new U.S. provocation, which has taken place in the preelection period, in conjunction with the conduct of U.S. exercises in our area, stresses the need for the Greek people to give their reply, through their votes and struggles, to the regime of NATOcracy and to the impertinence of the Americans, who exercise the role of an overlord in our country. We call on the government and the democratic parties to denounce this unacceptable U.S. intervention in our domestic affairs."

KKE-EXTERIOR'S FLORAKIS INTERVIEW ON GOALS

Part One

NC071650 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 7 Sep 81 p 7

[Part one of interview by KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis with Stratis Zakhariadhis at the offices of the KKE Central Committee in Athens; date not given]

[Excerpts] Question One: According to your forecast, what would be the KKE stand toward developments after the elections? You have definitely made some forecasts on which you have based your election goals and your tactics.

[Answer] One cannot possibly determine as of now the concrete stand of the party regarding tomorrow since one cannot precisely know what the developments after the elections would be. However, one can lay down general directives by depending on some forecasts which are definitely expected to materialize, to become facts. And one such important fact would be the defeat of the rightwing in the elections and the gaining of parliamentary majority by the forces which have been advocating change. Under such conditions, the problem would be how a democratic government should come about, on whom it should rely and how it should be supported in order to promote the change needed by the country. In these conditions the KKE will seek to contribute to the opening of the road to change by simultaneously acting toward two directions.

On the one hand it will contribute, through its increased parliamentary strength, to the appointment of a democratic government which would depend on all the forces of change and on a powerful popular majority. As part of the new democratic majority, the KKE, being firm with the positions toward change, would embark on action within the framework of the government activities so that a program is promoted that would respond to the people's expectations for real change. We think that this is the solution that would serve the cause of change and would definitely require the cooperation of all the forces that favor change.

On the other hand, the KKE which will be still stronger after the elections, will exercise decisive influence on the development and the sound orientation of the popular movement which would be the moving power for the promotion of changes. Of course, what will happen in this country after the elections will not exclusively and solely depend on the stand of the one or the other party, nor solely on the election results or the plans of the rightwing and the Americans. It will primarily depend on the people's unity, on the power and the participation of the people's movement.

Thus, in order to make absolutely certain and as deep as possible the defeat of the rightwing, in order to stop the robbing of parliamentary seats by the rightwing through the gangster-like elections law, and therefore in order to ensure the election of a democratic parliamentary majority, we have set as the goal the participation of the KKE in the second distribution of parliamentary seats. With our election tactics we also wish to clarify what should be done, what kind of change the country needs, what means should be employed in order to carry out the change.

Question Two: You have set 17 percent as your goal. Do you believe that this is feasible at a time when the development of some international questions--such as the crisis in Europe, the Polish and the Middle East questions--could dynamically upset any one of the static forecasts? For example, what would happen if the situation in Poland deteriorates?

Answer: Definitely, international developments influence elections. But first of all we think that they do not play any determinative role in connection with the outcome and, secondly, they do not exclusively influence one direction. To start with, what are the international developments which directly and vitally concern the Greek people? It is the cold war craziness of the U.S. leadership which proceeds with the most dangerous arms race ever known to mankind; which promotes the Euromissiles; which has gone as far as the production of the most wicked weapon, the neutron bomb; and which threatens to lead Europe--particularly Greece which is full of bases--to nuclear holocaust. They are the U.S. adventurous activities in the Middle East, their provocations against Libya, their pressuring for a NATOite partitioning of Cyprus and the continuation of Turkish occupation.

As for the everyday bombarding that we are being subjected to by all the imperialist mass media about Poland, we must say that this is being done to strike at the socialist ideals. The goal of this unprecedented campaign is to disorient the people; to conceal the cold war policy of armament and of the counterrevolutionary interventions of imperialism; to conceal the British crimes in Ireland and the Israeli crimes in the Middle East, the murders of Turkish patriots by the U.S.-guided junta, the military invasion of Angola by the racist pro-American regime of South Africa, the crimes of the fascists and of the U.S. agents in El Salvador and so forth; and, of course, to defame out popular movement.

But in the Greek elections it is not the one or the other view on the causes of Polish crisis that would be judged. In these elections, the Greek people will vote to remove the rightwing from the administration of the country and to put our country on the road for national independence, democratization and economic development for the benefit of the people. Our people will vote for the Communist Party because they know that this party has been most consistently struggling for the realization of the people's aspirations.

Question Three: The victory of Mitterrand's Socialists--although numerically it was won at the expense of the Communists--has created a new reality through the "consent" between Socialist and Communist Parties. In accordance with the view prevailing in the West, the French Communist Party, gave certain things "in exchange," like, for instance the NATO and the Afghanistan issues. How would the KKE deal with such a possibility?

Answer: First of all, the Communist participation in the French Government reveals the changes that are taking place in the world to the benefit of the socialist forces, the possibilities for the rejection of the U.S. guardianship and of the well-known doctrine: the communist left "to the wall." It is being confirmed that in our era, without the participation of the communists, there can be no way out of the crisis and an opening of the way toward progress and change.

Precisely in order to deprecate this fact, imperialism presents the French Communist Party as having given enormous and unacceptable things "in exchange." I did not have in mind such things given in exchange. Specifically, the Afghanistan issue is being declared with fanfare as being such an issue. The substance, however, of the positive position of the agreement between Communists and Socialists is that a political solution be found that will guarantee the withdrawal of the Soviet troops together with the cessation of foreign interventions in Afghanistan. Does this position differ much from the Afghan Government's corresponding proposal? Or since you have mentioned the NATO issue, has France's return to the NATO military wing and the installation of U.S. bases in France been decided upon?

Naturally, the basis of the Communist-Socialist agreement and, generally, the government's program, are not as adequate as the Communists want it to be and as France needs. One can reliably say that had the French Communist Party emerged stronger from the elections, certainly the agreement between Socialists and Communists and the French Government's program would have more fully corresponded to the need for more substantive steps being taken down the road of change, and that active peace-loving initiatives be taken by France for the promotion of detente and the arrest of the U.S. cold war attack.

As regards your question how we shall deal with such issues, I can state that we seek cooperation with the other forces of change on the basis of a minimum common program which in each case should serve to guarantee national independence, peace, democratization, improvement of the people's lives and planned economic development through the eradication of monopolistic unaccountability. That is, we shall not say: this is our program; either you accept it in total or nothing can be done. We shall discuss things, we shall find common points and, especially, we should agree on the burning problems of the country's course and people's lives. Naturally, this minimum program should not close the way to a radical change, and, consequently, it should afford the possibility for substantive steps to be made to take us out of the current quandary.

Question Four: Let us make ourselves more clear. Do you contemplate the issue of your participation in a postelection government?

Answer: Listen, we are a political party that is struggling for the interests of the people and the country. We are a party that has political aspirations concerning our country's socialist transformation. We are a party that has sacrificed much in its struggle for the defense of the interests of the working class and all working people, for national independence, democracy and social progress. What other party has contributed so much for so long in the struggle for our country's progress? Therefore, we naturally claim and have a right to participate in the country's government. However, the fact that we claim participation in government responsibility does not mean that we can participate in any government. This will be decided by specific factors of the postelection period and, especially, by whether there is a possibility to formulate a government program that will promote change.

Question Five: Do you not think that--since you too have officially declared it--for the world of the left the top priority is to remove the right from power? Consequently, why does change, views from the KKE perspective, run contrary to change as seen by PASOK?

Answer: Your phrase "the top priority for the world of the left is for the right to be removed from power" does not give the precise meaning of the struggle by the forces of the change and the left nor the people's profound expectations. As a matter of fact, it allows margins for disorientation regarding both goals and tactics by the forces of change. The phrase "the right must go" should be supplemented with "... and the change should take place."

Otherwise, without a substantive change, the "departure of the right" can end in a change of persons in government. KKE positions and its constructive criticism of other democratic forces on what changes the country needs (issues of NATO, bases, democratization, and so forth) and how these changes should be attained, that is, the need for common action by the forces of change instead of the position and the logic of "independence," spring from this point.

Precisely, this position and KKE tactics reveal that the change it proposes runs contrary, exclusively and substantially, to the right and its antipopular policy and expresses the need for the substantive change expected by the people.

Question Six: The problem of "socializations" has become the focus of the preelection campaign. How do you view socializations? To what extent and form?

Answer: Certain concepts finally become vague, because of too much and bad use. Socialization is such a case. Socialization is not the nationalization as implemented by the right, nationalizations which in the final analysis in many ways help monopolies and constitute bureaucratic appendages of the state. Also, socialization is not the case when monopolies load their bankrupt enterprises on the state and receive huge compensation. Socialization is not simply converting the loans received from banks by monopolistic enterprises into shares, leaving intact monopolistic control over the enterprise. Socialization is not the participation of the working people in the management of the enterprises--something painless for the monopolies, since the ownership and the enterprise's policy essentially remains in the hands of the monopolies.

Socialization concerns the abolition of the large capitalistic ownership, the means of production and exchange and their planned management for the benefit of the whole of society, something that will be implemented in socialism.

As one understands, this is not what we ask to take place immediately after the elections--that is a socialization with the above socialist meaning. The urgent and necessary thing is that a democratic government take immediate measures for the abolition of monopolist unaccountability and curbing of inflation and unemployment, improvement of workers' incomes, increase of production and so forth.

Our party believes that within the framework of these measures the nationalization of certain monopolies will be needed. This is not dictated to us merely by our ideology, that is it is not demanded of us merely because of a general socialist intent, but as an imperative and extraordinarily necessary measure to get out of the current crisis.

Question Seven: With the present situation in public administration and the international state of affairs, further expansion of the public field is in the danger of becoming--if it has not yet become--a still more decisive factor for the fall of productivity. What is your stand toward this crucial question?

Answer: Earlier I cited the reasons for the plight of the present public field and how it should become productive. But we must say that the noise about the public field is being raised by those who are responsible for its crisis, for its deficits, that is, by the monopolies and the rightwing.

In any case, the problem is there. And we, together with the changes in the economic field, we propose substantive changes in public administration based on democratic principles, on actual democratic decentralization, on modernization and on efficiency. Within this framework, there will be eradication of time-consuming bureaucratic procedures, of the covering up of one service by the other, of the plutocratic interventions, of favoritism, of the phenomena of corruption, and so forth.

The success of these changes in administration requires the participation and sense of responsibility of public servants who must acquire actual rights and whose role, training and remuneration should be improved.

Question Eight: How would the likely collaborators with the KKE agree with all this? And on this occasion, with whom have you discussed so far cooperation in the elections, under what prerequisites and what is the outcome?

Answer: The goals which we propose as the program for change have matured in the conscience of the majority of the Greek people. Even a large part of New Democracy voters adopt or can adopt goals such as the abolition of the bases, restricting the immunity enjoyed by monopolies, improvement of the people's life, and so forth.

The goals have been declared in one way or the other by other forces of change. They have been projected within the mass popular movement by trade unions, associations, local self-government, and so forth. Therefore, there could be queries only by those who would refuse to cooperate in this direction.

As for cooperation in the elections, you know that a basic force, PASOK, has declared that it will go to the elections on its own. In connection with the other parties and groups, we have not ruled out cooperation with some of them, while others have an anti-communist basis and there cannot be any talk. Our party has stated that it will include in its voting tickets important enough personalities from the broad leftist-progressive region who want to contribute to the definite defeat of the rightwing through the participation of the KKE in the second distribution of parliamentary seats. And there will be such cases, and they will be announced soon. It is obvious that in such cases we do not lay down as a prerequisite for participation the full acceptance of our platform or disregard ideological or other differences, or rule out the special presence of the cooperating [personalities] after the elections. Nevertheless, it is necessary that there should be agreement on basic platform points regarding national independence, democratization of the country and economic development for the benefit of the people; that is, we will have one voting ticket for the battle to bring about change and not an opportunistic election gathering.

PROSECUTOR ASKS DEATH SENTENCE FOR NAP MEMBERS

[Text] The military prosecutor has finished reading his indictment against the Nationalist Action Party [NAP] and the Idealist [Ulkucu] organizations affiliated with the NAP. The military prosecutor asked the death sentence for 220 of the accused including Alpaslan Turkes, the NAP leader.

The indictment claims that the NAP's understanding of nationalism is different from Ataturk's nationalism as well as nationalism as defined in the constitution. The indictment says that the members of the NAP and the Idealist organizations tried to gain influence and strength by creating the image that they were fighting against supporters of a communist order.

The indictment says that radio receivers seized during searches conducted at the NAP headquarters were used to listen to transmissions of the Interior Ministry, National Intelligence Organization, the Directorate General of Security and the Central Military Garrison. The indictment claims that certain documents and seals in NAP headquarters had been destroyed and burned before the search began. The indictment concludes by saying that the NAP and the idealist views expressed by Turkes called for the use of both legal and illegal organizations to violate constitutional principles and laws concerning public order.

The indictment asks the death sentence for 220 of the accused, including Turkes, for arming and inciting people to kill each other and for aiming at seizing the state administration by the use of force. The military prosecutor asked for various prison sentences for 367 others. The trial will resume on 15 September.

TCP SCORES JUNTA REGIME, CALLS FOR TERMINATION

TA080843 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee statement; "To Our People"]

[Text] The rightist military dictatorship has been in power for 1 year. Our people have become poorer in this year. Unemployment and the high cost of living were further exacerbated. The destruction of the peasants and the small shopkeepers and bankruptcies have accelerated. A handful of local and foreign monopolies realized excessive profits.

The bayonet of the generals could not solve any of our country's national problems. The crisis is deepening. Our people's discontent is mounting every day. Terrorism has been quieted down and the fascist NAP members are facing trial. However, the most reactionary forces within and outside the junta are exerting intensive efforts in a bid to clear the fascist murderers. On the other hand, tens of thousands of progressive patriots, who are in no way connected with terrorism, are being subjected to torture and thrown into dungeons. The leaders of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] are under arrest. The labor parties and the democratic mass organizations have been closed down. An intensive campaign of attack and provocation is being waged against the Turkish Communist Party [TCP], which is struggling for the wishes of our working class and people and for our national interests. However, the sovereign circles will never attain their goals. On its 61st anniversary, the TCP is living within our working class and people and in their struggles.

The security of our people and our country is currently being threatened more than ever before. The United States is dragging the human race toward the danger of annihilation in a nuclear war. Under these circumstances, it is necessary to make a definite choice between the peaceful future of our country and the pressure by the Reagan administration. Terrorism cannot be eradicated without checking the crisis, purging the army and the state of fascists, chasing the CIA agents from our country and dismantling the U.S. bases on our soil.

Our people do not consent to being squeezed between the junta's bayonet and terrorism; nor do they consent to a political system with a parliamentary disguise that violates their livelihood and freedom. True democracy cannot be established unless the junta regime is terminated. Our people are in favor of real democracy. They want peace, national independence, freedom, food and employment. The TCP is the most persistent defender of these demands. With this purpose, it calls on all anti-imperialist, antifascist, antimonopolistic and antichauvenistic forces to unite in action and form a united front.

[Signed] TCP Central Committee, 7 September 1981.

FOREIGN MINISTRY PRESENTS LETTER TO GROMYKO

[Text] Rome, 9 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo has urged his Soviet counterpart Andrey Gromyko that the willingness the Soviet Union has shown towards armaments reduction be carried out with the opening of negotiations with the United States on reduction of nuclear theater weapons in Europe. The request was contained in a letter presented to Gromyko today by the Italian ambassador to Moscow, the Italian Foreign Ministry announced here.

The Foreign Ministry said that the letter refers to the meetings that Colombo will have with Gromyko and Gromyko will have with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig at the United Nations General Assembly later this month. The message stressed the Italian Government's concern for problems of peace and international security. "Peace and security, in the current conditions, can be based only on balance of forces--and Italy fulfills its obligations to its alliances--but it is necessary to seek effective measures aimed at general and complete disarmament both in the field of conventional armaments as well as in that of nuclear weapons," the letter said.

S. KOREAN PRIME MINISTER MEETS WITH THORN

[Text] Brussels, 10 Sep (AFP)--South Korean Prime Minister Nam Tok-u today met European Commission President Gaston Thorn and the commissioners responsible for industry and the community's external trade to discuss the ten's growing dificit with South Korea. An EEC source said that Mr Thorn, Etienne Davignon and Wilhelm Haferkamp reiterated concern expressed to Seoul's foreign minister [as received] Kim Tong-hui in March. The deficit topped $1 million last year, virtually ten times the 1975 figure of $144 million.

Considering the rapid development of South Korea with the average per capita income leaping from $115 in 1961 to $1,500 in 1979, the ten want Seoul to step up imports from the community and to accept a reduction of trade privileges. Seoul hold that it is up to Europe to show more energy to penetrate the South Korean market.

Two specific issues are copper imports and television sets. South Korea heavily taxes imports of processed copper, but by selling the processed metal at rates well above world levels on its domestic market can offer producers prices way above the market. The EEC is also investigating charges that Seoul has been "dumping" black-and-white TV sets on the European market. South Korea is anxious to conclude a cooperation treaty with the ten, similar to that the community signed with the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN: Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore and Philippines) last year. The EEC is however treading warily, reportedly for political reasons.

Before the meeting Mr Nam who is on the last leg of a tour of northern European nations, placed a wreath on a monument to soldiers killed in the Korean war.

Meets Press

[Excerpts] Brussels, 10 Sep (AFP)--South Korean Prime Minister Nam Tok-u, who met today with top officials of the European Economic Community (EEC) here, has predicted a revival of production and exports from South Korea and a drop in inflation from 20 to 10 per cent. The prime minister made his remarks at a press conference following meetings with European Commission President Gaston Thorn, Vice President Etienne Davignon, who holds the industry and energy portfolio, and Commissioner Wilhelm Haferkamp, who is in charge of external relations.

President Thorn pointed to the trade inbalance between the 10 Common Market members and South Korea, which more than doubled last year to some 1,000 million dollars. Mr Thorn gave his assurances that the European Commission was fighting against protectionism, but declared this struggle must be supported by actions to lessen the trade inbalance.

Mr Nam responded that South Korea had already liberalized regulations on 75 percent of imported goods, and that this percentage would increase to 90 percent in 1986. Mr Nam said his country had its own foreign trade problems, with a 1980 balance-of-payments deficit amounting to 5,000 million dollars, much of that with Japan.

The group of South Korean businessmen who accompanied the prime minister have made many contacts with Belgian counterparts. Among the deals worked out was a contract for the Belgian subsidiary of the Bell Telephone Company to install some 850,000 lines in South Korea and train 200 Korean technicians in Belgium.

GENSCHER DISCUSSES DOMESTIC, FOREIGN ISSUES

DIE ZEIT Interview

DW101145 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 11 Sep 81 p 3

[Interview by editors Theo Sommer and Rolf Zundel with Foreign Minister and FDP Chairman Hans-Dietrich Genscher; place and date not given]

[Text] ZEIT: SPD Chairman Willy Brandt said recently that he could not guarantee that the coalition would last until 1984. Could you guarantee that?

Genscher: I said it last week and I say it again: I am convinced that this coalition will be continued up to the end of the legislative period. We want that at any rate. We are asking ourselves, however, and we mean statements made not just by one leading Social Democrat, why doubts have been expressed regarding the continued existence of the coalition. I prefer the appeals of the SPD chairman, urging us not to forget the things we have in common.

ZEIT: You wrote to your party friends in late August that our people are standing at the crossroads. Do we still stand there?

Genscher: Last week's decisions clearly indicated that switches have been clearly set in the direction I indicated in the letter. We need a clear turn toward more individual responsibility, toward stronger promotion of private initiatives, toward recognized performance in order to handle the challenges faced by our country--and not only by ours.

We have changed framework conditions of world economy, clearly characterized by increased participation of Third World countries in the world economy. We cannot ignore this change because we have initiated it.

ZEIT: Does this mean that "Operation 82" will be just the beginning of further operations? Graf Lambsdorff has written that the problems of tomorrow cannot be solved by just a few changes of the budget and of social law.

Genscher: I believe that in facing a challenge, the people must realize the significance of the task. I hope that I have made a contribution, with my letter and the ensuing discussions, to creating awareness of this problem in our country.

ZEIT: One didn't have the impression in past weeks that this was the dominating approach.

Genscher: The struggle for the right employment policy was dominating for me. For me, it is part of a decent human society that those who can and want to work should have the opportunity to do so. That is part of self-identification in the liberal sense. I consider, therefore, overcoming labor market problems the central task of our society.

ZEIT: Part of this has been understood differently by the public. One believes that curtailment of payments to the unemployed--suggested by you to overcome unemployment--would be punishment for those directly suffering from unemployment.

Genscher: There is certainly no "punishment" involved. It is a question of obtaining the means to regain leeway for state action. Additional taxes and dues levied on income and gains should not curtail investments and the will to make gains, on the contrary.

ZEIT: The SPD voiced a lot of criticism at the party of the "economic count." Behind it was the accusation of being reactionary. How was it really? Did all the "reactionaries" really side with the FDP in the long weeks of negotiations? Or were there unclear fronts?

Genscher: If somebody on our side intended to impede cooperation with the Social Democrats, he could have paid them back in the same coin. But we do not deal with our partners on such a level and in such a style. Those who observed the discussions in past weeks, including August, will have noted that the FDP did not utter one word of criticism with regard to the SPD or leading SPD personalities. This attitude will remain.

Problems related to the fate of our country are involved here in the true sense of the word. Whether we create jobs or whether more jobs are endangered, this is a critical matter for everybody involved as well as for our country and our society as a whole. If such problems are involved, a discussion can be held only in a businesslike way and not to a view which one of the parties has implemented more than the other. I reject that on principle.

ZEIT: Does this mean that the packages you decided on cannot be altered and that every change by the SPD faction, for example, would cause a breach of the coalition?

Genscher: We intend to implement the package as it is. Everybody knowing the realities of politics also knows that if something is changed in one place, something else will begin to slip elsewhere--w also have ideas on how matters could be improved. We will cause no slides, particularly because no one knows where this might end.

ZEIT: Your party speaks of the "beginning of a change," indicating that it will continue. Where, how and when will it continue?

Genscher: I believe that the initiated policy will lead in the right direction, namely, to more private investments and more individual responsibility. An improvement of our economy's ability to compete is the best policy for the workers and employers.

ZEIT: Isn't there a basic limit whenever the necessary increase of the ability to compete destroys social peace, which must have an effect on the economy? Isn't there a limit, for example, when a general cut of payments for the unemployed causes deteriorated solidarity between the working and the unemployed?

Genscher: I consider social peace in our country most important. Social peace in our country was very much created by the existing social justice--which was achieved, last but not least, in the period of the government coalition between the FDP and the SPD. This should not be questioned

Regarding our decisions involving the federal labor office and prerequisites to be met to obtain unemployment insurance benefits, one must listen to what is going on in the plants and one will see that considerable agreement prevails with regard to FDP plans. We have made structural suggestions serving the interests of those unemployed through no fault of their own, after having paid their unemployment insurance contributions for years. But I don't want to add insult to injury as regards the SPD.

ZEIT: Is your basic statement that the economy should have leeway again...

Genscher: No "again."

ZEIT: ...Well, then, should have leeway for developing the initiative of businessmen. Is that more important for you than the preservation of the coalition?

Genscher: I want to implement the right policy in the coalition. The government coalition has implemented a number of social achievements to strengthen social peace in the past few years of its governmental activities, achievements I still consider correct. The opposition has no reason to complain because it agreed to them and because it prided itself in this connection during the election campaign.

Realizing in a changed world economic situation that one must react to the changes does not mean abandonment of earlier decisions. It is instead the ability to demonstrate foresight and to adapt to changed conditions. That is called political leadership.

It is now necessary to prepare the citizens for these necessities, to show these necessities to them. I believe that the insight of our citizens with regard to these necessities is stronger than some of those poeple who are making loud statements at the moment believe.

If it turns out that the current government coalition is unable to pursue a policy that is necessary for the future, the voters might give the majority to others. Some people find it hard to vote for the CDU. But they will do it if this coalition doesn't show that it is able to master the situation. I don't want to bring about a CDU majority according to the motto: "Close your eyes, take CDU."

ZEIT: What domestic and foreign political developments can we expect to come from this coalition in the coming 3 years, if it exists that long?

Genscher: The implementation of the federal chancellor's government statement given in November last year. We are the party guaranteeing it. We will stick with it.

ZEIT: Egon Bahr recently stated that if the United States or the FDP should deviate from the jointly agreed balance policy accepted by the East and the West, the SPD would be unable to cooperate.

Genscher: Since we are known as people who implement what we have promised to the voters and to our partner, we will achieve what we have jointly planned in the government in this respect: contribute through negotiations to active disarmament and arms control and to the achievement of a balance on as low a level as possible. I am asking myself what Mr Bahr intends by saying that another approach could be possible.

ZEIT: What does the foreign minister aim for in the counterarmament negotiations?

Genscher: I have never left any doubts that I would prefer a zero solution.

ZEIT: In this respect, you agree with Egon Bahr.

Genscher: I am not so certain whether he means a bilateral zero solution as I do. I mean--and that was put down in my party's Bundestag election program--renunciation on both sides, not a unilateral zero solution but "the" zero solution. I just heard about the statement of a high-ranking Soviet military official who said that the Soviet Union rejects a zero solution on its part.

ZEIT: "Zero solution" would mean that NATO renounces the deployment of the 572 medium-range weapons provided that the Soviet Union...

Genscher: ...abolishes its advance armament.

ZEIT: Is this to say that it removes all its SS-20's?

Genscher: That's correct.

ZEIT: What can be imagined to be a realistic negotiating objective in the face of what you quoted a Soviet general as saying?

Genscher: In NATO's counterarming decision this is defined in the way that the counterarming requirements will be decided on and can also be corrected in the light of concrete progress achieved in the negotiations. The key to a reduction or to entirely avoiding the counterarming does not lie in Washington, not in Bonn, but it lies solely in Moscow.

ZEIT: Do you trust that the present American administration will hold the negotiations with the required seriousness and energy?

Genscher: Yes, I have said this already on various occasions. In addition, we have seen to it that we will be much more involved in the preparations for and the coordination of the negotiations than has been the case on other such occasions.

ZEIT: The continuation of arms control actually is only one--though a very important--part of East-West relations. Will it be the main discussion subject when Brezhnev visits the Federal Republic in November? Or will the perspective of a long term cooperation also come up for discussion once again?

Genscher: We say yes to a long term cooperation. But what regards the East-West relationship and therewith necessarily also the subjects of discussion with Mr Brezhnev, it would, indeed, be wrong if we were to narrow our energies and attention to the significant issue of negotiations on medium-range missiles. For me, the current Madrid CSCE followup has a very high rating, on the one hand, because of the broadness of the subjects under discussion there, and on the other, because of the special topic regarding the holding of a European disarmament conference. I would see an important element, also for the stabilization of East-West relations, if such a conference would agree on confidence-building measures for all of Europe, meaning from the Atlantic Ocean to the Urals. Such a stabilization is what matters.

Third, I want to mention the great subject of moderation in international relations, of self-restraint and noninterference in the internal affairs of other states. In this respect, a positive approach by the Soviet Union to the European Community's proposal regarding a peaceful and political solution to the Afghanistan issue, for instance, would be of an extraordinary high symbolic value, in the sense that it would bring positive influence to bear on the East-West climate. We, as Germans, could make an important contribution to this through animating the German-German dialogue. It is, after all, a positive experience gained precisely in the last few months that in the difficult international situation it is not additional tensions that are emanating from the German-German situation but rather stabilizing effects.

ZEIT: In contrast to what is heard in European capitals, this kind of policy presently does not meet with loud applause in Washington.

Genscher: What kind of policy?

ZEIT: The attempt at continuing, irrespective of Afghanistan, what was called "detente" before which is also aimed at overcoming Afghanistan, or the confidence-building continuation of trade relations--such as the natural gas deal with the Soviet Union.

Genscher: The United States has lifted the grain embargo. This is why we certainly will not introduce a pipe embargo.

ZEIT: So the natural gas deal is progressing irrespective of what Washington says in this respect?

Genscher: Yes, but we will succeed in convincing our allies.

ZEIT: Next Sunday, your American colleague Haig will come to the Federal Republic. You will accompany him to Berlin. He will deliver a speech there, which reportedly is to be a significant one. What does the federal foreign minister wish to be the content of the speech?

Genscher: A reiteration of the joint policy of actively securing peace.

ZEIT: The active securing of peace also comprises the endeavor to continue the dialogue with the East.

Genscher: Yes.

ZEIT: And also to intensify the dialogue?

Genscher: Yes.

ZEIT: Despite the East-West differences, which continue to smoulder?

Genscher: Not only despite these differences but also because of them.

ZEIT: Recently you have warned repeatedly against any anti-Americanism. Where and in which form do you see such anti-Americanism?

Genscher: I believe that it is self-evident in an alliance of free states that all issues are being discussed frankly with one another.

ZEIT: Does this mean that one can hold a different view?

Genscher: Yes and this we have always done. This is nothing new. There are some people who say that we now must advocate our own interests. I've been a member of the Federal Government for 12 years now. I would not have been its member for a single day if I had not been of the view that it had always, up to 1981, advocated the national interests of our country. Since 1949, all other governments have done so too.

Nevertheless, there can be different views on the best way to represent these interests.

In our relationship with the United States, it must never be overlooked that it is common security interests and common ideas on values which unite us. This is being ignored in some of the criticism voiced of the United States. Sometimes the impression is created that the Federal Republic is located here -- it is not Europe of which the majority of critics are speaking -- and the United States exists somewhere else, about the same distance from us as the Soviet Union. This, I think, is an inadmissable simplification which distorts reality.

If you compare certain starting positions of the American Republicans prior to the elections, from 1980, between the elections and the taking of office and from after the taking of office, then it becomes evident that the U.S. Republican leadership more and more has come closer to the joint positions taken on these issues.

There are always fields of discussion which remain unsettled. But this has occurred in the past as well. The only question is whether different positions are discussed among friends in this or that place or described almost greedily, so to speak, as a proof for unbridgeable differences whereas utmost restraint is exercised -- let alone -- comforting friendliness shown toward the Soviet Union.

ZEIT: In the event that the social-liberal coalition irrespective of your own will is going to break and that you have to take the reins with the CDU, would you prefer a particular person or would you serve under any CDU chancellor?

Genscher: I have never dealt with speculations but only with real objectives, which I have mentioned before, namely, to make my own contribution to the action capability of the government formed by the FDP and the SPD. One does not thoughtlessly throw away the capital of trust yielded or the multitude of objective conformity shown in the many years of cooperation with the federal chancellor.

ZEIT: The year 1984 has an ominous Orwellian ring. In 1984, the present coalition will have been in office 15 years. Do you consider it possible on principle that your period in office could be extended? Or are you of the view that after 15 years the citizens and politicians should call for a change?

Genscher: Governments which are not in a position to undergo change by themselves will be replaced and changes will be assigned to others. We want to avoid this. This is why I am asking myself whether the SPD is well advised if it now says that a change is not possible.

ZEIT: Do you remember in this respect the traditional role played by the FDP, which several times interfered as the spirit-of-the-age agent to bring about a change?

Genscher: Just let us disregard the spirit of the age. I assess the FDP's mission much higher and say that it has to see to what is required for securing our country's chances for the future. And I ask you, please, not to let this serve as fresh food for coalition speculations. It is meant quite objectively, for what is at stake for us is the matter alone.

ZEIT: Judged by such an approach, some people envisage a Federal Chancellor Genscher. Could you imagine such a solution a la Reinhold Maier [the late prime minister of Baden-Wuerttemberg and former federal chairman of the FDP] during the years to come in the Federal Republic?

Genscher: No.

Bundestag Security Debate

LD101238 Hamburg DPA in German 1008 GMT 10 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 10 Sep (DPA)--In today's Bundestag debate on security, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher expressly welcomed U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig's visit to Berlin as the visit of an "ally and friend." He said that the campaign planned against Haig's visit harms the city and German interests. In his condemnation of demonstrations, "irrespective of which political camp they come from," he also included members of his own party who had announced their readiness to participate.

Genscher strongly rebuffed opposition claims that the Helsinki Final Act so far has "achieved nothing." He said that the existence of these accords signed by 35 states has prevented "international tensions from having a stronger effect on Europe." The key issue for the current, second CSCE followup meeting in Madrid is holding a "conference on European disarmament." Regrettably, the Soviet Union has so far not agreed to the U.S. proposal to extend confidence-building measures to the whole of the European Continent.

Genscher said he is convinced that all Germans in both states cherish "no exaggerated hopes" regarding Brezhnev's visit to Bonn in November. However, the Federal Government will not fail to make every possible attempt to achieve cooperation in the West-East dialogue and this also applies to relations with the GDR.

Genscher asked for understanding concerning the need for security felt in the Soviet Union on account of Hitler's attack in 1941. A need which, he said, is exaggerated by many people there. It is true that this need for security changes nothing in the military imbalance which favors the East, but it also cannot be ignored. The Federal Government wants to work with all its strength to enlighten the Soviet Union about German convictions. "A war must never again start from our soil." Genscher explained, while expressing determination to continue working on the CSCE process. Genscher accused the Soviet Union of having let slip historic opportunities, for example, when the Americans took unilateral arms control measures such as halting production of the B-1 intercontinental bomber and abolishing compulsory military service. But Moscow can still rectify matters and seize these opportunities.

YOUTHS TO DEMONSTRATE AGAINST HAIG 'COME WHAT MAY'

[Text] Berlin, 10 Sep (DPA)--The Berlin Young Socialists intend to hold their demonstration during the visit by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig "come what may." Their land chairman, Andreas Wehr, said today on North German radio that it is not the Young Socialists' intention to demonstrate against the American presence in Berlin or against the role of the United States as a signatory to the quadripartite agreement. The action is directed only against "quite specific points of the present Reagan administration."

Press Criticism of Action

DW101345 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 10 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Text] SAARBRUECKER ZEITUNG comments: The demonstration planned by the Young Socialists against Haig's visit to Berlin is not just void of political instinct and foreign political responsibility--it is politically highly dangerous as to its possible consequences. It is easy to figure out the reactions. Public reaction will necessarily bring influence to bear on U.S. policy and that is most dangerous. Almost every responsible politician in the Federal Republic of Germany clearly realizes that. The SPD top echelon must be blamed for shying away from drawing consequences for party members who take part in the demonstrations, shying away although they realize the possible effects of this. That is reckless inconsistency.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen writes: Despite massive protests of the Berlin workers, the SPD leadership did not succeed in prompting the Young Socialists to give up their protest. The trade unions, however, have clearly shown their opinion. They have no sympathy for any kind of anti-American slogans in Berlin. All that makes one think, first, times are gone when the democratic parties of Berlin agreed on the assessment of America. Some 20 years ago, an American president stood next to Adenauer and Brandt in a convertible, driving through Berlin under the cheers of more than 1 million people. Second, the Berlin SPD that has stood in the frontline of Berlin's fight for freedom under Ernst Reuter, Luise Schroeder and Willy Brandt, is today able to give only lukewarm pro-American demonstrations. Its youth organization is acting boldly against the main protective power. Third, peaceful protests without violence are hardly possible in Berlin. And yet, there is no reason to be hysterical. But there is reason to ponder. Everybody bearing responsibility for German policy must know that action is taking place in connection with Haig's visit against the vital interests of Berlin and thus of the Federal Republic.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch states: The alibis have been established, the hot Sunday can begin. JUSO Chairman Piecyk stated hastily that he will urge all protesters to abstain from violence. He does it guilelessly, pretending that rioters have taken JUSO promises into consideration. SPD Chairman Brandt, one-third of whose party consists of Young Socialists, joins in, begging all members to abstain from activities which could do some harm to Berlin. He says it naively, pretending that Young Socialists have not demonstrated for quite some time as they have wanted, violating party bans and joining forces with leftist extremists. But if violence erupts after all on Sunday in Berlin, the SPD has done its duty with words, words permitting the conclusion that one will find some guilty party, be it the visitors or the provocative guest, whose uniformed compatriots safeguard demonstration rights in Berlin. The term "perverse way of thinking" really fits in here.

NEWSPAPER VIEWS SCHMIDT-HONECKER MEETING

[Commentary signed Fk.: "Only for Talks Between Bosses"]

[Text] A meeting between Schmidt and Honecker is not as unproblematic an event as official statements like to claim when they say it is some sort of German commitment. On the other hand, it has a certain flanking character if one bears in mind the Polish situation. So such a visit may be useful after all. But East Berlin's revived preparedness for talks has more to do with counterarmament and the effort to keep this issue boiling politically--an issue that is so important for the Kremlin. The federal chancellor indicated that he wants to discuss at least the minimum exchange amount and travel in Germany. The GDR seems to have in mind an interesting aspect of the Leipzig fair talks: The key word "swing" (an overdraft credit without interest) in interzonal trade has not come up there, although the 850 million agreement which is advantageous to the GDR will expire by the end of this year. It is probably not an issue to be discussed by Foreign Trade Minister Soelle but only in "talks between the bosses." A concession regarding the minimum exchange amount could then be traded for a concession regarding the swing. It seems that preparations are being made for this.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ON LIBYAN THREATS

[Commentary signed Ein.: "Threats"]

[Text] Is it a monstrosity or helpless stammering? How should the statements by Libyan chief of state al-Qadhdhafi be interpreted? Al-Qadhdhafi went so far as to issue an unusual warning. He said that if the Americans again "attack the Gulf of Sidra," he will bomb American nuclear bases in Mediterranean countries. So U.S. allies are being taken as a sort of hostage. The Americans' freedom of action is to be curtailed because they have to consider their friends. Despite the fact a megalomaniac is making unrealistic claims--a 6th Fleet carrier has more destructive power than did the entire U.S. Pacific Fleet in World War II--Al-Qadhdhafi's boasting is informative. The so-called peace movements are seeing a demonstration of what "power projection" can be--the transformation of military strength into political action. The Libyan makes an open threat with his few hundred planes, although the one who is being threatened is militarily strong. Just imagine what the political situation would be like in an unarmed and nuclear-free Federal Republic.

LE MONDE EXAMINES CENTRAL AFRICA COUP

[J.-C.P. report: "The Elysee Allegedly Knew of Mr Dacko's Consent to a Transfer of Powers 'Scenario'"]

[Text] Was the coup d'etat in Bangui--where things were completely calm this Thursday morning, 3 September, as our special envoy reports--in fact simply a "transfer of power" from the "deposed" president to his chief of general staff in keeping with a scenario fixed in advance? According to very good sources in Paris, Dacko, who was ill, aware of the impossibility of "stabilizing" his regime and subject to attacks of depression, organized his own departure "under constraint," knowing, moreover, that France would do nothing to prevent him from doing this. The former head of the Central African state apparently preferred to hand over power to the armed forces chiefs, with whom he was in agreement, rather than to his political adversaries.

Was the Elysee informed of Dacko's intentions 1 week in advance, as LIBERATION maintained this Thursday morning? It is difficult to be certain. Nonetheless, according to reliable sources, the Gabonese head of state seems to have telephoned President Mitterrand last week after a conversation with President Dacko's son about the president's intentions.

A few weeks ago, President Bongo approached Dacko to urged him to take the "democratization" measures desired by Paris. The Central African president did so, lifting martial law and authorizing the existence of opposition groups once again. These measures were, of course, welcomed by the French Government. At the same time, Dacko was to reverse his decision and abandon the firm line he took following the attack on a Bangui movie theater on 14 July.

"Preferential Relations With Paris"

Following the cabinet meeting on Wednesday, the Elysee secretary general stated that "France is not involved in the Central African situation either directly or indirectly." "The French Government's concern," Beregovoy explained, "is to see the Central African Republic return to normal democratic life as soon as possible."

Referring to the events and seeming to fear the possible consequences, Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot stated on Radio France International on Wednesday: "The Dacko government has given way to a military government and handing power over to a military government is always an admission of failure and, hence, is a source of anxiety for us French."

In Bangui, General Kolingba stated on Wednesday that he intends to "restore order" before contemplating handing power back to civilians. Referring to the latter, he said: "Let them keep quiet for the moment and not make any move. When order has been restored, I will see what can be done to hand power back to them."

For the time being, France, whose new Ambassador Couturier was received by General Kolingba on Wednesday, does not seem to be envisaging recalling even some of its troops stationed in Central Africa where they are still confined to barracks.

Moreover, the Military Committee for National Recovery [CMRN] has published a list of the 23 ministers, all officers, who comprise this body. Gen Andre Kolingba, for his part, who is head of state and of government, chairman of the CMRN and minister of defense and of veterans, expressed the wish to maintain "preferential relations" with Paris and described as "completely untrue" the rumors that the Americans incited him to oust Dacko. The UPI agency believes that former head of state Dacko and his close aides are under house arrest but has no confirmation of this report.

COLOMBO DISCUSSES RANGE OF INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

[Text] Rome, 10 Sep (ANSA)--Certain Libyan initiatives, not least of which is unilateral maritime claims which helped spark the Sidra Gulf incident, cannot help but give cause for concern, according to Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo in an interview to the weekly "LA DISCUSSIONE (DISCUSSION)" magazine. And of course, threats, especially totally ungrounded ones, must be rejected, Colombo added.

In giving a rundown on foreign policy, Colombo dwelled at some length on Libyan-Italian ties, stressing that economic cooperation between the two countries has been mutually advantageous and that Italy is always ready to enter into a sincere political dialogue in which the two sides make an effort to understand the positions of the other.

Several weeks ago Libyan and U.S. planes clashed over the Sidra Gulf. Later, Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi threatened to attack missile sites in Sicily, Crete and Turkey should this ever happen again. The Italian Government has said such threats are totally unacceptable and in the interview published today Colombo said that Tripoli must come to realize that respect for international rules is in the interest of everyone.

Keeping his focus on the Mediterranean, Colombo also turned to the problem of Malta. By guaranteeing the island's neutrality and urging others to do so, Italy seeks to contribute to the stability of the Mediterranean, he said. This goal could be better achieved if other states, especially those of the region, extend their guarantees to Malta, on condition of course, that Malta keeps scrupulously to its own statement of neutrality, Colombo went on.

Turning to his recent mission to Ethiopia and Somalia, the minister said Italy was not seeking the role of a mediator as the conflict in that area was between African states. In Italy's view the problem should be dealt with at a continental level, within the framework of the Organization of African Unity, and without the interference of powers outside Africa.

Italy would continue patiently to work for the settling of disputes through normal diplomatic channels rather than through military confrontation among neighbors who could more fruitfully join forces to combat the common enemy: underdevelopment, Colombo said.

As to East-West ties, Colombo said that Italy has reconfirmed its political will within the Atlantic alliance to help carry out the agreed upon programs of common interest, to work for serious and effective disarmament and a restoration of that balance that has been unfortunately compromised due to the unhappy initiatives of others.

With regard to specifically European problems, Colombo said that Italy would work to reopen the Community, which was stretching ever more toward the Mediterranean, to a common vision of true integration and to a truly political commitment like the one envisioned at the time of the EEC's foundation. Bureaucratic encrustations and myopic nationalism which slow their process down must be eliminated, he said. Italy is working hard for the gradual achievement of true European union, he concluded.

CALVO-SOTELO DENIES PLANNING CABINET CHANGES

PM101457 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 8 Sep 81 p 11

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo told EL PAIS yesterday he has no plans to make any changes in his cabinet. "Neither now nor in the near future," was what he said as he entered the VIP lounge of Barajas airport, where he took off for Palma de Mallorca for official talks with King Juan Carlos at the royal summer residence, Marivent Palace.

Prime Minister Calvo-Sotelo stressed that there will be no government crisis and that the subject was not included in the agenda for his talks with the king, with whom he intended to discuss "current business." Asked whether he was in favor of the inclusion of non-Union of the Democratic Center [UCD] politicians in a future ministerial shuffle, Calvo-Sotelo said that "this possibility will be examined when the time comes."

The prime minister's denial, following persistent rumors of an imminent government crisis, was first given at his meeting with civil governors from all over Spain in the morning. "They are unfounded speculations," Calvo-Sotelo said, "because there will be no such crisis in the near future."

EL PAIS has discovered that the postponement of the crisis could be motivated by Calvo-Sotelo's desire to admit to the government not only Garrigues' "Independents" but also representatives of the Catalan and Basque minorities. According to Center sources, both Catalan and Basque spokesmen agree that a precondition for their government participation should be the addition of a further clause to the agreements signed by the UCD and Spanish Socialist Workers Party on 31 July, stating that the agreements "will not affect the existing statutes."

This condition set by the Nationalists could be accepted by Calvo-Sotelo, though it seems that the Basques have also demanded a solution to the dispute over the command of the autonomous police force and prior agreement on the size of the quota that the Basque country will have to pay the Spanish state over the next 5 years within the framework of the economic agreements. According to the autonomy agreements, the final quota should be considerably higher than this year's provisional figure.

With regard to the possible inclusion of Catalan minority leaders in the government, Miguel Rocas said: "We are always willing to guarantee the governability of the state and we do not refuse to shoulder our responsibilities, but I do not believe that things are moving in this direction at present." Ramon Trias Fargas, chairman of the Catalonian Democratic Convergence, Roca's party, said that "convergence is always willing to cooperate with the UCD in government." This remark is particularly significant since Trias Fargas has always seemed unenthusiastic about this integration into the government on previous occasions. The rivalry between Trias and Roca to secure a ministerial post is well known.

Manuel Sarraga, secretary general of the Catalonian Centrists-UCD, said in this connection that "this subject was examined a little more than a year ago and was rejected. Converegence must now concern itself primarily with governing efficiently in Catalonia and only then think about cooperating in governing in the rest of Spain."

Antonio Garrigues Walker, leader of the Liberal clubs, denied in an interview published by DIARIO 16 yesterday that Calvo-Sotelo had offered him any ministerial post, but confirmed that "this subject was discussed at my recent meeting with him." Garrigues Walker, who is rumored to have been offered the Justice Ministry following Fernandez Ordonez' resignation and who could have negotiated the deputy premiership for economic affairs for the next cabinet shuffle, nipped in the bud the criticisms within the UCD itself by the possibility of the inclusion of independents in the cabinet.

UN STATEMENT ON 9 SEP INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

NC092007 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1630 GMT 9 Sep 81

[Text] Another session of the intercommunal talks was held this afternoon at the Ledra Palace in Nicosia. An official statement after the meeting said that at today's session, all four items on the agenda were again taken up in rotation as agreed on 19 August 1981. The Greek Cypriot side presented a set of documents, including further proposals on the constitutional and territorial aspects of the Cyprus problem. The Turkish Cypriot side expressed its initial reaction to the above documents and stated that it will present its considered views in due course. The next session will be held on Wednesday, 16 September.

AKEL LEADER COMMENTS ON ISSUES IN TALKS

[Text] AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou, speaking today at a party meeting in Nicosia, referred to the Turkish proposals and said that they are not at all satisfactory because they cannot constitute the basis for a resolution of the Cyprus issue. He said: On the territorial issue, the percentage of territory that they have proposed in insignificant, while on the constitutional issue the proposals' entire philosophy is based on a confederation and not on a federation.

Mr Papaioannou said that the Greek Cypriot side has, nevertheless, not closed the door on the continuation of substantive talks based on the UN resolutions and the summit agreements. Indeed, in its effort to contribute toward this direction, the Greek Cypriot side has decided to submit counterproposals based on the summit agreements and the UN resolutions.

The AKEL secretary general said that the sonner the idea of a confederation is abandoned and proposals for a federation are made, the sooner the intercommunal talks will be able to deal with the basic issues and details that concern the structure and the power of the various organs for a biregional federation.

Mr Papaioannou called on the Turkish Cypriots to exercise all their influence to abandon the idea of a federation [as heard], and said that it is time that both the Turkish Cypriots and the Greek Cypriots resolve their differences and unite against the true common enemy, imperialism.

O AGON ACCUSES PILLOUD OF PRO-TURKISH STANCE

[Text] Pilloud's stance at the meetings of the Investigatory Committee for Missing Persons is unacceptable and provocative. His stance is clearly pro-Turkish and already relevant demarches have been made to the competent sources. The Pilloud issue will be clarified in the next few days.

The missing persons committee has asked for the replacement of the UN representative for missing persons, Pilloud, whom it has accused of maintaining a hostile position toward the Greek Cypriot side during the committtee's meetings.

The committee has sent a telegram, accusing Pilloud, to the UN secretary general and denouncing the Turkish Cypriot side for the negative stance it maintains on the missing persons issue.

Yesterday, the committee had a meeting with the UN special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi, whom it briefed on the missing persons issue.

According to our reports, the Cyprus Government will not attend negotiations for the missing persons unless the agreement existing between the two sides is adhered to.

The missing persons issue will be discussed early next October at the Council for Human Rights.

The Council will also discuss Cyprus' recourse concerning the trampling of human rights by Turkish occupation troops.

SPOKESMAN CLAIMS ADOPTION OF AKEL PROPOSALS

NC110720 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 11 Sep 81 pp 1, 7

[Text] Most certainly it was AKEL which recommended to the National Council to submit to the Turkish Cypriot side a concrete proposal on the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue.

This answer was given by the spokesman of AKEL in answer to our question on yesterday's report in the newspaper O AGON that "the National Council rejected a recommendation by AKEL for submission of new proposals on the territorial issue."

The spokesman added that AKEL always respected the confidential character of deliberations by the National Council because this was a unanimous decision of its members and because this is proper. Since, however, certain personalities and certain newspapers make "revelations" particularly in a manner which may lead to wrong impressions, AKEL cannot remain silent.

The spokesman observed that as a responsible and serious party, AKEL never hesitated to accept its responsibility vis-a-vis the people's problems, nor is it inconsistent like some others, who on one day denounce the country's leaders for not submitting concrete proposals and the next day recommend nonsubmission of proposals and discontinuation of the dialogue.

The AKEL spokesman added that submission of a concrete counterproposal by the Greek Cypriot side on the territorial issue would force the Turkish Cypriot side both to submit a new proposal and to prove whether it is prepared to abandon its present position, which is considered totally unacceptable not only by us but also internationally. If the Turkish Cypriot side fails to do this, then it will remain exposed.

If, he added, we avoid submission of a concrete proposal, then Denktas will proclaim that we remain immovable on our 1977 proposals and that we do not wish to end the deadlock.

The philosophy beind AKEL's position, the spokesman added, is that our side must make every possible effort for a fundamental dialogue which would disclose all the "cards" of the Turkish Cypriot side and prove whether there are any prospects for rapprochement and agreement. This is why AKEL advised that we should recommend 22 percent for the area under Turkish administration instead of the 20 percent recommended in 1977.

The spokesman also pointed out that it is mainly thanks to AKEL's insistence that a draft constitution was prepared and submitted to the Turkish Cypriot side. Everyone remembers the furor created by the irresponsible and by the demagogues against AKEL when it recommended the preparation of a constitutional draft. Now the National Council agreed that the drafting and submission of a constitution with specific proposals on the participation of the two communities in central organs and with other provisions was a necessary action. It is only in this way that the Greek Cypriot side could prove--and it now does prove--that it wants to create a true federation, at the same time rejecting the allegations of Denktas that we want to return to the pre-1974 status and subjugate the Turkish Cypriot community.

In conclusion, the AKEL spokesman said that the effort of those who want to play with words, and interpret them in their own way, demonstrates lack of honesty and bad faith, to say the least. What is important is not how a proposal is worded but what it contains. AKEL believes that our side must go whatever is possible for a fundamental negotiation, but always within the framework of the summit agreements for a true federation and not a confederation. All the other insinuations come from those who either refuse to accept responsibility or who--as always--strive for buccaneering adventures.

GENERAL EVREN COMMENTS ON VISIT OF KUWAITI AMIR

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that Turkey was trying to conduct bilateral relations without discrimination, with its neighboring countries and with all the Arab world. This view, General Evren said, forms the basis of our foreign policy. General Evren made this statement at a ceremony on the departure of Kuwaiti Amir Jabir al-Ahmad as-Sabah, who was in Turkey for an official visit. General Evren returned to Ankara after the ceremony.

In his statement at Istanbul's Yesilkoy Airport before his departure to Ankara, General Evren recalled that the amir's visit was the first such contact at this level. Expressing his pleasure over the visit of the Kuwaiti amir, General Evren said: I can say that our discussions have been a beneficial preparation for the further promotion of our bilateral relations, and particularly for finding the economic fields in which we can cooperate with Kuwait.

Noting that in a bid to cast a shadow on relations between the two countries, some circles misinterpreted the fact that official talks with the Kuwaiti amir lasted for a short time, General Evren said that the visiting amir told him: We have reached agreement so quickly that we have been able to complete our talks in a day. That will give us the chance to visit Istanbul. General Evren added: In fact, our talks which lasted a day have ended with complete agreement. I can say that such contacts will continue between the two countries.

General Evren said that the Kuwaiti amir invited him to visit his country and that he would do so as soon as possible. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal and Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen returned to Ankara with General Evren.

Joint Communique

[Text] The joint communique on Turkish-Kuwaiti talks was released in Ankara today. The communique says that the two heads of state express their pleasure over the continuous development of bilateral relations between the two countries and reiterate their determination for the further promotion and strengthening of cooperation. Noting that the two sides are concerned with the negative developments in international relations, the communique says that respect for global peace and security, independence, sovereignty and noninterference in the internal affairs of other countries are indispensable in international relations.

The communique further notes the concern of the two sides on the escalation of the arms race in the world, and calls for arms limitation and for the strengthening of efforts to create an atmosphere of positive cooperation among countries.

On the Palestine issue, the communique says that no just and lasting solution to the Middle East problem will be found until the right of Palestinians to form an independent state on their land is recognized, and until Israel withdraws completely from the occupied lands. The communique adds that the PLO must be a party to these efforts. The communique notes that Kuwait appreciates the just Turkish stand on this issue and its support for the Arab cause. After denouncing Israeli attacks on innocent people in Lebanon and Israel's interference in the affairs of Lebanon, the communique says that all efforts to establish peace and stability in the country must be supported.

The communique adds that the two sides express their determination for the development of cooperation among the Islamic countries on various fields and for the continuation of efforts in a bid to strengthen the Islamic Conference Organization.

The communique expresses great concern over the continuing war between Iran and Iraq and says that all efforts by the Islamic Conference Organization to find a peaceful solution to this problem in a short time are supported.

The communique states that the Afghanistan problem must be solved in a way based on respect for that country's sovereignty and independence.

Pointing out that the insurance of peace and security in the Gulf area is the responsibility of the Gulf countries, the communique calls for the prevention of foreign intervention in the area. The communique notes that Turkey supports efforts for the strengthening of relations among the member countries of the council of cooperation among the Arab countries of the Gulf.

Stressing the importance of extending aid to developing countries, the communique appeals on all developed countries to actively participate for the establishment of a new world economic order.

On the issue of economic relations between the two countries, the communique notes: The two sides have reached an agreement to devise a general framework that will create an atmosphere suitable to increase trade, tourism, service and investment enterprises in a way that will serve the mutual benefit of the two countries and to engage in new activities that will promote cooperation between them. The communique expresses the belief that such a framework would provide new dimensions in joint ventures in the fields of agriculture, petrochemical industries, communication, transportation, infrastructural constructions, tourism, as well as other fields of service both on the bilateral level or with cooperation with interested third parties.

The communique points out that all contacts among businessmen, industrialists and representatives of relevant private or state enterprises will be encouraged. Meetings will be held in a short while in a bid to examine possibilities for investments in joint projects, banking, financial activities, transportation facilities, and to reach agreements in these fields.

The communique concludes by noting that Amir Jabir al-Ahmad as-Sabah has invited Head of State General Evren for an official visit to Kuwait and that this invitation has been accepted.

ISTANBUL COURT GIVES DEATH SENTENCE TO 8 LEFTISTS

TA041636 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 4 Sep 81

[Summary] The trial of 16 terrorists belonging to the illegal revolutionary sympathizers union in the path of the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front [THKP-C] has begun at the Second Military Court of the Istanbul Martial Law Command.

The suspects are charged with undertaking actions in order to change the constitutional order by force. Death penalties are being demanded for eight of the terrorists.

In his indictment, the military prosecutor noted that the organization intended to overthrow the constitutional order in Turkey through an armed people's revolution and replace it with a Marxist-Leninist system. The prosecutor explained that the organization has a central structure with a single cell and was involved in numerous incidents including murder and armed robbery.

MINISTER OZAL REPORTS INCREASE IN INDUSTRIAL EXPORTS

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has said that according to figures at the end of July 1981, the share of industrial exports in total exports rose by 11 percent from last year and reached 47.5 percent. Speaking at a meeting organized by the Istanbul Chamber of Trade, Ozal pointed out that even though the rate of inflation was slowed to a very significant degree, it remained one of Turkey's most important problems. Ozal said: Turkey's balance of payments is improving. According to figures at the end of July 1981, the share of our industrial exports in our total exports rose by 11 percent from last year and reached 47.5 percent. The second important development concerns the workers' remittances and the invisible (?columns). Significant progress is being made here. The balance of payments will further improve in 1 and 1/2 years.

Ozal stressed that it was an important development that the tax revenues and the budget were balanced. He said that for the first time the 1981 budget would be balanced, or maybe with only a very small deficit.

Also addressing the meeting, Finance Minister Kaya Erdem explained that, following the implementation of the tax law, domestic financing was being carried out without resorting to central bank sources and that this was an important factor in reducing the rate of inflation. He stressed that at a time when developing countries were cutting down on their imports in order to fight inflation, Turkey had increased its exports and that this was a sign of success.

Trade Minister Kemal Canturk told the meeting that investments must be accelerated for Turkey's economic development. He added that the state would help investing companies.

COMMUNIST PARTY CLAIMS UNDIMINISHED STRENGTH

TA081125 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 8 Sep 81

[Station commentary: "The Turkish Communist Party Is the Voice of the Masses"]

[Excerpts] The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] will be 61 years old on 10 September 1981. It has been living within our working class and our people for 61 years. It is struggling together with our people. Our working class and people have been concealing it for 61 years against the attack by the sovereign forces. They are donating their most enlightened, brave and self-sacrificing sons to the ranks of the TCP. The TCP does not have anything to hide from our people. It has no special interest except the interests of the working class and the toilers. The TCP is the brain, the honor and the conscience of our working class and people. Its cause is synonymous with the cause of the working class. As the voice of millions of workers who do not want to be exploited, the TCP defends a system devoid of exploitation, namely socialism.

The goal and program of the TCP consists of the wishes, interests and liberation of our people. This is why the TCP has nothing to hide from our people. It is not our people who are scared of the TCP, it is those who fear our working class, our people and their wishes and aspirations who are scared of the TCP. The sovereign exploitative forces' fear of the TCP is the fear that the people will become enlightened and organized. This is why they have not allowed the TCP to operate legally for the past 61 years. The TCP is not hiding from our people. It is the sovereign forces who are trying to conceal the TCP from our people. Those who exploit the people to the bone, who abandon our national economy to the mercy of the likes of the IMF, and our national security to the mercy of NATO and who terrorize the people are the enemies of the TCP. The enemies of people are naturally also the enemies of the TCP. Every time they violate the livelihood and freedom of our people they also attack the TCP. The same thing is happening now. The reactionary military dictatorship, which is forcing our people to tighten their belts under the threat of the bayonet and which is violating freedoms, is also striking at the TCP. The military administration, which has demonstrated that it is not capable of finding deep-rooted and lasting solutions to any of the people's problems, is torturing and imprisoning progressive and patriotic persons, whose only crime consists of defending the people's cause, on the grounds that they are members of the TCP.

The junta is thus attempting to intimidate our people, whose dissatisfaction is swelling by the day, and the hundreds of thousands of workers and their families, whom it plans to abandon into hunger and unemployment through massive dismissals. As though this were not sufficient, the most reactionary forces are reverting to incomprehensibles lies and slanders in order to belittle communists and the TCP in the eyes of our people. As an additional measure, they are trying to create desperation among our people and are embracing the lie that they caused the collapse of the TCP. The working class gave the necessary revolutionary answer to this by convening the TCP Central Committee plenum.

The TCP has experienced numerous such attacks, slanders and lies. It progressed for 61 years by confronting such attacks and disproving the lies. Many civilian and military governments have come and gone. The assailants have long since occupied the place they deserve in history; but the TCP remained. It emerged from every attack more consolidated and more expert. Our people heeded its voice and defended it more and more every day. Why was this? This was because the TCP has always been right and its conscience is always clear, and because it is the voice of the working class--which is increasingly gaining strength--and our people who are becoming more and more enlightened. The TCP is a party which is nurtured on this fertile land and whose roots extend to the very core of the masses. The TCP is the property of our people. The voice of the TCP cannot be silenced because it is the voice of our people. It cannot be destroyed because it relies on our people and our people rely on it. The TCP cannot be destroyed because our working class and the masses cannot be eliminated. The TCP will develop and become stronger because the future belongs to the working class and our toiling people.

TCP CONGRATULATES BELGIAN PARTY ON ANNIVERSARY

TA051211 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0500 GMT 5 Sep 81

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen's message to the Belgian Communist Party Central Committee on the latter's 60th anniversary--dated 4 September 1981, read by announcer]

[Text] To the Belgian Communist Party [PCB/KPB] Central Committee: Dear Comrades, on behalf of all the Turkish Communists and workers of our country, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee sincerely congratulates you on the 60th anniversary of the PCB/KPB. Since the day it was founded, the PCB/KPB has always been in the foremost ranks of the struggles for the interests and demands of the working class and broad worker masses in Belgium. It struggles to weave the unity of the broadest leftist forces against the domination of the monopolies. It defends peace, detente and disarmament against the aggressive and adventurist policies of the U.S. administration and of the NATO ruling circles. It fights in the foremost ranks of the struggle against the new U.S. missiles planned to be placed in Western Europe and against the neutron bomb.

Comrades, the rightist military dictatorship which assumed power in Turkey on 12 September 1980 continues to direct the sharp point of its attacks against the Turkish working class, against its political and syndical organization and against the progressive and patriotic forces. We thank you once more for the solidarity and patriotic forces. We thank you once more for the solidarity you have displayed with the Turkish Communists and progressive forces opposing the imperialist demands and struggling against exploitation by the collaborationist monopolies, against Turkey's dependence on NATO and against the attacks by the miliary regime.

The TCP is linked with the PCB/KPB with brotherly ties based upon common struggle ideals and internationalist solidarity. We wish you success on the 60th anniversary of the PCB/KPB. With our communist greetings.

[Signed] TCP Central Committee Secretary General Bilen, 4 September 1981

TUC VOTES FOR UNILATERAL NUCLEAR DISARMAMENT

LD101806 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1747 GMT 10 Sep 81

[Excerpts] The TUC today threw its weight behind the left-wing of the Labor Party by voting overwhelmingly in favour of Britain's unilateral nuclear disarmament. Delegates to the annual conference in Blackpool called on the next Labor prime minister to ban nuclear weapons from British soil. If this happens it will mean an end to all nuclear bases in this country--both American and British.

In a motion calling for an "unequivocal policy declaration" in Labor's next election manifesto, TUC delegates demanded:

--The closure of all nuclear bases in Britain.

--No siting of cruise or Trident missiles in Britain or the neutron bomb in Europe.

--A cut in arms spending.

--Opposition to any British defence policy "based on the use or threatened use of nuclear weapons."

--Government aid for alternative work for those who lost their jobs through these policies.

--Full support for the world disarmament campaign.

SCHMIDT DISCUSSES EUROPEAN MISSILES, PEACE EFFORT

LD140922 Hamburg DPA in German 0804 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 14 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said that the Federal Government will do everything in its power to spare Europe and its peoples a "missile race" between East and West in European nuclear medium-range weapons.

Schmidt said in an article published on Monday in the GEWERKSCHAFTLICHE MONATSHEFTE that it is the firm intention of the Federal Government and of the parties supporting it to strengthen, at a time of change in the international climate, the policy of balance and cooperation beyond borders by means of a purposeful negotiations on arms control and disarmament. "Anyone worried about the continuation of a policy of safeguarding peace and of detente in Europe can rely on the fact that the Federal Government will continue its efforts to safeguard peace all the more resolutely if these efforts are subjected to strains for which we are not responsible."

Schmidt again criticized Soviet arming with modern medium-range missiles, which was not provoked by the West and to which the NATO dual decision is the "inevitable response." He emphatically opposed the Germans' turning away from "the two equal parts" of this decision--negotiation and arming--because the Soviet Union could not otherwise be moved to negotiations. Nor did Schmidt rule out the possibility of abandoning the so-called NATO counterarming. If the Soviet Union's leadership decides in the course of negotiations to reduce its new SS-20 missiles directed against the West, "then there is a chance of the often referred to 'zero option,' that is, the United States does not set up any new systems." Schmidt advocated military equilibrium in Europe at the lowest possible level. "With the same seriousness with which we point out to the Soviet Union that counterarming on the Western side can be neither abandoned nor lifted if the Soviets persist in their advance arming. We will make it clear that it cannot be the aim of the West to seek military superiority," he said.

CLASHES, ARRESTS OCCUR AT ANTI-U.S. DEMONSTRATION

[Text] Berlin, 13 Sep (DPA)--Following a peaceful demonstration against American foreign and security policy, which was attended by about 50,000 people, large-scale clashes occurred in Berlin this afternoon. Police spoke about numerous disruptive groups who with excessive militancy opposed police in the side streets around the Schoeneberg Winterfeld Square. More than 100 persons were arrested. Some of the militant demonstrators were carrying axes. One foodstore was looted and a large number of windows were smashed. Several cases of arson occurred. Many cars were damaged by rocks. The attempt by a large group of demonstrators to enter the closed off area 1 mile around Schoeneberg townhall was frustrated.

The meeting between U.S. Secreary of State Alexander Haig and governing Mayor Richard von Weizsaecker took place at the townhall this afternoon. Eyewitnesses to the clashes reported that police were proceeding indiscriminately also against peaceful demonstrators who merely watched the event.

POLITICIANS WELCOME SECRETARY HAIG REMARKS

LD131648 Hamburg DPA in German 1621 GMT 13 Sep 81

[Excerpts] [No dateline received] The remarks made by the U.S. secretary of state have won the approval of the CDU opposition in Bonn.

CDU Chairman Helmut Kohl welcomed Haig's affirmation of the American commitment to Berlin and shared his view that political events in East and West should no longer be judged by double standards.

Alois Mertes, the CDU/CSU parliamentary spokesman for foreign affairs, welcomed in a statement to DPA the fact that Haig has credibly affirmed American determination to strike a balance between the ability to secure peace by deterrence and its readiness to enter into East-West negotiations on arms limitations with undiminished security.

Berlin SPD Thanks

[Text] Berlin, 13 Sep (DPA)--The Berlin SPD has thanked U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig for his clear words on his visit to Berlin today and sharply condemned the disorders following a peaceful demonstration against U.S. foreign and security policy. A press release by Lothar Loeffler, vice chairman of the Berlin SPD, says that Haig told Berliners that this basis of their freedom will remain inviolable. American friendship with and commitment to Berlin are undiminished as is American resolve not to flag in their efforts "for our protection."

The SPD regretted the fact that "the mob used this demonstration once again to carry violence and unrest into the streets of Berlin." The SPD's sympathy goes out to the many injured police officers. The demonstration has shown that "one cannot credibly demonstrate for peace if extremist groups turn the streets into a battlefield."

EXPLOSIVES THROWN AT U.S. CONSUL GENERAL'S HOUSE

[Text] Frankfurt, 13 Sep (DPA)--The private home of the American consul general in Frankfurt was the target of an incendiary attack during the night of 12-13 September. Minor damage was caused. A police spokesman said that three explosive devices, two of which did not detonate, were thrown at the house. One ended up on the front lawn and another between double windows. The third one exploded on a carpet. Prompt action by those inside the house prevented a fire.

FRG AGREES TO FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR U.S. TROOPS

[Text] Bonn, 12 Sep (DPA)--The Defense Ministry intends to continue its financial support for American troops in the expansion and guarding of their depots on FRG territory. The Foreign Office confirmed to DPA today shortly before the visit by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig that Bonn had replied to the so-called "Stoessel demarche" in this spirit.

The former U.S. ambassador to the FRG, Walter Stoessel, had submitted Washington's corresponding wishes to Defense Minister Hans Apel last autumn. This involves payments for "host nation support" in the form of German forces supporting American troop reinforcement logistics. It has been reliably learned that the Federal Army is prepared during the coming years to provide about DM1 billion for this project. About DM150 million are earmarked for storage of U.S. equipment in 1982.

In case of war, six American divisions will be brought into the Federal Republic as reinforcements. According to current plans, about 2,000 Germans are to maintain and guard in peacetime the U.S. stockpiles of arms and equipment.

The Defense Ministry does not believe that the other U.S. concepts submitted by Stoessel concerning financial "host nation support" during peacetime are its province. This is a matter for the Foreign Office and Finance Ministry, it said.

This involves, above all, for Bonn to provide considerable funds for the renovation of U.S. barracks and accommodations as well as other improved living conditions for American soldiers and their families. The cost of such a program is estimated to be far in excess of DM6 billion.

Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel, during his visit to the American capital in March, made it quite plain that he is unable to provide funds from his budget.

It also was learned that Bonn continues to be opposed to recent Washington plans for the transfer of U.S. troops to the GDR frontier. In view of the precarious financial situation, the German side is unable to help finance such an expensive enterprise.

Political circles in Bonn today did not try to conceal that the Americans may well be somewhat disappointed. The only thing which the Federal Republic appears to be able to offer at the moment is the readiness to continue talks about the financial problems with the American ally.

PAPER DECRIES NUMERICAL CUT IN ARMED FORCES

[Adelbert Weinstein editorial: "For a Present Bundeswehr"]

[Text] The current Bundeswehr has become too expensive. The defense minister seeks another solution. A "commission for long term planning" has the task of working out suggestions by the end of this year. One plan aims to rigorously cut the numerical strength of our armed forces. The Bundeswehr's 495,000 men are supposed to be reduced by approximately 280,000 soldiers who would not be available for action. These men reportedly are supposed to be some sort of flexible reserve. They could join the active troops within 72 hours.

This roughly outlined draft indicates that one cannot simply "invent" strategic concepts just like that. Even though military planning is only a means of assisting security policy, it must fulfill a strategic condition: It must be in accordance with respective current realities. These demands are not fulfilled by the "shrinking model." All considerations aimed at curtailing the presence of our units are unfruitful thoughts. They ignore our political situation in the alliance, the geostrategic situation and the military difficulties resulting from partial mobilization.

It is assumed that several hundred thousand men could be integrated into the active forces within 3 days. Where is the apparatus able to organize it? Who can be certain, particularly now, that people will follow induction in a crisis situation? Assuming even that the technical organization of returning to the barracks would function, there would still be the transport problem. The reinforcement of cadre units would run parallel to the operative movements of the allied armed forces. This action could become necessary only in an alarming crisis.

In such a case, however, the Belgians and the Netherlanders also would have to be mobilized and they would have to reach their assembly areas in long marches. American units also would be moving from west to east. This hectic traffic of vehicles would be crossed by supplies transported from North Sea ports to the south. The current forward defense strategic concentration plan seems already rather unrealistic and the backflow of thousands of soldiers to their barracks would lead to chaos.

Those who want to cope with that cannot contradict the macabre predictions of Belgian General Klose. According to his calculations, the Soviets could reach the Rhine in 48 hours. This former NATO general bases his thesis on the assumption that the alliance would not have any warning time because the Russian divisions would make a sudden assault. Why shouldn't they do it if the planning of the strongest conventional army envisages numerical cuts and if the cadre troops will need 1 week--that would be a realistic assumption--to become full-fledged units again?

Such a decrease of presence would leave only the U.S. 7th Army as an Atlantic unit with the striking power in the first hour on the possible theater. The British Rhine Army--a professional unit--would be available to a certain extent. This means that the general planning of the central European front must be changed. The Americans would lower the nuclear threshold for their own security reasons. They cannot avoid the consideration of keeping access to Atlantic ports open with tactical nuclear strikes. The British would have to act similarly. One cannot reckon any more with the possibility of French units moving into the forward defense front. Paris was always interested in using the French 1st Army in the Frankfurt-Kassel area for the defense of the "Moselle Gate." Such planning is senseless if the "Bundeswehr buffer" doesn't fulfill its function in the Federal Republic as a buffer area.

Political reservations are even more grave than operative and tactical reservations. Our security policy is aimed at the prevention of war. A nonwar situation is to be preserved through military presence. Our divisions and air squadrons are elements of the deterrence strategy. The contradiction that our armed forces must be able to fight although they should not can be understood. They must be, therefore, credibly strong. The stronger they are, the less of a risk will exist that the other side might try to enforce political solutions with military power. Another reality also exists: If the presence of conventional forces is strong, the nuclear threshold will be high.

One more argument against lowering the military presence: We would be giving away a trump card in the great MBFR poker game without getting anything for it. One should quickly forget the plans aimed at decreasing the military presence. They should not even be discussed.

PRESIDENT LAUDS TALKS WITH UK PRIME MINISTER

[Text] Francois Mitterrand has returned from London. Rarely has there been so much cordiality at a French-British meeting. The decision to begin the examination next month of various projects for constructing a tunnel under the channel is considered to be symbolic of revived cooperation between the two countries.

Francois Mitterrand and Margaret Thatcher have reached agreement on a large number of the questions discussed, with the exception, of course, of the European problem. But on this subject too, they are ready to continue discussions in order to reduce and overcome differences, and this alone is already a success.

Francois Mitterrand stressed that the talks at 10 Downing Street permitted the establishment of a line of action for the revival of Europe through intensified bilateral cooperation.

Mitterrand Comments

LD111822 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Summary] Despite differences of views between the Socialist French president and the Conservative British prime minister, the French-British summit ended under the sign of entente cordiale. The climate was described by both sides as excellent. Francois Mitterrand explains that problems are there to be solved. The essential thing is to keep in touch and discuss matters.

[Begin Mitterrand recording] The matters discussed between us show that by this method we will arrive at reducing differences and overcoming them. I also had to point out that one cannot separate the problem of surpluses from that of imports, imports coming from outside the community which create competition and internal tensions. True, specific problems or matters of dispute exist between our countries. In this respect, there is the British claim as far as fisheries is concerned and there is the French position which says that commitments were made and one is keeping to them. Our own position, the French position, is never to close the door but one has to be reminded in simple terms and as precisely as possible of our main points and if need be of our decisions. CHEYSSON PLANS FIRST MEETING WITH GROMYKO

The Foreign Ministry here said today that the French diplomatic chief plans 18 meetings with foreign government officials during his stay in New York. The talks will include meetings with U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig, Chinese Foreign Minister Huang Hua, Israelo Foreign Minister Yitzhaq Shamir, Egyptian Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali, Polish Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek and Pakistani Foreign Minister Agha Shahi, the ministry said.

Mr Cheysson is to arrive in New York on September 20 after stopping in Brussels for a Common Market foreign ministers meeting and in Copenhagen for talks with Danish Foreign Minister Kjeld Olesen. He is to address the General Assembly on September 23.

FOREIGN MINISTRY RESTATES STANCE ON ANGOLA

[Excerpt] On Monday, 7 September, the French Government announced that it has "every reason to think that, despite the international community's urgent appeals, the South African troops are still operating on the territory of the People's Republic of Angola." "At a time when efforts are being stepped up to lead Namibia to independence," the Quai d'Orsay communique continued, "the South African military action must be ended." It concluded by expressing "once again" France's "grave concern" and by recalling "the urgent need for an immediate and full withdrawal of the forces operating on the other side of the Cunene River."

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY APPROVES DECENTRALIZATION BILL

[Text] Paris, 12 Sep (AFP)--The National Assembly today approved a decentralisation bill by 329 to 129 votes as the first step in the Socialist government's self-proclaimed "grand design" to modernise France's institutions, many dating from Napoleon.

The complex list of articles, which deal with the new powers and rights of regions, departments and communes has still to go through parliamentary committees and the senate before returning to the National Assembly for final approval. But there seems little doubt that decentralisation will become a new feature in French political life, judging by the speed with which this bill was treated in the National Assembly, where the left has an overwhelming majority.

The bill was piloted through the assembly by Interior Minister Gaston Defferre, who set the date of September 15 as the goal for the approval of its first reading. It was approved just after midnight today. The vote is looked on as a triumph for Mr Deferre, who insisted on marathon sittings to debate the bill's 450 different articles, and almost as many opposition amendments.

The most spectacular change will be the reduction of the traditional powers of France's 95 prefects, heads of police functioning as departmental governors implementing policies made in Paris. Even the name "prefect" will be changed to "commissioner of the republic." But the "commissioner" will no longer have the prefect's authority and executive role in departmental affairs.

The opposition violently opposed the bill, mainly on the grounds that it "threatened national unity" and that it would "mean the return of feudalism." Opposition Gaullist Deputy Charles Millon spoke for many when he said: "We support a realistic decentralisation but not one full of idealistic dreams."

Mr Defferre, replying to criticism that decentralisation would lead to France breaking up, said: "With us national unity is not brought about by armed force, but by man's conviction."

Parliamentary observers noted that there was still an immense amount of work to be done before the measure became law. Thorny problems would be the financial aid the central government would give to departments, and the degree of autonomy enjoyed by the new local and regional bodies.

MARCHAIS: COMMUNIST MINISTERS 'HERE FOR GOOD'

LD121824 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 12 Sep 81

[Text] Communist ministers are not in transit in the government; they are here for good. This is what Georges Marchais said this morning at the L'HUMANITE festival at La Courneuve.

The first secretary of the Communist Party was replying to questions from television journalists. This was a sort of political comeback after a month on vacation. For Georges Marchais, the changes now taking place must continue and the class struggle must continue to defeat those who oppose change. He is, however, not always compassionate and is not surprised that some of Francois Mitterrand's electors are disappointed. They have voted for the left but would have preferred, in his opinion, the Communist program.

[Begin Marchais recording] There are people who voted for the left, who voted for Francois Mitterrand and who now feel a certain disappointment and this does not surprise me. There are people who voted for the left but for a different policy. [end recording]

But Georges Marchais values for the changes that are going on and supports them fully. The Communist ministers are proof of this and they are not here temporarily.

[Begin Marchais recording] We are in the government--as far as we are concerned--and are determined to do everything successfully. Consequently, if there are people who believe that we are here for a few months or for a year or 2, they are mistaken. We do and we will do everything to progress in the right direction. [end recording]

DIFFICULTIES DELAY FOURTH ARIANE LAUNCHING

NC112000 Paris AFP in English 1929 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 11 Sep (AFP)--Technical difficulties will delay the fourth launching of the European Ariane rocket from mid-November probably until early December, informed sources said today.

Specialists were not yet able to specify the launching date from the space center of Kourou, French Guiana.

Several months of problems have already been reported in trying to iron out difficulties with the one-ton maritime telecommunications satellite "Marecs" that Ariane was to launch into space. The latest delay results from its continued malfunctioning in ground tests, the report said.

Reports said there were no problems with the functioning of the rocket itself, which will be shipped to French Guiana as planned at the end of September.

Two successful Ariane launches have already been made in December 1979 and on June 19.

The fifth Ariane launching, which will involve the European telecommunications satellite "ECS-1", planned for April or May 1982.

SPADOLINI, FRG'S SCHMIDT HOLD TALKS IN ROME

AU112002 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 11 Sep (ANSA)--West German Chancellor Helmut Schimdt and Italy's Premier Giovanni Spadolini met today for a round of talks on East-West balance of forces, European construction, the situation in the Mediterranean and in the Middle East.

Schmidt arrived in Rome at 1400 GMT. The two government chiefs were later joined by West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich and his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo and, later, by their economic ministers Hans Matthofer, Nino Andreatta, Giorgio la Malfa and Rino Formica.

In discussions on their respective economic policies, Schmidt showed "great interest" in the Italian Governments program for reducing inflation by stages. Both Italy and West Germany have set the same percentage cutback in their budgets (two percent of the GNP).

Spadolini and Schmidt reiterated their conviction of the need for a rapid inversion of the United States policy of high interest rates. Schmidt, disclosed, however, that the state of the West German currency is "good" and that inflation stands at 5-6 percent annually.

An Italian spokesman said later that Schmidt and Spadolini acknowledged "identity of views" in international politics, particularly their joint positions on the need for both Europe to carry out, in total respect of its alliances, actions of its own to promote a resumption of East-West detente as well as the basic condition of "parity of forces" between the two blocs to begin negotiations on arms reduction.

This exchange of views was considered useful also in view of next Sunday's meeting in Bonn between Schmidt and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and scheduled talks between the West German chancellor and Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev in Bonn in November. Schmidt also showed interest in Italy's moves to strengthen the battle against hunger in the world and appreciation for Italy's role in the Mediterranean.

The Bonn Government is particularly interested in Malta's neutrality and it is possible that West Germany will associate itself with Italy to guarantee the island nation's neutrality.

The same "identity of views" on main international issues emerged in the talks between foreign ministers Genscher and Colombo. They both reiterated they want to promote Europe's defense and the need to reopen East-West talks.

The same positions emerged on the issues of disarmament, Middle East, Namibia and Cyprus, and both sides insisted on the need for a "new dynamic in political Europe", capable of presenting a single image of the ten community partners to the rest of the world.

Tomorrow, the Spadolini-Schmidt talks will resume and the chancellor's visit will wind up with a joint press conference. Schmidt will then pay a visit to President Sandro Pertini and will have a private audience with Pope John Paul II at the papal summer residence at Castelgandolfo before returning to Bonn.

Further Talks

Schmidt and Spadolini were in full agreement yesterday about the need to resume the East-West detente process, to pursue the West European unification process and to approach European-United States relations on an equal footing when it comes to discussing economic policy matters as well as detente and world peace.

The visiting West German Government leader promised Bonn's support for Italian efforts to bring down inflation to below the ten percent mark by the year 1984. Both men also agreed that conditions were ripe for pursuing negotiations with the Soviet Union for the construction of the long-planned gas pipeline from Siberia to West Europe.

After today's talks, Schmidt and Spadolini will meet the press to give a more detailed account of their meetings and display the prospects for closer cooperation between Italy and West Germany within the realm of the European Community and the international scene in general.

Aside from his official talks with the Italian permier Friday, Schmidt met in a private capacity with the leaders of the five political parties partnered in the Rome government coalition. These included Spadolini, who is secretary of the Republican Party (PRI), as well as Chrisitian Democrat (DC) Secretary Flaminio Piccoli, Socialist Party (PSI) leader Bettino Craxi, Social Democrat (PSDI) Pietro Longo and Liberal (PLI) Valerio Zanone.

DPA Report

[Excerpt] Rome, 12 Sep (DPA)--Germans and Italians agree that the U.S. Government should discuss problems of military balance and disarmament with the Europeans. This was made plain by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini at a press conference on Saturday at the end of a working visit to Rome by the German head of government.

The talks on Friday and Saturday resulted in a "nearly identical assessment of the international situation," the two politicians emphasized. Schmidt said if the United States had consulted the Europeans prior to its decision on the neutron weapon, "Bonn and Rome would have at least advised against the present timing."

Schmidt once again criticized the U.S. policy of high interest rates which is the "second important cause" of the world's economic difficulties behind oil price developments. It was learned that Spadolini and Schmidt had agreed in private to ward off all attempts by the United States "to prevent negotiations with the USSR on the planned natural gas deal."

Political observers believe that the chancellor's remark that unemployment cannot be countered by "printing money."--that is, an increase in money circulated--was directed at France. The treaty in which Italy guarantees Malta's neutrality was also touched upon during the talks between the two heads of government. It seems that the Rome government woulk like to see the Federal Republic join this agreement by taking on financial obligations. However, German delegation circles said that Bonn is merely considering recognition of Malta's neutrality. "Any further step is out of the question," it was said.

Meeting With Pope

[Excerpts] Rome, 12 Sep (DPA)--Pope John Paul II and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt today discussed problems of disarmament and East-West relations in Castlegandolfo. The subject of Poland was also touched upon.

Although the two sides kept silent about the 25-minute talk at the pope's summer reside it was said that the pope told the chancellor that he considers the resumption of the disarmament dialogue between the United States and the Soviet Union very important. Th talk took place in German without an interpreter. The chancellor's trip to Castlegandolfo was officially described as a courtesy visit. Schmidt wanted to brief himself on the progress of the pope's recovery.

It was learned from the chancellor's entourage that the meeting was most cordial. Both sides felt an urgent desire for a meeting, which on account of the pope's health had been in question right to the end.

News Conference, Departure

AU121922 Rome ANSA in English 1910 GMT 12 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 12 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini and West German Chancell Helmut Schmidt confirmed here today that their governments were in "full agreement" abo key foreign policy issues, especially those related to security matters. Meeting the press after two days of talks in Rome, Spadolini and Schmidt called for more frequent consultations between Western Europe and the United States because, as the Italian Gove ment leader put it, "that's the only way of reaching a better degree of understanding."

Schmidt particularly stressed the need of improving U.S.-European communication lines i economic policy matters, charging that the present recession stemmed from Washington's monetary policies as much as from rising oil prices. U.S. President Ronald Reagan's "monetarist" policies, the West German leader said, "were having a severe effect on inflation and unemployment rates."

Asked for his views about Washington's plans to produce neutron warheads, Schmidt repli as follows, saying he and Spadolini fully agreed on this standpoint: "Had the U.S. consulted us before deciding to go through with assembling the bombs, the governments in Rome and Bonn would have surely advised (Washington authorities) not to take the step a this time."

Both Schmidt and Spadolini dismised the question of ever deploying the neutron bomb in Europe as an "untimely" issue. Spadolini reported that both the Italian and West Germa governments were striving to get negotiations underway with the Soviet Union as soon as possible "with a vision of (strategic) balance and equality between the two blocs." He insisted that "equality" was the "indispensible condition" on the ground that "there ca be negotiations without equality, and without negotiations, co-existence would be impossible."

Schmidt paid a call on Italian chief-of-state Sandro Pertini after finishing his talks Spadolini. A presidential spokesman said after the close to one-hour meeting that the countries interests "had never been as close before" as they are today. Pertini report harped on the need for reviving the European unification process, an issue of which the Italian president is a strong advocate.

The Bonn government leader's visit to Italy wound up with a trip to Castel Gandolfo, a lake town south of Rome where the pope has his summer residence. The 25-minute meeting between Schmidt and the Polish-born Pope John Paul II was a strictly private affair. N even an interpreter was admitted to the library where the talks took place. After the ritual exchange of presents with the Catholic Church leader, Schmidt went straight to t Ciampino Airport for his flight home.

The chancellor arrived in Rome Friday with his ministers of foreign affairs and the economy, Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Hans Matthofer, for a routine round of consultation between Bonn and Rome government authorities.

COLOMBO MEETS VISITING CYPRIOT FOREIGN MINISTER

[Text] Rome, 10 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian desire to act, alongside Rome's partners in the European Economic Community, in seeking a solution to the situation on Cyprus was expressed today by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo to the visiting Cypriot foreign minister, Nicos Rolandhis. In a talk which lasted one hour, the two diplomatic chiefs exchanged views on developments in the situation on the island republic and Rolandhis outlined the thrust of recent proposals formulated by the Turkish community, seen as inadequate by the Cypriot Government, for a solution to the ongoing dispute between Turkish and Greek communities.

The visiting foreign minister said that the situation centers on an unequivocal case of occupation by two European countries. At present, he explained, Turkish groops control 36 percent of the island. The Turkish community, according to the most recent set of proposals, are willing to return only 3 percent of this territory. The Cypriot Government, on the other hand, would like to leave no more than 20 percent of this territory in Turkish hands.

Both foreign ministers agreed on the need for a speedy solution to the issue and Colombo emphasized the Italian desire to see and agreement reached as step toward assuring a higher degree of stability for the Mediterranean region.

The Italian foreign minister also reported that Italy is willing to back the United Nations in the world body's difficult mediation bid and announced his intention to outline the Italian position to Turkey during talks he will have in New York on the sidelines of the autumn General Assembly of the United Nations.

Referring to relations between Turkey and the EEC, Colombo said that Italy favors reconfirming concessions to Turkey in the agricultural sector, those relations agreed to in 1978 on a temporary basis, and renewing in advance the general financial protocol between the community and Cyprus, slated to lapse in 1983.

Colombo also briefed his Cypriot counterpart on the position of the Italian Government on the recent statements made by Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, who threatened Sicily, Crete and Turkey if NATO or American bases are used to launch an attack against Libya or if another American-Libyan air clash should occur.

Talks Conclude

[Excerpts] Rome, 11 Sep (ANSA)--Cypriot Foreign Minister Nicos Rolandhis departed for Nicosia this morning after receiving assurances from Italian Minister Emilio Colombo on Italy's desire to work, alongside Rome's partners in the European Economic Community, for a settlement to the situation on Cyprus.

The two diplomatic chiefs exchanged views on developments in the situation on Cyprus and Rolandhis outlined the thrust of recent proposals formulated by the Turkish community, seen as inadequate by the Cypriot Government, for a solution to the tensions between the Greek and Turkish communities of the island republic.

Both foreign ministers agreed on the need for a speedy solution to the issue and Colombo emphasized the Italian desire to see a settlement as a step toward assuring a higher degree of stability for the entire Mediterranean region.

FOREIGN MINISTER PEREZ LLORCA ON JOINING NATO

PM111455 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 1 Sep 81 pp 3-4

[Excerpt] Madrid, 31 Aug--With regard to NATO, Foreign Minister Perez Llorca made a statement to the media today in which he said, among other things, that "the negotiations for the bilateral agreement with the United States will have to wait until the Atlantic alliance membership process is over. The necessary measures to this end will be two stages: First membership, and then integration into the military system. "Under no circumstances," Perez Llorca added, "will nuclear weapons be deployed or stored in Spain."

The minister seemed somewhat skeptical about the effectiveness and importance of the bilateral treaty with the United States and said that "the present situation is clearly precarious and unsatisfactory and is tantamount to satellitization."

He concluded his remarks by saying that "by joining the Atlantic alliance Spain will take a decisive step toward the completion, on the international plane, of the democratic transition process."

HAIG REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR SPAIN'S NATO MEMBERSHIP

LD131722 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1200 GMT 13 Sep 81

[Text] Although U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig did not meet with Spanish authorities during his stopover in Malaga yesterday, this brief stay did allow him to reaffirm U.S. support for Spain's entry into NATO. This statement coincides with the U.S. Defense Department's announcement on selling arms to Spain and several countries in the Middle East. The Pentagon proposes to sell Spain 18 antisubmarine Sh-60-B helicopters, technically known as Light Airborne Multi-Purpose System--LAMPS, worth $510 million, according to a report in the Madrid daily YA.

ETA CLAIMS CREDIT FOR EXPLOSION IN USURBIL

[Text] Bilbao, northwest Spain, 13 Sep (AFP)--The Spanish Basque independist organisation, ETA-Military, today claimed responsibility for a bomb blast which injured two civil guards at Usurbil in Guipuzcoa Province.

The blast occurred yesterday near a transformer of the Iberduero Company, after the two guards went there following an anonymous phone call.

ETA-Military, in a call to the Basque daily paper EGIN, said the blast was aimed at the guards and not the Iberduero Company, target of nationalists as it is constructing a nuclear power station at Lemoniz in Vizcaya Province.

THATCHER, MITTERRAND HOLD PRESS CONFERENCE

LD111304 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1155 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Text] Britain and France are to go ahead immediately with big new studies on a possible channel tunnel, Mrs Thatcher and the French president agreed at their summit in London today.

The news was announced by Mrs Thatcher at a joint press conference after talks at Downing Street this morning. The first meeting between officials on the project--seven or eight schemes have already been drawn up--will take place within a month. Mrs Thatcher said: "We are very keen that studies on this project should go ahead." She said Britain wanted to finance the scheme privately. The studies would "go ahead immediately," she said, adding: "We hope it will achieve positive results."

President Mitterrand demonstrated equal enthusiasm for the revived project. "We are making progress," he said. "Before we act we obviously have to reflect on this, but we are not doing it in an airy fairy fashion." He added the project should "stop being just a sea serpent." Proposed schemes range from a simple rail tunnel costing 800 million pounds to a complex giant bridge and tunnel project with an estimated cost of 3.8 billion pounds.

On Concorde, Mrs Thatcher said the two leaders had not themselves discussed the plane but the responsible ministers had. "They will be continuing their discussions at a meeting later in London," she said.

President Mitterrand said the French Government had decided to examine the future of the enormously expensive aircraft, but added this was a "ritual examination which goes on year after year." He added: "What we have decided is not to decide anything."

Relations between the two leaders and the ministerial delegates were clearly close and warm--much more so than relations between France and Britain in the past. The change of government in France has clearly heralded what the prime minister and President Mitterrand are anxious should develop into much closer links between them.

Mrs Thatcher described the talks as "excellent" and said: "The atmosphere, as you would expect, has been very friendly and very constructive."

President Mitterrand confirmed this view saying the talks had been "fruitful and precise" and that he looked forward to an "Anglo-French" revival.

Mrs Thatcher said the two leaders had discussed the main community issues and now intended to give a good deal of study to the major outstanding matters between them, particularly the reform of the EEC budget, and the common fisheries policy. There were differences of view between the two she said, but they would be concentrating on drawing up positive proposals on these matters for the next European summit in London in November.

On East-West relations, the prime minister said the two leaders "take a very similar view on these matters and on defence matters. Indeed there is an almost, I would say, identity of view in these spheres."

She said the French president had also been "very keen" that the two countries should cooperate in research and technology. "It is quite clear there will be very close cooperation between French and British ministers in the future," she said.

The leaders were clearly also in tune on the question of Japanese trade with Common Market countries, but further talks are to take place on this, and no decisions on possible community action have yet been reached.

President Mitterrand said the Japanese should not be reproached for seeking to expand their trade, but the European Community should take the initiative. He said this also applied to some imports from the United States. Mr Mitterrand again underlined how close his views on defence are with those of Mrs Thatcher when he said: "Western forces must be able to maintain a strategic and tactical balance."

On foreign aid, the two agreed that the target for help to the poorer countries should be 0.15 percent of the gross national product of the developed countries--a level already achieved by Britain. They will support this line at the special summit on aid to the Third World in Mexico this autumn.

President Mitterrand also looked forward to closer links between the two countries on the European airbus jetliner project, in space, in telecommunications, in engineering and on computers. "There have been a great number of joint initiatives and their scope should be greatly enlarged," he said. "This is in the interests of both countries."

The close relationship which the two leaders enjoy in spite of their political differences, was underlined at the press conference when each refused to be drawn into commenting on political developments in the others country. Mrs Thatcher declined to comment on France's extensive nationalisation programme, while President Mitterrand would not discuss the TUC's decision to back unilateral nuclear disarmament.

Throughout the press conference, President Mitterrand spoke in French, and Mrs Thatcher in English. But the French leader warmly recalled his years of exile in Britain during the war. "My generation has gone through very great events. I myself lived here for a time. I was here during those sad years 1942 to 1944," he said. "I know very well what the hospitality of the British people was like and how kind the people of London were to the exiles. I have a memory of a great people and I am sure they will continue to be great."

WHITELAW REJECTS OPTION OF UNILATERAL DISARMAMENT

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] Britain must not allow itself to be taken in by the "pleasing and plausible facade" of unilateral disarmament, Home Secretary Mr William Whitelaw warned today.

"There is a growing weariness apparent in some circles of our society, born of misguided good intention as frequently as it is of malice or deliberation," he told a conference in Buxton, Derbyshire. "It is a weariness which asks how much longer we must go on spending and training for our national defence against a foe who never comes, and how much longer must we risk a possibly disastrous fight by standing-up for what we believe? It is a weariness which would like to see us opt out of international affairs, trust in the good will of those who now threaten us, and resign from the struggle to maintain for ourselves and for others the precious prize of human freedom. I cannot believe the British people will follow this road," said Mr Whitelaw. "The fatal flaw in the pleasing and plausible facade of unilateral disarmament is that those who threaten us from abroad are not the forebearing and kindly souls that we might wish them to be. The record of the Soviet Union in foreign affairs is one of cynical opportunism backed by brutal force, and is a record to which the peoples of Hungary, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Afghanistan, and many other nations would bear eloquent witness were they free to tell the tale."

Mr Whitelaw asked whether the enormous arsenal the Soviet Union had deployed on the Polish borders was pledged to the cause of peace. "Or is it an engine of blackmail, and in the last resort, of war, designed to further the foreign objectives of those in power in Moscow, if ever those who stand in their way lower their guard?" He warned that it would be selfish and irresponsible if Britain chased the illusion of a "guaranteed" peace in our time at the possible expense of the freedom of those who come after us. Britain must maintain strong defence forces with her allies and then, from that position of strength, be ready to negotiate for genuine multilateral disarmament, Mr Whitelaw said.

AKEL LEADER PAPAIOANNOU ADDRESSES CADRES MEETING

[Speech delivered by AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou at a gathering of party cadres in Nicosia on the evening of 10 September]

[Text] We are going through a period in grave danger of a world thermonuclear holocaust breaking out. This danger arises from the incendiary and warlike policy implemented by the hawks of the U.S. Pentagon headed by President Reagan. It is expressed through the installation of "cruise" and "Pershing" missiles in Europe, production of the neutron bomb, U.S. refusal to ratify the SALT II agreement,violation of Libyan territorial waters and airspace by the U.S. Sixth Fleet and the shooting down of two Libyan aircraft by U.S. fighters. It is expressed by U.S. aid to the bloodthirsty fascist regime in El Salvador to implement genocide of the proud and heroic people of this country. It is expressed through U.S. aid to the fascists of Israel to carry out barbaric bombing raids on Lebanon. It is expressed through U.S. support of the fascist, racist regime of South Africa to raid Namibia and the Peoples Republic of Angola. It is expressed through the concentration of the U.S. Fleet at the mouth of the Persian Gulf and the threats of intervention in Gulf states. It is expressed through U.S. provocations against socialist Cuba. It is expressed through the maneuvers and provocations of the U.S. Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean, particularly very close to Cyprus waters, thousands of miles away from U.S. shores. It is expressed through the U.S. decision to station its RDF in different countries. It is expressed through U.S. financing and encouragement of antirevolutionary elements in the Peoples Republic of Poland. It is expressed through U.S. financing and arming of the counterrevolutionary elements in Afghanistan. It is expressed through the U.S. decision to sell arms to the Chinese leaders who have fully conformed to imperialism. It is expressed through many other acts.

Today, there is no fascist, racist or reactionary regime in the world which is not directly supported by the U.S. Pentagon and by President Reagan. There is no progressive, socialist regime in the world today which does not draw the hostility and the fire of U.S. imperialism.

This very same imperialism even undermines and strikes against the vital interests of its own NATO allies, as was the case with the recent rise in value of the U.S. dollar and many other measures.

What is the future which U.S. imperialism destines for its allies as a result of its exceedingly incendiary and warlike policy? It is their total annihilation as well as the annihilation of the U.S. people in a thermonuclear war. This is the result toward which destruction of the climate of international detente and the armaments race, augmented by the U.S. warlike policy, leads with mathematical exactitude.

The theory of dictating from "a position of strength" is an ancient, outdated imperialist theory which prevailed during the "Boer" war before, World War I and which is absolutely unfounded and extremely dangerous today. Because today imperialism does not dominate the world, because today there is the socialist camp headed by the allmighty Soviet Union which will never allow imperialism to gain military supremacy in order to speak from a position of strength; because today there is an allmighty national liberation movement in the world which fights heroically against imperialism and suppression of nationalism; because today there is a strong labor movement in the imperialist and capitalist countries themselves which also fights against imperialism and for international detente and peace.

The world balance of power is not in favor of imperialism, fascism and war but it is in favor of socialism, national independence, democracy, international detente and peace. It is sufficient that all these forces mobilize themselves in time and with determination in order to block the road to the aspiring arsonists of a thermonuclear holocaust. This worldwide struggle of the peopels against imperialism and for national independence, democracy, detente, peace and socialism was joined a long time ago by the people of Cyprus who are fighting for the abolition of the British and other bases on their territory, for withdrawal of the Turkish occupation and all other foreign troops, for cessation of the manufacture of the neutron bomb, for detente, for control of strategic weapons and total disarmament, for the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, nonaligned character of their foreign policy and the full demilitarization of Cyprus.

Today there is no more direct, urgent, important, humanitarian or more patriotic duty for us and for all the peoples of the earth than the duty for determined struggle for the preservation and expansion of international detente, for implementation of the measures for defusing military confrontation, for gradual and total disarmament, and for the preservation and strengthening of peace in the world. The struggle for independence, democracy, social progress and socialism is interconnected and inseparable from the struggle for life, detente and continual peace. With all the strength of our soul we remain and fight against the manufacture of the inhuman neutron bomb and against all the other mass extermination weapons, against the incendiary, warlike imperialist policy; in favor of the abolition of the British and other bases on Cypriot territory; for the withdrawal of the U.S. Sixth Fleet from the Mediterranean; for the conversion of the Mediterranean into a sea of peace and a bridge of peaceful cooperation between the three continents of Europe, Asia and Africa.

The Cyprus issue has entered a delicate and critical phase. Imperialism, adroitly cultivated, continues to cultivate the impression among certain circles that it is trying hard to solve the problem. It will, nowever, be a great delusion if anyone believes that the moral accomplice of the monstrous crime against Cyprus and its people, none other than imperialism itself, will now appear as the "good Samaritan" in order to help solve the Cyprus issue to the interest of the people of Cyprus. Imperialism wants and tries for only one solution and works on the sidelines for it. This is none other than anti-Cypriot imperialist partition. If imperialism and NATO, the perpetrator of the crime, truly wanted to solve the problem to the interests of Cyprus, they had ample time to do so through withdrawal of the Turkish and NATO occupation troops and through the implementation of the UN resolutions on Cyprus.

They did not do so, however, nor will they do so now because this is dictated by their military-political interests and goals. We can only expect greater hardship from imperialism. Where and when did imperialism solve any problems to the interest of the peoples? It did this nowhere. It is only the peoples themselves, with their struggle, with the support of the anti-imperialist forces of the world, who can solve such problems.

In the case of Cyprus, it is none other than the United States and generally the Western imperialists who are behind the demonstrated intransigence. It is ridiculous to even think that those who are arming Turkey in order to use this country as their own gendarme in the area of the east Mediterranean and the Middle East, will pressure Turkey to solve the Cyprus issue to the interest of the people of Cyprus.

The Cyprus issue, and particularly its domestic aspect, will be solved by us the Cypriots--Greeks and Turks--through intercommunal talks under UN auspices and on the basis of UN resolutions and the summit agreements. We will solve it with the support and solidarity of all our peace-loving friends who are none other than the socialist and nonaligned countries and all the liberal and peace-loving peoples of the world.

We will solve it with the support of the brother people of Greece and the democratic and progressive forces of Turkey.

We will solve the international aspects of the Cyprus issue in an international conference within the framework of the United Nations.

The intercommunal talks at this moment are in a very delicate and critical phase. After months of fruitless efforts for substantive talks we cannot, unfortunately, yet state that we have entered this stage.

AKEL has always supported substantive talks and not talks for the sake of talking as some people maintain. Is it possible to have such substantive talks? It most certainly is, provided both sides submit proposals based on the summit agreements and UN resolutions. It is, however, impossible to have substantive talks while one side talks of federation and basically submits proposals for a confederation.

The Turkish Cypriot side can be absolutely certain that from the moment it submits a solution of the domestic aspect of the Cyprus issue based on a bizonal federation, as provided for under the summit agreements, it will meet with response. Solution of the domestic aspects of our problem is possible within the framework of a bizonal federation. It is not at all difficult for one to define what is a federation and what is a confederation.

We do not know of the existence of any country in the world today with a status of confederation. We do know, however, that there are today at least 15 federal states in the world. All these states have their own constitution. Despite the various differences which may exist in the constitutions of these countries, they do not cease to be federal states, not confederal.

In comparison to countries with a federal regime, Cyprus is a very small country. This fact alone lends even greater support to a solution for true federation and not confederation.

After a delay of 4 years, the Turkish Cypriot leaders on 5 August submitted proposals on the territorial aspect. Their proposals on the constitutional issue were the same as in the past. No matter how these proposals are examined, it will be established that they are not at all satisfactory because they cannot become the basis for a solution to the Cyprus issue. The percentage of territory they propose on the territorial aspect is insignificant while on the constitutional aspect the entire philosophy of the proposal relies on confederation and not on federation.

In its documented memorandum, the Greek Cypriot side, after approval from the National Council, demonstrated with facts that these proposals--apart from the fact that they even deviated from the summit agreements on several points--cannot become the basis for a solution to the Cyprus issue.

The Greek Cypriot side, however, did not slam the door shut to a continuation of the dialogue on the basis of substantial negotiations on the basis of UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

In its effort to contribute toward this end, it even resolved to submit counterproposals, always based on the summit agreements and the UN resolutions.

The genuine interests of both the Greek and the Turkish Cypriots dictate and require that the intercommunal talks should proceed to the substantial stage so that an agreement may be sought on the basis of a bizonal federation.

It must be fully understood by all that there can be a solution to the domestic aspects of the Cyprus issue--for which the intercommunal talks are now being conducted--provided this solution is sought within the framework of a bizonal federation. We do not argue that such a solution will be easy. There are many details which must be discussed and resolved. This is a task which will require patience and perseverence. This is because the solution to be provided must be a viable one. Within the framework of a bizonal federation, there are always margins for negotiation toward a final solution.

However, the sooner the idea of a confederation is abandoned and the sooner proposals are submitted for a federation, the sooner will the intercommunal talks be able to deal with matters of substance and with the details related to the structure and jurisdictions of the various organs of the bizonal federation.

I will not enter into details on structure and jurisdictions because this is an issue to be dealt with by the National Council and the constitutional specialists.

The message, however, which we address to our fellow countrymen, the Turkish Cypriots, is that they should exercise all their influence toward abandonment of the idea of confederation which, in our opinion, is the unbridgeable gap in the difference which separates the two communities and toward submission of proposals based on a bizonal federation. If this is done, then they can be sure that the talks will become substantive and that in the end they will bear fruit.

On our part, we will remain faithful and dedicated to the summit agreements, the UN resolutions and the ideal of a bizonal federation.

The fact that the two communities are separated is an imperialist victory. Imperialism continues to exploit this success in order to promote its own interests and goals. It is time to put an end to this state of affairs which is so harmful to the people of Cyprus. It is time for the Greek and the Turkish Cypriots to solve their differences and to unite against their true common enemy--imperialism. We must, together, tell imperialism that it must cease to interfere in our domestic affairs. It must stop plotting against Cyprus. It must remove its bases and withdraw from Cyprus in the same way that all foreign troops must withdraw.

This is the policy which will serve the interests of the people of Cyprus, Greek and Turkish Cypriots alike. It is a truly anti-imperialist policy. This is the policy which our party firmly supports. This policy can lead to a truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral, federal, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus, a Cyprus where the Greek and Turkish Cypriots will cooperate in harmony and united they will build a peaceful, joyous and happy life for all.

PRIME MINISTER RALLIS CONFIRMS TIES WITH WEST

NC121857 Athens NEWS in English 12 Sep 81 pp 1, 4, 12

[Excerpts] Greek Premier Yeoryios Rallis said Friday that if his ruling New Democracy Party wins the Oct 18 general elections it will continue its close ties with NATO and the European Economic Community. Rallis said that he believed that if Greece withdrew from the EEC the country's economy would suffer dramatically. He challenged Andreas Papandreou, leader of official opposition party, the Panhellenic Socialist Movement, to clarify his stand, especially regarding the EEC. "He has given four different versions of what he believes Greece's relationship with the Community should be," Rallis told journalists at a luncheon meeting.

He accused Mr Papandreou of constantly shifting his position, and criticized him for saying he would ask President Konstandinos Karamanlis to hold a referendum. "Mr Papandreou should not hide behind the constitutional prerogatives of the president. He should clearly state where his party stands on the matter," Mr Rallis said. Rallis said, "I intend to submit the resignation of my government on Monday or Tuesday, form a caretaker cabinet and dissolve Parliament on Saturday Sep 19."

At least nine parties will be competing for 300 seats in the single chamber house, while another 24 deputies will be elected on a separate ballot to represent Greece in the European Parliament in Strasbourg. Over 6.8 million voters will take part in compulsory balloting at 18,500 polling stations in elections that will cost the state more than 20 million drachma to organize. Rallis said that if his New Democracy Party failed to win re-election and if no other party won a working majority, he would be ready to cooperate with parties that agreed with New Democracy's main lines of foreign policy. "We would form a coalition with the party that accepts our connection with the EEC and our participation in NATO. Withdrawal from NATO would upset international equilibrium and could disturb international peace," Rallis said.

Rallis also denied a Washington POST report earlier this month that the Greek Government asked the OECD not to publish a report on the Greek economy, because it would hurt his party's electoral chances. "It was the OECD's decision to survey the Greek economy at the end of 1981 and to publish its report in February 1982," Rallis said, quoting the government's correspondence with the OECD.

Rallis said Greece seeks good relations with Western allies, with its Balkan neighbors and with the Arab countries. The country would continue to seek a solution through a dialogue with neighboring Turkey to their longstanding differences, but in the event this failed, Rallis said, would resort to international arbitration.

Rallis said he is convinced the conservative New Democracy Party will win the elections. The elections will be held under the proportional representation system. A party taking at least 40 per cent of the votes cast can win an absolute majority of the 300-seat single chamber Parliament.

Rallis said he did not expect a military coup if PASOK won power. Referring to the 1967 coup which opened seven years of right-wing military dictatorship, Mr Rallis said: "I believe the armed forces are now loyal to the oath they have taken to the nation and the state."

AMBASSADOR MEETS AL-QADHDHAFI ON U.S. BASES ISSUE

NC101827 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 10 Sep 81

[Text] The Foreign Ministry has announced that the Greek Ambassador in Tripoli has met with Libyan President Colonel al-Qadhdhafi, who offered an explanation on his recent statement, which in addition to other things also concerned our country. Al-Qadhdhafi stressed his government's friendly regard for Greece. The Greek ambassador seized the opportunity to reiterate that the U.S. military facilities in Greece fall within the more general framework of our country's defense policy and alliances and that they in no way hamper the exercise of Greece's well-known pro-Arab policy.

PAPANDREOU GIVES 5 SEP CAMPAIGN SPEECH IN PATRAI

NC101240 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 6 Sep 81 p 8

[Speech by PASOK Chairman Andres Papandreou at Patrai 5 September]

[Text] People of Patrai, People of Akhaia, it is natural for me to start the last and victorious phase of the struggle for authority from my private fatherland. I am joined to you both by my family and my political background. I cannot forget that it is here that in 1964 I started the long and difficult course which today brings us to the threshold of authority. This is the course which on 18 October will bring PASOK to the government on its own strength and the almighty people to authority. It is truly difficult for me to express my emotion for this unprecedented--both in numbers and in feeling--gathering. Tonight Akhaia sends a message to every corner of our fatherland, that in the coming election the people will win, that democracy will win, that with PASOK in the vanguard the foundations will be laid for the course toward the great change.

The following will declare their presence in this vital confrontation between the forces of change and the forces of conservation and reaction, this vast meeting of the people with history: The fighters of the national resistance movement; those who joined the two implacable struggles under the great son of Akhaia, Yeoryios Papandreou; and the heroic fighters of the polytechnic generation.

We declare our presence in order to build a new Greece, a proud and independent fatherland, a society without anxiety, oppression and exploitation, a society with man at its core. This is why we emphasize that there can be no attainment of democracy without the peoples' participation, that there can be no socialism without respect of human values.

The rightwing in our country--always representing the interests of the establishment and the economic oligarchy--has trampled on human values and it did not hesitate to abolish even the democratic institutions whenever it became obvious that its monopoly over authority was in jeopardy. This is the reason why the primary and dominant goal of our people in the coming election is to crush the rightwing and to relegate it to the margins of history.

For PASOK the struggle of the progressive and democratic forces, the struggle for the great change has a single front--it is only aimed against the rightwing. As we have stressed, PASOK does not ignore or overlook the role of the other democratic parties which take part in the struggle for the great change. However, we once again underline that the lot of fate fell to PASOK to lead the peoples' movement to victory and to change.

The rightwing has a sinful past and no future. This is how its history is remembered by the people who have experienced the effect on the era and the achievements of the rightwing upon their own fate. The people remember very well the wounds inflicted upon democracy by the rightwing.

Our people well remember the wounds inflicted by the rightwing upon democracy; the violence and corruption of Dhovas [caretaker government] the 1965 royalist coup, the foreign motivated April dictatorship, the division of citizens into nationally-minded citizens and non-nationally-minded citizens, and the undermining of the inalienable rights of the citizen.

Our people are well aware of the consequences of the policy of dependence and servility perpetually followed by the rightwing leaders. The tragedy of Cyprus is a historic responsibility of the rightwing. The various "arrangements" on the Aegean airspace--all to the benefit of the Turkish Armed Forces--are historic responsibility of the rightwing. Return to NATO's military wing, under the framework of an agreement which jeopardizes the operational responsibility of our air force over Aegean airspace, is the historic responsibility of the rightwing.

On a day-to-day basis our people have to live through the consequences of the economic crisis into which we were led by the antipeople, contradictory, spasmodic and unplanned "policy" of the rightwing. We have inflation, double the average inflation of EC countries, a deficit in the balance of foreign payments which is increasing year by year, we have full stagnation of productive investments, both private and public, we have a shrinkage of the true income of the workers in the city and the village, in the factory, the office and in the field. We have an impressive increase in the unequal division of the national income within the framework of the policy of one-sided austerity. We have a recent and considerable increase in unemployment--particularly among the youth and women. We have impressive inefficiency and irresponsibility among leading members of New Democracy in the handling of economic problems, an inefficiency and irresponsibility which has led the country to the threshold of bankruptcy.

On a daily basis, our people have to live under the consequences of a vast bureaucracy, of mad centralization, of the identification of the state to the party, of handouts, of favoritism, of "corruption" as it was described by the deputy minister to the president.

The most immediate and serious problem in the country's progress concerns the Greek economy. There are hard problems for which the New Democracy leaders will have to answer:

1. Who is responsible for the galloping inflation which, for the third consecutive year, amounts to 25 percent?
2. Who is responsible for the rapid and dangerous devaluation of the drachma which not only feeds inflation but also reduces our true national income?
3. Who has created the huge deficit--300 billion drachma in 1981--in the public sector.
4. Who is responsible for handling the foreign exchange reserves which resulted in a loss of more than $350 million?
5. Who is responsible for the policy of incentives and credits that threaten the small and medium businessmen with annihilation and which led large enterprises to bankruptcy?
6. How is it that nearly the only prospering enterprises in our country are the multinational corporations? Who is responsible for ceding privileges to foreign firms at the expense of the Greek?
7. Finally, who is responsible for the de-Hellenization of our industry?
8. How were the scandalous handouts and beneficial concessions allocated and what has become of them? Why are industrialists prospering while industries go bankrupt?

There definitely will be no answer from the New Democracy. It is the sovereign people who will give an answer on 18 October.

Naturally, the rightwing is bothered when we talk of its sinful past. New Democracy rests its hopes in forgetfulness. The Greek people, however, remember. They remember the scandal of the public electricity authority's conveyor belts which cost the Greek state one billion drachma.

They remember the scandal of the exploitation of the oil crisis--under which the right-wing pocketed half a billion drachma in one single day--they remember the Mornos [water supply project] scandal.

The scandal, however, which is of the first magnitude--the scandal to which I referred during my speech at Patrai in 1977--is the scandal of tax evasion. At that time I reported that this amounted to 100 billion drachma but this figure was wrong. Today, tax evasion reaches the amount of 150 billion drachma because it is very true that in our country it is only the workers who pay taxes.

In the coming election, New Democracy will understand the meaning of national peoples' unity. It means that the working people, the unprivileged Greeks--the workers, the farmers, the wage earners, the artesans, the professional workers, the small and medium businessmen, the new generation, women--were set free from the political machinery of the rightwing, that they are now manning the ranks of the struggle for the great change, for national, social, cultural and economic liberation.

The unprivileged people firmly forged unity for their survival, yesterday, for the election battle, now; and for the battle for change, tomorrow. The peasants, the most unfairly treated class in our country, have come to know at close quarters what the abandonment of the countryside means, the cruel exploitation of the middlemen. Now they are all well aware of the meaning of the EEC paradise.

The paradise with the burial trenches for their produce and with prices which do not even meet the cost of production. Together with all the people and full of surprise they also know today of the unacceptable preferential treatment given to Turkish agricultural production--at the expense of our own--after our full accession to the EC.

We again inform the government that our country's proud peasants claim their inalienable rights and that they cannot be bought out with checks of the type of "dowery endowments for indigent girls."

The workers, the employees, the salaried people did not have a better fate. They saw their real income being reduced within the framework of the policy of unilateral frugality and high-handedness. They shouldered the taxation burdens. They have come to know dismissals and persecutions. Now they are experiencing escalating unemployment.

The pensioners saw their pension being reduced to nothing by the passing galloping inflation. The state did not display any concern, care or affection for them.

The small- and medium-sized businessmen--the backbone of our economy--having been cut off from any credits and from the national reserves, are being threatened by annihilation and bankruptcy.

The scientists see their role being degraded every day. In their very work they are disregarded, they are pushed aside and they are replaced by a foreign technostructure.

The youths--boys and girls--tomorrow's hope and future of our country, are struggling to overcome the obstacles in the way of their education, the cultural and social deadlocks. For the young people, the finding of employment is a privilege.

The universities are degraded. Here at Patrai, the university could claim first position as a center in southern Europe and the Mediterranean. This is how we envisaged it many years ago when we started it.

The Greek women who are subjected to double oppression and acute exploitation are participating in today's struggle. Day after day, they become conscious of their problem and they are tracing the causes and are pinpointing those responsible.

Every Greek has felt the effects of the rightwing's policy on his own life. He lives in undernourished villages and in inhuman cities. The economic and social development offered by the rightwing has already been unmasked. Austerity for the many and luxury for the few, destruction of the environment have become its symbols. Our seas, our rivers and our atmosphere are being polluted. Here in Akhaia, the Gulf of Kornthos and the Gulf of Patrai are being threatened by irresponsibility, a total lack of planning and profiteering.

All the unprivileged Greeks, every patriot who believes in a proud foreign policy, in an independent and safe Greece, who believes in the really huge development possibilities of the country are forging day after day the national people's unity in order to shelve the rightwing in the archives of history, to give PASOK a smashing victory, to wage the battle of change after victory.

We will be victorious in the 18 October elections. We will be victorious to lay the foundations for change which constitutes today a prerequisite for the survival of the nation. Of course, we are not magicians. We are not going to solve chronic problems in a single day. But all the more we are not going to cross over to socialism overnight.

Yet, we are certain about success, because we depend on the inexhaustible powers of the people; because we depend on the battleworthiness of our organization and on the responsible political personalities who will represent us in the Chamber.

And being the Government of Greece, we would enjoy the unlimited support of Europe, which, with Mitterrand's smashing double victory, has also entered the final stretch for socialist change. Just as we would indisputably enjoy the active support of the Arab nation for the struggle to which we have also contributed within the measure of our powers. The genuine multidimensional foreign policy shaped by PASOK during its 7-year history, has made PASOK important enough in the Mediterranean, the Balkans, and both Western and Eastern Eruope. Today, PASOK identifies itself on a worldwide scale with the struggle for national independence, democracy, social liberation and peace.

Within the framework of PASOK's government strategy, provision is made for a package of immediate measures to stop the decline of the economy, to check inflation, to revive the economy, to stabilize the balance of payments deficit, and to put an end to the detrimental devaluation of the drachma. These immediate measures would simultaneously include the strengthening of the purchasing power of the people's classes and the activation of productive investments in the private and the public fields.

The purge of public enterprises will have immediate priority--at long last they must become productive, they must cease to operate with a deficit which only feed today's galloping inflation. Naturally, there is also urgency in purging the large overindebted enterprises which today are unable to meet their obligations toward the banking system.

With the modernization of the banking system and the implementation of a new development policy, we will be able to liberate and mobilize the vast potential of private initiative--and particularly of the small and medium businessmen, the artesans and the professionals.

As a medium-range project, we will encourage the vertical development of industry and the development of the most modern branches with a high technology level--which neither need large amounts of capital or energy and which are of vital importance to our country's war industry.

Perhaps, however, the most vital sector for PASOK consists of the agrarian economy. This is the revitalization of the Greek countryside with programmed decentralization of economic activity and the development of voluntary agricultural-industrial cooperativism which is a vital goal in PASOK's development strategy.

Our country's underdevelopment--an achievement of the rightwing which administered the country for decades--is self-evident in education, social welfare and medical care.

The anarchronistic education system, the starvation pensions for the farmer as well as for the vast majority of the workers, the primitative and provocatively unequal medical care, put the seal on the antipeoples policy which has been pursued by the governments of the rightwing.

It is, consequently, a primary duty for a socialist movement, for PASOK, to proceed as fast as possible to a radical reorganization of social and educational policy. There must be modern and free education of equal quality for all Greek children. There must be free medical, pharmaceutical and hospital care for all Greeks. There must be pensions which guarantee a dignified life for all the veterans of the production process.

Faced with the spectrum of a forthcoming defeat, the leadership of the New Democracy proceeded with a contracted marriage with the junta-royalist rightwing. Naturally, there was no official marriage ceremony. What does exist, however, is an illicit relationship and a dowry. We ask New Democracy how many and which junta politicians from the nationalist front will it include in its slates? We also inform it that there are no lifesaving devices for the party wreck. It will sink under the social avalanche and the peoples' flood of 18 October.

By using dangermongering, New Democracy attempts to distort history and twist true facts around. This is where it has been led by desperation and panic. Democracy is in no danger. It is New Democracy which is in danger. It is not private initiative that is in danger. It is the local and foreign oligarchy which runs the risk of losing its privileges--the oligarchy which directs the policy of the rightwing and preys on the toil and sweat of the Greek people.

The "scorched earth" policy is a twin sister of dangermongering. Every day and every night television shows the prime minister and ministers laying foundation stones, inaugurating projects and distributing money orders. These unplanned grants, at a time when New Democracy is breathing its last, are a provocation directed against the Greek people. This is a provocation because this is nothing but an open attempt to buy votes. Our mature people will give their answer to this irresponsible and ridiculous [illegible]. They will give their answer in a crushing way on 18 October.

From Atrai, tonight, I address myself to all the unprivileged Greeks who toil, produce and create. To all those who wonder and are concerned about their own present and their children's future, to all those who reject immobility, vague promises, the rot and wear and tear of the rightwing. To all those who are fed up with the miserly reality of the rightwing. To all these, PASOK promises that with its victory on 18 October they will enter into the orbit of hope for a certain, democratic, free, peaceful and socialist future.

Tonight's gathering is unrepeatable. Both its numbers and feelings predetermine victory. It sends the message of a triumph of the people from Thraki to Lakonia and to Rodhos, and at this very moment from Patrai the flood of change gains gigantic stature. Nobody can stop it in the same way that no power can stop the advent of spring and of truth.

PASOK authentically and firmly represents: The hopes of a generation which desired and could but which was unable; the faith of a generation which learned and matured; the dream of a generation which is coming and which has demands.

These three generations which are an unavoidable Greek reality support PASOK with mature experience, knowledge, strength, revitilizing drive and enthusiasms.

The slogan "People- PASOK to authority" is not a party concoction but a peoples' mandate. Under today's conditions, consent to change cannot be avoided or postponed. This consent cannot be and must not succumb to futile expediencies.

It is for this reason that we call upon all democrats, the progressives and the patriots to join their voice--without party predilections--as well as their strength to that of PASOK. We call upon the unprivileged Greek, the worker, the farmer, the wage earner, the artesan, the professional, the women and the new generation to proclaim, here and now, the marriage of faith with hope, of desire with realization, the identification of "I want" with "I can" and struggle with victory. The time has arrived when the democratic Greek people, using their vote on 18 October, will put an end to the monocracy of the rightwing and will open wide the avenue which leads to the great change.

KKE-EXTERIOR'S FLORAKIS INTERVIEW ON GOALS

Part Two

NC081750 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 8 Sep 81 p 7

[Part two of interview with KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis by Stratis Zakhariadhis at the KKE Central Committee offices in Athens, date not given]

[Excerpts] Question Nine: One of the major problems after the change in regime was to build fraternity between the people and the army. Do you believe that this has been achieved, and to what extent it has been achieved? But if not, how do you think that this could be achieved?

Answer: What does it mean building fraternity between the people and the army has been carried out? On what basis, because, naturally, this question is not a sentimental one. The soldiers, the noncommissioned officers, the officers, they are children of the people. The problem for the people is that the armed forces should be solely and exclusively engaged in their mission, that is the defense of our national independence and territorial integrity and the respect for the people's will. Thus, their military ability would improve and the people's confidence in them would increase. That is, it should be ensured that they respect the people's will and an end should be put to all kinds of deviations which have brought about in the past--the well-known tragedies. And the mere fact that it is frequently said the armed forces would accept one or the other measures shows that a problem continues to exist.

We are categorically opposed to any kind of novelties in the armed forces or to coaxing or to statements that directly or indirectly recognize the armed forces as the center of power or as an institution which is beyond the people's sovereignty or the control of the responsible government.

Of course, we are not in the 1967 period now. A large segment of the officers are conscious of where the country was led by the junta and by the role of the Americans. But we forget that during all this time the rightwing continued to keep the armed forces as an "air-tight" compartment.

We believe that the democratization of the armed forces should be promoted; this, of course, does not mean that there should be a purge of individuals because of their political affiliations. It does not escape our attention that a number of honest officers have been trapped by the junta.

Thus, the basic point is not the individuals but the securing of substantive control by the Parliament and the government within the armed forces and the abolition of the "air-tight" compartments and of any circuits of anomaly. Moreover, U.S. and NATO control over the armed forces must stop. A substantive contribution to their democratization would be the improvement of their living and working conditions, of the position and the training of officers and noncommissioned officers, and in general the restoration of all of their democratic rights as well as of the rights of the recruited children of the people.

Question 10: Would it be possible for your goal of leaving NATO--if it is not coordinated with the abolition of the two blocs which you also favor--to be achieved without consequences for our national defense in view of the existence of the Greek-Turkish dispute?

Answer: Of course we favor the abolition of blocs, but I sincerely tell you that I do not understand how there can be talk about our country's exit from NATO in coordination with the abolition of the two blocs. When the two blocs are abolished there would be no question of exit simply because there would be no NATO. Such a connection, that of our country's exit and the abolition of the two blocs, does not say anything more than the fact that Greece will continue to be subjected to the U.S.-NATOite bloc until its dissolution. But our exit from NATO is a fundamental measure for our national independence, for the democratization of our country and for the possibility for a democratic government to follow a really peaceful foreign policy and to serve our national interests and to defend the Cyprus cause. And these questions should not be subjected to any expediency.

Definitely, there would be some problems of armament as well as other difficulties which will be created by the U.S.-NATOite imperialists who want us to be as we are. These difficulties are not insurmountable and, in any case, we cannot relinquish--for their sake--our sovereign rights or our national independence.

It is totally contradictory to say "we stay within NATO and therefore we accept the abolition of our national independence to secure armament to.... defend our national independence." But beyond this, would you condone the abolition of our national independence at any cost? On the other hand, did the question of armament not exist during the years when Greece was outside the NATO military wing? How was it solved at that time?

The negative effects to our national defense will continue as long as we are in NATO. The largest part and the elite of our armed forces are under NATO control. Moreover, with their NATOite control and their bases, the Americans are spying on us and they can paralyze our defense system just as happened with our aircraft in 1974 when, instead of going to Cyprus, they went to Beirut. According to the NATOite plans, the armed forces are oriented to basically confront the so-called "danger from the north."

The Americans cannot permanently blackmail us with the supply of arms, and it is not solely the Americans who possess modern arms. A democratic government can and must find from other sources the arms that we need, just as a number of other countries which are outside NATO, outside any bloc, have been securing such arms and have modern and militant armed forces.

Question 11: Your rivals maintain that you are the most doctrinaire communist party in all of Western Europe...

Answer: The ruling class and the various ideologists who move around it consider us doctrinaire because we have never compromised with the oligarchy and with Americanocracy; because we are firm with our revolutionary principles and the militant-heroic heritage of the popular movement; because we do not ask for certificates of "patriotism," or "democratic beliefs" or of "renewal" from oligarchy in exchange for concessions to it.

Question 12: However, a problem arises in connection with these things on doctrine: Can you recall to us instances when you supported views contrary to those of the CPSU?

Answer: When our adversaries have nothing else to say, they think they can drive us to the wall with such claims.... I will ask you something. If the CPSU expressed a position contrary to the KKE policy, what would you say? Unacceptable intervention and so forth. If, however the KKE, without any reason, were to condemn CPSU policy, would you immediately consider this to be a sample of our independence?

Naturally, it would be agreeable to imperialism if communist parties acted so irresponsibly, but this would injure international solidarity and would be to the detriment of the cause of peace and socialism.

We place our relations with CPSU and all other communist parties on the basis of the principles of international solidarity, equality, and nonintervention in the internal affairs of others. Every party decides its own policy, and, naturally, we refuse to appoint as "lawyers" in our possible differences the representatives of oligarchy and imperialism. We express our criticism and we discuss responsibly our disagreements in our bilateral or collective meetings. Naturally, in cases when such disagreements are fundamental, when the positions of one communist party impinge on the substance of our own policy or essentially harm the interests of the international movement, then our criticism and differentiation acquires an open character.

Do you know of any instances when the CPSU criticized our policy or took a position contrary to our national interests? Should we disagree with the Soviet Union's proposal that it will guarantee that our country will not receive a nuclear blow provided it removes the nuclear arms on its soil? Should we disagree with the proposal for the declaration of the Balkans as a denuclearized zone, the withdrawal of foreign fleets, foreign bases and nuclear weapons from the Mediterranean?

Is there a man of good faith who loves peace and who disagrees with the set of proposals for the relaxation of international tension expressed in the 26th CPSU Congress? Tell us, after all, with which position of the CPSU do you want us to disagree? The Afghanistan issue? We believe that the Soviet Union should have given the help the Afghan Government asked for in order to deal with foreign attacks and interventions. We also consider correct Cuba's decision to help Angola militarily, provided the military attack by the racist regime of South Africa continues. Therefore, should we disagree with the CPSU to make ourselves agreeable to the oligarchy? No, this does not agree with our character and our militant history.

I seize the opportunity of this discussion to stress again that every democrat, every patriot, regardless of whether or not he is a socialist, whether or not he knows the internal Soviet reality or agrees with it, should know that anti-Sovietism is a weapon against progress and peace, against the struggle itself for our national independence. Anti-Soviet declarations have always been the smokescreen for the justification of Americanocracy and the cold war policy, and, consequently, no progressive man should yield to them. The interest itself of an independent, democratic Greece is incompatible with anti-Sovietism, because the socialist countries and especially the Soviet Union have provided selfless international support so that we might deal with U.S. extortions and promote our national problems and the Cyprus problem on an international scale.

The hypocrisy of our accusers concerning our relations with the Soviet Union is obvious from another thing. Frequently the leaders of capitalist countries and naturally the factors of European socio-democracy interfere in our internal affairs and suggest we join NATO, the EEC and so forth, but our accusers keep silent. Their "national" sensitivity is limited to the Soviet Union.

Question 13: I come back to the critical issue which occupies many leftist voters who are interested in a change. Why should they vote for the KKE and not for PASOK?

Answer: We do not make such a comparison. It is another thing if this is being done objectively from a different viewpoint.

We explain to the people why KKE should be defended and strengthened decisively. This is necessary not only because by sharing in the second distribution [of votes] the KKE will make more certain and greater the defeat of the right, but also because KKE has such attributes that make its role in the promotion of change irreplaceable.

For this reason we are sure that a large segment of the Greek people, the working people, young men and women, will give their votes to the KKE in the conviction that thus they will be contributing more decisively and making certain the country's course to change.

GENERAL EVREN GIVES SPEECH ON TAKE OVER ANNIVERSARY

[Excerpts] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that with the 12 September 1980 action, the Turkish Armed Forces, which are an integral part of the people, have saved the country and the republic from the abyss into which it was pushed by the joint efforts of internal and external enemies, thus accomplishing its historic task inspired by the support of the people.

In a statement on the occasion of the first anniversary of the 12 September action, Evren said that his aim was not to celebrate the incident, but to refresh memories and to briefly review the activities of a year.

[Begin Evren recording] During the 60's and 70's, Turkey was transformed into an arena in which ideological destructive and divisive struggles were being waged, and during the period prior to 12 September, our country was brought to the brink of civil war. In addition to certain factors that contributed to the fact that anarchy and terrorism reached such dimensions in our country, external factors also played a great role.

Turkey has remained loyal to the Ataturk principles of freedom, secularism, democracy and peace at home and peace in the world and adopted the foreign policy of conducting friendly relations with all countries. However, Turkey has not always received the same sincere behavior from certain other countries and it has been seen through evidence that these countries have even assisted in the spreading of terrorism in Turkey.

Furthermore, it has also been observed that certain countries have aided in the development of Turkish terrorism by hiding behind friendship, economic or cultural agreements. In time, and particularly after 12 September, it has been understood that the terrorism in Turkey, which is known to receive assistance and support from the outside, turned into a part of international terrorism. Both the trials during the years between 1971 and 1973 and the investigations and trials in the aftermath of 12 September have revealed through documents that terrorism is receiving significant aid and support fromf oreign countries. [end recording]

Evren pointed out that there are 30 different types of publications published in foreign countries by terrorist organizations--some of which are also brought into Turkey--and that 22 radio stations with bases in other countries are broadcasting in a bid to condition and direct Turkish terrorists against the country. He noted that some 1 million statements and 15,000 newspapers are being printed and distributed weekly from some 60 centers.

Evren said: Traitors who are sufficiently provoked to cooperate with external Armenian terrorist organizations are being trained together with them in the same camps and are able at times to undertake actions in Turkey under their leadership. While those who undergo political and ideological training in foreign countres--especially persons with higher education--are planning the organization of the control system inside Turkey, they are also directing the organizational activities of the terrorist organizations and determining their tactics and strategies.

Pointing out that the encouragement and incitement of anarchy and terrorism in Turkey was started among the Turks in foreign countries and that the extensions of internal terrorist centers in foreign countries have intensified their action in these countries, General Evren said that their aims consist of drawing the country away from the pacts it belongs to and applying pressure on the country through destructive organizations--the so-called democratic mass organizations. Evren said these persons and establishments are waging intense propaganda against Turkey and the new administration by inciting the restrictions, detentions and the actions of the security forces in the country.

The head of state noted that these persons are thus aiming to render ineffective the security forces, who are waging a successful struggle, and to discredit the administration in world public opinion. Evren said: The number of persons detained, which is being exaggerated by these persons and expressed in hundreds of thousands, currently stands at 3,731. The number of persons under formal arrest is 24,300 and those imprisoned total 1,898. By stating that these remnants of armed highwaymen, who committed series of murders mercilessly in our country, exasperated our people through armed robberies, armed attacks and other incidents and aimed to destroy the state by dividing the country, have also started to commit acts of international terrorism in the countries that welcomed them--as in the case of the attempt on the pope--, I would like to voice the truth.

Noting that the countries that support and assist the anarchy and terrorism in Turkey can be classified into two groups, Evren said that the first group includes countries that entertain historical and ideological ambitions and interests concerning Turkey and therefore aim to divide the country in order to attain these ambitions. Pointing out that the countries in the second group consist of certain friendly and allied countries, Evren said that these countries turned a blind eye to the anti-Turkey activities of terrorists who acted in Turkey by sheltering them, and that they found it difficult to state that they are unable to diagnose international terrorism. Evren said: We hope and wish that our European friends see the true face of these harmful and antihuman persons and organizations and take the necessary measures to protect humankind as well as their own social orders.

Head of State General Evren noted that the terrorists in Turkey used two types of strategies, inspiring terror and fear and infiltrating organizations. He said that the first strategy aims to create an atmosphere of revolution through terror and fear and envisages speedy people's revolution in accordance with their behavior. Evren said that those who adopt the second path aim to infiltrate political and social organizations and seize them. He cited as examples organizations like the Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER], the Idealist Club Union [Ulku Bir], the Police Association [POL-DER], the Police Union [POL BIR], the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and the Confederation of Nationalist Labor Unions [MISK].

Evren said: Both the extreme left and the extreme right have adopted these strategies to different extends and have implemented them. He said that a majority of these organizations are now accounting for their deeds before the independent judiciary organs of the state, and that the fact that these organizations are being tried impartially under the guarantee of the judiciary is proof of the great virtues of the deeprooted traditions of the people and the state and their faith in justice and democracy.

General Evren said that prior to the 12 September operation, there were 40 communist and terrorist organizations, 10 seccessionist organizations and 12 extreme rightist terrorist organizations. He said that leftist terrorist organizations formed armed attack gains and that the rightist terrorist organizations attempted to prove that these leftist forces were ineffective under the guise of acting together with state forces and aiding them and thus become one of the sides and aspects of terrorism. Evren noted: Fanaticism was becoming increasingly bold, gun shots were becoming mingled with calls for jihad and the efforts to establish an antiquated system by exploiting the pure religious beliefs of our people had clearly emerged.

[Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish at 1200 gives another report on General Evren's anniversary remarks which includes the following passage: "The statement says that the Constituent Assembly will convene on 23 October for its first session and will do its best to fulfill the pending tasks."]

Head of State Gen Kenan Evren explained his views on foreign policy as follows: [Begin recording] Care has been taken to protect our national interests through peaceful means and in the best manner without altering the essence of our national foreign policy founded by Ataturk. Care has also been taken to implement a foreign policy beneficial to international and regional peace, stability and cooperation as well as to our own national security and economic interests.

The fact that Turkey has come from the brink of civil war to a stage where it is able to solve its problems in tranquillity and security with a reinforced national will and ambition has caused it to be viewed again as an element of stability in international public opinion. Moreover, the fact that we accorded continuity, clarity and consistency to our policy by isolating our foreign policy from internal bickerings, indecisions and prejudices has helped in increasing Turkey's prestige in foreign countries.

While stressing the importance we attach to solidarity within the NATO community, following the 12 September operation, we also continued the efforts to become a full partner in the EEC. We also attached special value to the maintenance of our relations with Western parliamentary organizations and continue our cooperation as a result of our faith and loyalty to the parliamentary democratic system based on majority.

The recent developments in our region have once again demonstrated Turkey's importance and value for the security and stability of the region. For this reason, we have to be strong from all aspects both in the region and within the alliance. We must not be left alone in our efforts to meet the defense needs of our armed forces and undertake our efforts to meet the defense needs of our armed forces and undertake our economic development. We believe that our friends and allies as well as the countries in the region will view this position of Turkey with understanding.

Since 12 September, the developments of our relations with the Middle Eastern and Islamic countries has gained a special political and economic content. We are engaged in efforts to raise our relations with these countries to the highest level by strengthening our hist ical, cultural and moral ties and conducting a fruitful cooperation in every field serving mutual interests. We are observing the positive results of the various contacts that we accelerated both on the bilateral level and the multilateral level within the framework of the Islamic conference. We believe that the elimination of the existing differences among Islamic countries and the development of the harmony and cooperation among them is the common interest of all Islamic countries. Turkey, which takes care not to side in the conflicts between friendly and fraternal Islamic countries, has continued this approach meticulously over the past year.

Our country, which has reduced its relations with Israel to a limited level, is convinced that stability in the region cannot be secured unless a comprehensive and just solution is found to the Middle East problem. This is why it believes that unilateral actions which threaten peace should be avoided and sincerely wishes that the problem be peacefully solved as soon as possible.

Since 12 September, our relations with socialist countries have been conducted in an organized manner within the framework of the principles of independence, sovereignty, respect for territorial integrity, noninterference in internal affairs and equality of rights. Turkey attaches special importance to the development of its relations with socialist countries based on goodneighborliness and cooperation.

As for Turkey's existing problems with neighboring Greece and the Cyprus issue, our approach to these issues depend on the principle of resolving the disagreements in peaceful ways. This is why we believe that the relevant countries must act with a sense of full responsibility. With this approach, we welcomed Greece's return to the NATO military wing. We are continuing to fulfill our duty in developing our cooperation by eliminating the lack of trust between the two countries and resolving the existing problems with the same sense of responsibility.

Turkey wishes that a lasting solution to the Cyprus problem be attained through the intercommunal talks and has welcomed the fact that a new phase has been reached in these developments. Through its proposals submitted at the beginning of August, the Turkish Cypriot community has made a very constructive contribution to the solution of the problem. We wish that the opposite side will also reciprocate in the same constructive mentality. [end recording]

[Georg Possaner report on interview with Danish Defense Minister Poul Sogaard in Vienna--date not given]

[Text] Vienna--Soviet state and party chief Brezhnev's proposal to turn north Europe into a nuclear-free zone is "of interest" not only for this region but "for all of Europe." This was stated in a talk with DIE PRESSE by Danish Defense Minister Poul Sogaard who concluded an official visit to Austria last weekend. On this occasion, the Social Democratic politician expressed objections to the neutron weapon.

Asked specifically whether he is of the opinion that it increases deterrence or lowers the nuclear threshold, Sogaard emphatically declared: "It lowers it." The Danish defense minister, who underscored his country's interest in a reduction of the nuclear weapons arsenals in East and West, stressed that his Social Democratic Party endeavors to ensure that Denmark continues to be free of nuclear weapons.

Asked about the increase, in real terms, of defense expenditures agreed at the 1979 NATO summit meeting in Washington, Sogaard declared that Denmark always has maintained, even within the alliance, that 3 percent is too much. Since others also failed to reach this goal, Copenhagen decided on a 2 percent increase. Keeping the overall volume of NATO expenditures at the present level "is enough to guarantee a good defense in Europe," Sogaard declared in contrast to the view of the new U.S. administration.

Asked why, he said the threat to Europe worries the United States more than the Europeans. Questioned on whether Washington's position is realistic or hysterical, the defense minister replied: "I believe one can say that the new American administration still needs to become acquainted with Europe."

In connection with the Soviet maneuvers on the Polish border, Sogaard shares the view of Western experts that they were prepared well in advance because of their scale and that they are not connected with political developments in Poland.

Answering a final question about his impressions in Austria, Sogaard expressed interest in the new automatic rifle made in Austria, the conscription system and the national defense concept which, he said, with some modifications could serve as an example for Denmark.

REPORTAGE ON HAIG VISIT, BERLIN DEMONSTRATION

Schmidt-Haig Talks

LD141234 Hamburg DPA in German 1123 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 14 Sep (DPA)--One of the most important results of the talks between Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig on Sunday evening is the possibility of abandoning counterarming at the coming arms control negotiations between Washington and Moscow. A government spokesman announced today in Bonn that there is clarity on both sides on this so-called zero option "occupying a firm place in the negotiating concept" with corresponding reduction of the Soviet SS-20 missiles.

During the exchange of views lasting several hours in the chancellor's summer residence, both sides said they are confident that the arms control negotiations between the two superpowers will begin the end of November. According to this information, the private talks, also attended by Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, concentrated on the strategic world situation. There continues to be clarity on the new American intercontinental MX missile being developed into a pillar of land-based deterrence. In the United States, the debate continues as to the final stationing of the MX which originally was to be installed in the western United States in a costly system of interconnecting bunkers along the lines of a shunting station.

Other topics discussed included information from the U.S. secretary of state on his talks in Spain with Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Fahd and on the Washington visit of Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin. Schmidt thanked the U.S. secretary of state particularly cordially for his affirmation of the American protective guarantees in Berlin. The federal chancellor asked Haig to convey again to U.S. President Ronald Reagan an invitation to visit Bonn.

Police on Rioting

[Excerpts] Berlin, 14 Sep (DPA)--Union, SPD and FDP politicians today unanimously thanked U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig for his previous day's visit to Berlin and the renewed U.S. guarantee for the city. They also condemned the serious rioting which followed the peaceful demonstration against the American arms policy.

The police stated that during the violence by radical groups, which again culminated in looting and destruction, 151 officers were injured, 15 of them seriously. On their side the demonstrators gave a figure of about 100 injured (10 of them seriously). Seventeen persons, aged between 15 and 26, out of 40 detained on suspicion of having committed criminal offenses have been brought before the examining magistrate. (Attention: There is as yet no decision on the issues of arrest warrants). They are accused of a serious breach of the public peace, throwing stones at policemen and vehicles as well as armed attacks. The police state protection force stated that only 8 of these 17 persons are residents of Berlin.

Press Reactions

DW141329 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 14 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Text] STUTTGARTER ZEITUNG wrotes: What was the more important event for Berlin yesterday--the visit of Alexander Haig or the demonstration of 50,000 young people in the streets?

Politically, the demonstrative visit of the U.S. secretary of state was certainly more important. Without the permanent guarantee of the Americans for the vital rights of Berlin, this city would be threatened. His repeating this guarantee, as have many prominent U.S. politicians since 1945, is comforting. Haig stressed that peaceful demonstrations show the strength and not the weakness of a democracy. The American guest said to the young protesters, whom he had not seen: even if we don't agree with what you are saying, we will defend your right to say it to our death. That is an American guarantee adapted to current times.

DIE WELT notes: The Soviets probably understand best what the visit of the Reagan government's secretary of state means, namely, a signal to Moscow: Up to this point and no further. Alexander Haig's Berlin presence has set priorities right again: America will not have its responsibility harmed and its strengthened willpower regarding peace and freedom damaged by some thousand brawlers. Haig spoke of the priority of freedom and the duty to proclaim its ideals everywhere in the world, thus shaming the protesters against his visit here by including them in his protection of freedom rights.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU stresses: The reaction of U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig to the mass demonstration against the Berlin visit and American foreign and security policies may be a lesson for the demonstrators and some of the most excited critics. Unfortunately, the fear exists that neither of the two sides will really learn the lesson. It was certainly not easy for former NATO Commander in Chief Haig to consider the demonstration as a strong point of democracy and as a commitment regarding democratic installations. Yet Haig did not hesitate to react the way he did. Many things in current American democracy can be sharply criticized but in any event the Americans do not have in mind curtailing freedom of opinion.

WESTFAELISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster points out: It could be predicted that the militant members of the leftist scenario, the professional rioters, would not miss the opportunity of Haig's visit to strike again. We cannot expect the 400 or 500 militant young people to realize that they can riot only because the Western allies, headed by the Americans, guarantee the free existence of West Berlin. So we can just state that the times when an entire city cheered an American President are over, probably forever.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE asks: How could matters develop to the point where it is feared that U.S. Secretary of State Haig's visit to Berlin could become a sideshow to the main event of an anti-American mass demonstration organized by the Young Socialists of the SPD and the Young Democrats close to the FDP? West Germany presented itself to the U.S. secretary of state the way it has increasingly been developing. His Berlin speech reflected the diagnosis of the disease with the warning: double standards--claiming that not the attacker but the defender is responsible for insecurity in the world; masochism ascribing no good to democracy and forgiving everything to the dictatorship on the other side; and blindly ignoring Afghanistan, Kampuchea and Vietnam. We can pay dearly for this embarrassing Berlin spectacle.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG of Munich states: Whoever was still looking for some last striking evidence of grave American concern regarding pacifist-neutralist moods in the federal Republic will find it now in Alexander Haig's West Berlin speech. It seems that the U.S. secretary of state rather liked seeing the demonstrations aimed at him, with the participation of youth groups from both Bonn coalition parties. They provided an opportunity for him to deal with the preferred political issues of this country in such a clear way as to be unusual for diplomatic visitors.

SCHWAEBISCHE ZEITUNG of Leutkirch maintains: The demonstration against the protective power showed how much the city must have changed in recent years. What has become of self-confident Berlin which once prompted an American President to state that he was a citizen of it? Kennedy's inspiring words "ich bin ein Berliner," could not be said today because the program excluded the city's public due to security measures for the visitor.

BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG compares the situation in Berlin and the Federal Republic with that in Poland: How blind do you have to be to believe that you can face communist shrewdness with pacifism? Remember a pacifist refuses to apply force even if he is attacked. Such an approach to life can only lead to defeatist self-abandonment. How much more active and courageous are the men around Lech Walesa. They do not yield to communist reprisals without defending themselves. They used resistance without violence, too, in carrying out their strikes but they made it clear to the Soviets that any new "fraternal help" would unleash a militant defense of Poland.

U.S. EUROPEAN ARMY CHIEF INJURED IN ATTACK

Official Denounce Action

[Text] Bonn, 15 Sep (DPA)—The Federal Government and Federal Interior Minister Gerhart Baum have denounced the attack on General Kroesen. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker stated that the Federal Government most deeply regretted the attack and condemned "this criminal attack in the strongest terms." The Federal Government reaffirmed its determination to do everything possible to guarantee the security of U.S. troops stationed in the Federal Republic for the protection of West Europe.

Baum stated in Bonn that this is the second major act of violence against U.S. citizens and installations within a short time. The possible death of many people had been deliberately considered. The perpetrators' efforts to win approval, even among only sections of the population, will continue to be just as unsuccessful as the earlier acts of violence. The security forces will do everything possible to get to the bottom of the crimes and, where possible, prevent such future crimes from being carried out.

MAUROY COMMENTS ON NEUTRON BOMB, MILITARY SERVICE

LD141746 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Text] The premier this morning spoke on an extremely sensitive subject. Mauroy addressed the opening session of the Institute of Higher National Defense Studies and told an audience highly interested in military matters: I will maintain the inheritance left by General de Gaulle. Dominique Souchier, you will note in particular that Pierre Mauroy did not, a priori, rule out the construction of a French neutron bomb.

[Souchier] The government will continue studies in this field. Pierre Mauroy said this in the clearest possible fashion this morning. The premier feels that it would not be rational to renounce the neutron weapon a priori when it could increase our deterrent strength.

This was, indeed, his first argument--a strategy is never immutable, it must adapt itself.

And then, his second argument: The United States has decided to manufacture it; the Soviet Union could also do so; these facts must, therefore, alert us, Pierre Mauroy said.

Now, naturally, for the time being, the question is one of continuing research but not to build these weapons. But the position adopted is very clear and it goes against the Communist Party's opposition to this bomb, reaffirmed only yesterday at the L'HUMANITE festival.

I must add that this morning Pierre Mauroy made a point of answering his own party's militants, this time on another matter, military service. There is no question, for the time being, of reducing it to 6 months even though the promise was included in Francois Mitterrand's program.

In matters of defense, as you can see, the force of continuity overrides the force of change, at least for the time being.

ISRAELI ENVOY CITES 'DIFFERENCES OF OPINION'

PM140801 Paris LE MONDE in French 9 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] In a statement to the central press agency, Israeli Ambassador to France Meir Rosenne referred to "fundamental differences of opinion between Paris and Jerusalem."

While hoping that the dialogue started between the two capitals will continue "by contacts at the highest level," Rosenne, implicitly alluding to Claude Cheysson's recent visit to Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, stated: "We cannot accept the statements made recently. Any support for the PLO delays the negotiations on Palestinian autonomy."

Rosenne, explaining the "fundamental differences of opinion" between France and Israel, stressed: "We do not believe that the Palestinians can be compared to the resistance in France or that the PLO, whose avowed aim is Israel's liquidation, is a valid interlocutor."

He added: "We had the impression that the new French Government was favorable to the Camp David agreements and that struck us as a change in French policy. But a recent statement gives the impression that France is moving away from Camp David.... We cannot allow Israel to be used as a scapegoat to defend anybody's interests."

LE MONDE SEES 'NEW TONE' IN RELATIONS WITH UK

[Editorial: "French-British Reunion"]

[Text] It was not without ulterior motives that the old channel tunnel plan, very fashionable even in the days of the entente cordiale, was revived in London on Friday, 11 September. What better symbol could there be for the two countries' desire to given a new, warmer and more understanding direction to their relations? In many respects, although this was already the sixth summit, it appeared to be a summit of reunion between two old nations whose history previously made them hereditary enemies and then allies. Mitterrand certainly touched the hearts of his hosts by stressing several times--notably on the BBC on Friday evening--that, in his view, Britain is not a "declining" country but "a great people" who still have an essential contribution to make to their allies.

Opinion in London, even in circles whose political options should have brought them closer to Giscard d'Estaing than to Mitterrand, is conscious of the French president's new tone compared with that of his predecessor who was accused of sacrificing a great deal--and in particular Britain's friendship--to French-German relations. The French side probably recalled that there is no question of replacing one type of preferential cooperation by another. Most British commmentators, however, stress the encouraging turn which relations between Paris and London have taken.

Of course, now that this desire for better cooperation has been proclaimed, the two countries still have to give their cooperation practical content. In the community sphere, this will be less easy than agreeing on the principle of reexamining the functioning of EEC mechanisms--especially budgetary mechanisms. Moreover, the implementation of joint industrial projects has encountered past difficulties which good intentions on both the French and British sides may not remove. But it was probably essential to initially restore a tone and quality of contant with London, which had considerably deteriorated, even if it means postponing the detailed debate until later.

Moreover, the identity of views which emerged between Thatcher and Mitterrand on the need for the West to restore the balance between its forces and the Soviet bloc's forces was bound to delight the British prime minister. Indeed, the London government is facing the effects of the pacifist (and readily anti-American) wave which is now flooding a section of northern and western Europe.

The new tone which Paris has adopted toward London should in any case allay the irritation and at times the fears which the absolute priority given to French-German relations had aroused on the other side of the channel. Will the French soon make a similar gesture toward Rome, which largely shares this irritation and these fears? In any case, special importance is being attached in the Italian capital to the visit which Chancellor Schmidt is currently making there, accompanied by his foreign and economics ministers.

AMBASSADOR TO LIBYA MEETS WITH AL-QADHDHAFI

[Text] Rome, 10 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian ambassador to the Libyan Jamahiriyah met yesterday with Libyan leader Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi to present the Rome government position on the recent statements made by Al-Qadhdhafi, an Italian Foreign Ministry note disclosed here today. The note coincided with a dispatch carried by the Libyan news agency, JANA, which reported that Al-Qadhdhafi met yesterday with the ambassadors from Spain, Greece and Turkey, as well as with the head of the Italian diplomatic representation.

The JANA account affirmed that, "their countries will not allow the United States to utilize their national territories for any aggressive act against Libya."

The Italian Foreign Ministry note said that, "during the meetings (with the ambassadors), held separately, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi explained the extent and the meaning of his speech." The statement under discussion was delivered on September 1, the anniversary of the Libyan revolution, and was perceived in Rome as threat to Italy in that the Libyan leader reportedly spoke of retaliatory measures against Sicily, and Crete and Turkey, if an incident like the air clash between Libyan and American war planes over the Gulf of Sidra, should occur again.

LIBYAN ENVOY DENIES SOVIET BASE INSTALLATIONS

[Text] Rome, 15 Sep (ANSA)--The Libyan Jamahiriyah has no intention of turning its ports into bases for the Soviet fleet and intends to maintain its non-aligned position between East and West, according to the head of the Libyan diplomatic mission in Rome, (Ammar al-Taggazi).

Interviewed by a privately owned Roman television station, (Al Taggazi), whose official title is secretary of the People's Committee of the Libyan Jamahiriyah's office in Rome, told the station that the North African state intends to "develop cooperation with East and West," keeping good relations with Western Europe as a "firm point" in its policies. "We are non-aligned country, which means cooperating with East and West on bases of equality," he stressed.

He also adamantly denied American press reports that Libyan leader, Colonel Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi intends to offer military bases to the Soviet navy and to permit the installation of a base for Soviet atomic submarines in the Gulf of Sidra. In addition, the diplomat reminded the interviewer that, "some time ago", Italy asked Al-Qadhdhafi to make a visit. In this connection, he disclosed that Tripoli has sent more than one message to Rome urging that the invitation be put into effect.

All of the students were released yesterday afternoon when the suspension of the sentences was pronounced. [Excerpts] Bari, 11 Sep (ANSA)--The forty-fifth annual Levant international trade fair, the most important event of its type in the region, was inaugurated today in this Adriatic port city in a ceremony presided over by Premier Giovanni Spadolini. In his remarks to the dignatories gathered for the inaugural ceremony, the premier recalled the importance of the Bari trade fair as providing a meeting ground for Italy and the countries of the Mediterranean and Middle Eastern regions.

In this context, Spadolini declared that, "it is the firm intention of the government to strengthen Italy's role in the Mediterranean in a bid to increasingly affirm relations of productive cooperation for the consolidation of a stable policy throughout the entire area. Recent events have confirmed the validity of this reasoning", the premier said.

"In the name of the Italian Government", the premier concluded. DEFENSE MINISTER CITED ON MALTA, LIBYA TIES

PM111509 Rome AVANTI in Italian 2 Sep 81 pp 1, 7

[Interview with Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio: "Italy and Malta: Action for Peace in an Area of High Tension"; date and place not given]

[Text] Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio has met with Prime Minister Dom Mintoff in Malta. The news of this meeting aroused considerable interest in the Italian press. That is one of the reasons why we asked Comrade Lagorio a few questions.

[Question] There has been talk of an unexpected lighting visit to Malta. Why?

[Answer] There was nothing unusual about it. There were at least two good reasons for making a visit to Malta in the past few days.

The first is that the process of updating the recent Italian-Maltese cultural-economic and military-technical cooperation treaty finally started in August. It was therefore a good time to visit the Italian military mission which has been in Malta for 1 month and has started its task of cooperation in carrying out public works (aqueducts and roads) and in training the Maltese Armed Forces. Second, it was only right to meet with the Maltese leaders to review the treaty with them now that the first steps are being taken.

[Question] That was the first reason for the visit. What was the second?

[Answer] The Italian cruiser Caio Duilio is in Malta. The visit by our ship has been warmly welcomed by the Maltese authorities, who regarded the Duilio's presence in Valletta as a gesture of friendship and solidarity by our country toward Malta. The cruiser is halfway through its training mission in the Mediterranean; it has on board 150 cadets from the Livorno Academy; it has already called at and will call at ports in allied countries or friendly countries, or countries which may become more friendly with Italy. The ship is an asset. Therefore, I felt it was right to visit the Duilio and have a friendly meeting with the crew.

[Question] You met with Dom Mintoff. Did you discuss the situation in the Mediterranean after what happened in the Gulf of Sidra?

[Answer] Mintoff is worried, as we are. The Mediterranean is becoming increasingly tense. We must take every possible initiative to restore calm. Mintoff is a complete pacifist and has confidence in Italy; he believes that our country, using all the international relations at its disposal, is in a position to make a contribution to all peace efforts.

[Question] Malta has had various disputes with Libya. Last year there was a crisis over the oil prospecting which Malta was carrying out a few miles from its coast. Libya opposed the work and even sent a few warships. Has the incident had lasting effects?

[Answer] We Italians are anxious for any conflict to be settled by peaceful means. We believe that Malta is in the right over the oil prospecting. The Libyan decision to extend its own territorial waters to 200 miles, in practice almost as far as the Maltese coastline, conflicts with international law. THe question is now under discussion in The Hague and elsewhere. However, new naval initiatives are not planned at present.

[Question] Mintoff is one of the socialist international leaders....

[Answer] Yes, my conversation with Mintoff was also a frank and useful conversation between comrades. Mintoff is a charismatic leader in his country; he gives Malta a completely neutral political line; his government has worked intensively to improve general conditions in the country. Malta's situation is certainly not comparable to that of Italy, but it has great confidence in our country. Mintoff greatly appreciates the Italian Socialists' effort and is convinced that the Italian-Maltese treaty is largely the result of the PSI's initiative. For this reason, I think that Malta will make every effort to ensure that the treaty yields all its fruits. These can be summed up in three concepts; active cooperation between the two countries, peaceful coexistence in the whole Mediterranean and respect for all interantional laws and regulations.

PCI'S PAJETTA VIEWS ON EUROPEAN REARMAMENT PUSH

PM111030 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 27 Aug 81 pp 1, 14

[Report: "Pajetta: Maximum Unity in Battle for Peace"]

[Text] Rome--The editorial in RINASCITA this week ("Negotiations Immediately, With Everybody" by Comrade Gian Carlo Pajetta) expresses the Italian Communists' concern over the current international situation. U.S. policy, Pajetta writes, "is assuming a worrying character and tone which seem to make it more difficult to hope for political solutions to deteriorating clashes and conflicts." Pajetta examines the recent U.S. stances and especially "actions" like the airborne clash in the Mediterranean. It is alarming that "Reagan, wearing the uniform of Navy commander in chief, should have said that America was ready to show its capability for other operations in any part of the world." Minister Lagorio even said that the U.S. gesture was like somebody lighting a cigarette on top of a dynamite dump.

Pajetta examines the Italian Government's positions (the position adopted by Colombo on the neutron bomb is particularly grave) and reaffirms the Italian Communists' opposition to any expansion of power "from whatever side it might come." It is particularly important to defend the concept of real balance and not theorize on the hypothesis of "superiority," as the United States is now doing.

Are there now any ways of overcoming the present serious crisis? "We have always called for negotiations not only to be started but to be rendered possible by measures and gestures which indicate both sides' readiness to discuss their own armaments. But we are now saying--we who have criticized the USSR's power policy and who refused to attend an exclusively communist conference in Paris to discuss opposition to nuclear rearmament with powers which had missiles--that the USSR has taken an important new step." It is certainly not Reagan's policy which has led the Soviets to adopt this course, Pajetta writes, and he points instead to Schmidt's and Brandt's initiatives and to the movements growing up in Europe (Belgium, the Netherlands, Britain).

Pajetta then points out the serious nature of the U.S. decision on the neutron bomb: "There is no doubt that it would not have started to manufacture these bombs, which cost hundreds of billions of dollars, unless it was sure of being able to deploy them in the only place in which they could be used." These are the facts which clash with Italy's foreign policy. "This is the question," Pajetta writes, "raised in Parliament with particular emphasis by Comrade Riccardo Lombardi. Lombardi did not ask--and we are not asking--for withdrawal from NATO: but he asked the Italian Government and Parliament to examine what it means to be 'allies' since we are a NATO member."

Pointing out that Lagorio and even Colombo--aside from Lombardi and De Martino--had also shown "concern", Pajetta stressed that: "It would be a mistake on our part to allow others to persuade public opinion that this is in some way a question which relates solely to relations between the opposition and the government. Thus it would be a mistake to make an interparty battle out of what is a battle for survival and to defend peace." Pajetta cited many Catholic voices (clerics like Benelli, Capovilla, Bettazzi, Fr de Rosa and the Christian associations of Italian workers) and quoted the three Christian Democrats from the Sicilian assembly, who tabled a motion (later withdrawn to comply with party discipline) against the decision to station missiles in Comisco and concerning Granelli's speech to the Senate Commission. In addition to Lombardi and De Martino, he pointed to significant statements by other Socialists including Giorgio Ruffolo in his recent article in LA REPUBBLICA. Hence, Pajetta's call for this peace battle to be given the most united character possible. "Not only are we not claiming an exclusive role in this sphere, but we consider it dangerous and negative to isolate ourselves and even to allow people to think that we are isolated. On this question, it should be possible to achieve unity or at least some measure of agreement or dialogue on the left and in the workers movement for a broader alliance."

PCI SENATOR PECCHIOLI REBUKES DC CALL FOR REFORM

[Excerpt] Rome, 12 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian Communist Party (PCI) branded calls for a sweeping reform of the governing system "empty sallies" today, implicitly snubbing overtures from the Christian Democrats [DC] to take part in a collective reform process.

The rebuke came from PCI Senator Ugo Pecchioli, the Communist opposition's shadow interior minister, who charged that corruption in public affairs and shortcomings in the Italian system did not stem from faulty processes, "but from the DC's use of the state in its power system and the responsibility shared by its allies."

In an interview appearing in today's issue of Turin's "LA STAMPA" daily, Pecchioli did, however, say that his party was always ready for "a motivated and serious" debate on the issue. Pecchioli's remarks came in response to a political resolution passed by the DC leadership yesterday in which a joint "inter-party" review of the Italian Constitution and "institutional problems" was listed as a "necessary" and "priority" task.

GOVERNMENT PRESENTS PROGRAM TO PARLIAMENT

LD150706 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Excerpts] The 8th constitutional government today presented its program of action to parliament. Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao gave special prominence to the event with an address to the house which lasted nearly 80 minutes.

He spoke of the vote of confidence which his government is to propose in the house, following the debate on the program, to give political strength to the projects the government proposes to execute.

The government program, with regard to foreign policy, states that its fundamental aims are: integration into Europe and loyalty to the Atlantic alliance. However, it makes it quite explicit that the government upholds the concept that Portugal's foreign policy should, before anything else, serve the nation's political, economic and cultural interests.

According to the government, the current international situation warrants a strengthening of alliances, thus anticipating increased cooperation with the Council of Europe and full and active participation in NATO. The document underlines that Portugal expects from its allies support for the reequipment of the Portuguese Armed Forces with a view to their indispensable modernization and to strengthening national security which, the document states, the prevailing international situation makes all the more necessary.

The program, in fact, gives promience to the defense policy, aiming to ensure national independence, territorial integrity and the safety of the people and property against any external threat. But in the strictly domestic area, priority in the defense sector is given to the promulgation of legislation on military service, conscientious objectors, organization of national defense and the rules and regulations of the ministry concerned as well as the subordination of the armed forces to political power on the expiration of the 4-year transition period indicated in the 1976 Constitution.

Again with respect to Portugal's foreign policy, in the nonmilitary sphere, accent is placed on the nature of relations with the former Portuguese African colonies. In is states that these relations are going through a high degree of understanding, or mutual relationship and of common actions which the government proposes to improve. In this respect, the executive states that it will maintain these links on the basis of state-to-state relations without interference in each other's internal affairs.

The situation in East Timor is the subject of a brief paragraph in the government's program in which it is stated that the government will pursue, at the international level, appropriate moves designed to enable the East Timor people to fully realize their most legitimate rights and aspirations in conformity with the UN Charter.

As for Macao, the government's program advocates the preservation of the relations of good neighborliness with People's China, namely in the areas of economic relations, transport and communications and of public administration reform. The central government will do all it can to promote Macao's advancement and to defend its interests, without overlooking the need to support the territory's cultural and material progress.

BERLINGSKE TIDENDE REPORTS ON DEFENSE BUDGET

["C.B." report: "Millions More for Defense Budget on Eve of Annual Social Democratic Congress"]

[Text] The increase of 369 million kroner [kr] in the defense budget over 3 years at 1980 prices will amount to more than kr 500 million when the defense forces' special adjustments for price and wage rises are added. In exact terms, the defense budget increase will be kr 505.1 million in the 3-year period up to 1985. This is shown by estimates made on the basis of information from the Defense Ministry. The figures could add fuel to the debate about the recent defense settlement at the annual Social Democratic congress which begins in Aalborg next weekend.

At the same time, the estimates show that the total defense budget will increase from kr 8,056,000,000 in 1980 prices to kr 12.1 billion at 1984 price levels, when the settlement runs out. Thus, the Defense Ministry has calculated the total defense budget for 1982 as kr 9,009,000,000 at 1981 prices.

The background to the Defense Ministry budget projections is an annual increase in running costs of 0.6 percent and a 12.25-percent annual increase in material investments. The ministry itself used these figures in the draft 1982 budget bill.

However, annual adjustments for price and wage increases could actually turn out to be even greater. The increase in the value of the dollar and rising oil prices have in the past meant increased spending of around 20 percent in some areas of the Defense Ministry budget.

In addition, price increases on the F-16 aircraft over and above 12.25 percent annually have not been included in the projection.

POLL PREDICTS OUSTER OF RULING LABOR PARTY

NC140942 Paris AFP in English 0853 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Text] Oslo, 14 Sep (AFP)--A three-party conservative coalition appears poised to push the Labor Party out of government for the first time since 1973, according to a poll published here today on the last of two days of Norway's general elections.

The non-socialist parties, the "Hoyre" Conservatives, the Christian People's Party and the Center Party (agrarian), had the support of 50 percent of those interviewed, while the ruling Labor Party and the left were favored by 41 percent, according to the survey in the VERDENS GANG newspaper.

The poll, taken on Saturday after a final televised party leader debate on Friday, appeared to confirm a significant switchover from the Labor Party to the Conservatives.

The Labor Party remained Norway's most popular political formation, gaining favor among 35 percent of those polled. The Conservatives tallied 32 percent.

The Christian People's Party and the Center Party polled 11 and 7 percent, respectively.

If the survey reflected actual votes, VERDENS GANG estimated, the Conservatives would win 53 seats, the Christian People's Party 16 and the Centrists 12, giving them an absolute majority of 81 seats in the 155-member parliament.

The Labor Party, which has ruled Norway continuously since World War II except for brief stretches in 1963-65 and 1972-73, would get 64 seats. The remaining 10 seats would go to the Left Socialist Party (5), the Liberal Party (4) and the Conservative Progress Party (1). Seven minor parties contesting the election were not expected to win any seats.

The Labor Party, lead by Gro Harlem Brundtland, Norway's first woman prime minister, currently has 76 seats, the Conservatives 41, the Christian People's Party 22, the Center Party 12, the Left Socialists 2, and the Liberal Party 2.

Polls opened in 239 of 454 constituencies on Sunday, but voting was to continue throughout the country today. The first prediction was expected shortly after the polls close at 1700 GMT.

Turnout in constituencies with two days of polling was reported yesterday to have been above average. Observers said that if the trend continued, more than 80 percent of an electorate of almost three million would vote.

FOREIGN MINISTRY TO CLOSE DIPLOMATIC POSTS

PM141051 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 2 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] The Foreign Ministry proposed that the Swedish Embassy in Kinshasa, Zaire and the consulates general in Sao Paulo and Antwerp soon be closed.

This is part of the long term Foreign Ministry plan to save 56 million kroner by 1986. Three or four other foreign missions are now being considered for possible closure next year. The embassy in Montevideo, Uruguay, and the consulates general in Houston, Sydney, Genoa and San Francisco already have started to close. In Houston where Yngve Holmberg [former Swedish Liberal Party leader] is consul general, the office will close as early as this December. Through the sale of premises and residences and the scrapping of 10-12 posts, the closures will mean real savings.

ROLANDHIS DENIES MAGAZINE REPORT ON CYPRUS ISSUE

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis denied a report carried in the British magazine "ECONOMIST" that he is involved in an attempt to solve the Cyprus issue. According to the magazine, this attempt is being promoted by Greece and Turkey on the basis of ceding constitutional rights by the Greek Cypriot side in exchange for territorial concessions by the Turkish Cypriot side. Rolandhis stated that this allegation by the British magazine was totally inaccurate.

PAPAIOANNOU ELABORATES ON AKEL'S POSITION

[Text] Speaking at a Limassol party hering, AKEL general secretary mentioned that Cyprus today needs a politically representative government or, if this is not acceptable, at least a government approved by all parties, which will agree on a minimum program and which will undertake to implement it. A one-party government, he stated, cannot carry the burden of the struggle.

Papioannou criticized the violation of the principle that views expressed within the National Council must not be made public. He said that for the sake of truth he was obliged to announce that in the National Council the AKEL delegation had proposed that our counterproposals should be specific both on the territorial and the constitutional aspects. On the territorial aspects he added, AKEL had proposed that we move from our official 1977 proposal of 20 percent to 22 percent in order to force the other side to move from its 3.6 percent, or remain exposed.

On the constitutional aspect, Papaioannou added, AKEL had proposed that representation in the upper house should be on the basis of the 70-30 percentage and that the proportional system should apply for the lower house. Generally, he said, AKEL's views were, and still are, that from the moment we accept biregional federation, we must be consistent, and that whatever we propose should always be within the framework of such a federation. This he observed, does not mean giving in, concessions or partition, but being consistent with what we have accepted in the summit agreements and the principle of biregional federation.

Papaioannou mentioned that the National Council, while accepting AKEL's views on all other points, disagreed with it on the territorial aspect on the basis that it would be preferable not to define any percentages at present, but to let it be clearly understood that there are margins and that we are prepared to negotiate.

GREEK CYPRIOT SIDE NOT COMMITTED TO SUBMIT MAP

[Text] Yesterday authoritative Greek Cypriot circles stressed that the Greek Cypriot side has not undertaken any commitment to submit a fresh map on the territorial aspect.

The map which was submitted in 1977 and again submitted in 1980, the same circles added, constitutes the Greek Cypriot side's proposals on the territorial aspect. Despite all this, the Greek Cypriot side indicated that it has some limited margin for negotiations.

The authoritative circles said: Besides, the Greek Cypriot side considers the Turkish Cypriot proposals as completely insignificant to serve as the basis for negotiations. According to the same circles, the Greek Cypriot side awaits the Turkish Cypriot reply to the broadened proposals which it has recently submitted.

The authoritative circles also stressed that if the Turkish side does not change its entire philosophy of a partitionist Cyprus solution and if it does not considerably improve its recent proposals on the territorial aspect, then there cannot be any progress and thus the intercommunal dialogue will inevitably come to a deadlock. In such a case, the Cyprus Government will have no other choice but to again take recourse to the UN General Assembly.

The same circles said that most of the foreign governments have described the Turkish proposals as not being constructive at all, and added that one of the goals of Denktas' recent campaign for enlightenment is to try to change these international negative impressions.

According to the same circles, President Kiprianou and his government are handling the Cyprus problem with a sense of responsibility and according to plan and they have been exerting every effort to exhaust all margins for securing substantive progress in the talks. But at the same time, they are briefing international quarters and in general, working to promote the Cyprus cause at all levels internationally.

In the meantime, the international quarters have been watching the Cyprus developments with increased interest. The EEC has already demonstrated more active interest in order to assist the work of the UN secretary general.

O AGON SCORES AKEL 'TERRITORIAL' PROPOSALS

[The observer's "My Opinion" column: "Dangerous Policy--Concessions in Return for Nothing, This Is the AKEL Line"]

[Text] AKEL is the biggest party in Cyprus, and when the biggest party of the country comes forward unrestrainedly and demands things which tend to actually compel the Greek Cypriot side to make fresh concessions at an unsuitable time, then definitely things cannot develop favorably and positively for the Cyprus cause. Moreover, we cannot expect improvement in our negotiating position.

It has now become most clear to all that the AKEL leadership, for reasons which we do not know, unhesitatingly and without evasion maintains now that the Greek Cypriot side should proceed with fresh concessions and steps beyond the point at which Makarios stopped in 1977.

All this with the invariable pretext and excuse that "we must persuade the world public of our good will" or in order to force, as AKEL believes, the Turkish side to make concessions.

Within the framework of this policy and in a blackmail attempt to reinforce its own line of policy, AKEL withdrew its confidence in President Kiprianou in 1978 and condoned for a whole year the holding of travesty of talks and it forced (this was admitted by the AKEL spokesman the other day) on the National Council the submission of Greek Cypriot counterproposals on the constitutional aspect. What is most important, but at the same time deplorable, is that (as the spokesman has again admitted) AKEL is again trying to enforce the idea of submission of fresh proposals on the territorial aspect by the Greek Cypriot side--proposals which would be more painful than those which Makarios submitted in 1977!

AKEL asks that we raise the percentage of territory that we cede to the Turkish Cypriots from 20 percent to 22 percent. Naturally it is not the small difference of 2 percent that matters.

What matters is the timing of the demand that our side should make the concession. And the timing is totally unsuitable for fresh concessions on our party.

When the Turkish side mockingly submits a map and "returns" 2.85 percent of the territory, our side cannot reciprocate the mockery with concessions. If the Turks had submitted a reasonable and negotiable map, if they were to return a reasonable percentage of territory, then probably the AKEL proposal might be sound and successful.

But at this moment, it is not. At this moment, the AKEL proposal is both untimely and dangerous. The AKEL spokesman's argument that the submission of counterproposals by us on the territorial aspect would compel the Turkish side to submit fresh, improved proposals is unfounded and cannot withstand criticism.

The Turkish side would definitely again reject our fresh concessions and would again describe them as "hair-dressing saloon decorations" as it has done in the case of our constitutional proposals which were handed at AKEL's inspiration. It would again demand of us fresh proposals and fresh territorial concessions. Next year AKEL would again come forward to demand fresh proposals by us, giving the Turks 24 percent of the territory, without the Turks giving us anything. But where would we be led by such a policy? Beyond this, AKEL pretends to be very sensitive toward foreign quarters and continuously repeats the need to persuade the foreigners.

Regardless of the fact that the very tragedy of Cyprus (invasion, occupation, refugees, missing persons) must have convinced all those foreigners who want to be convinced as to who is the guilty party and who the victim, who must give and who must take--we believe that by making concessions we do not only fail to convince the foreigners of our good will but on the contrary:

We convince them that there is a big margin for concessions on our side and thus we create the prerequisites for further pressuring of our own side. The foreigners sound out our reaction and position and when they hear the biggest party of Cyprus demanding that the Greek Cypriot side must reciprocate to the Turkish proposals mockery by making fresh concessions, then definitely nothing good would result for our cause.

We do not mention the fact that such submissive demands and suggestions within the Greek Cypriot home front actually aid the Turkish side's intransigence, encourage it in the pursuance of its goals and help it in not making an improvement to its proposals.

PRIME MINISTER RALLIS ON NATION'S ECONOMY

NC122102 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 2000 GMT 12 Sep 81

[Text] At 2100 tonight the administration of the Thessaloniki international trade fair, which opened today, gave a dinner at the Makedhonia Palace Hotel in honor of Prime Minister Rallis who, speaking at the dinner, spoke on the country's economic situation.

The prime minister referred to the various sectors of the economy and stressed that the measures implemented during the second 6 months of 1980, as well as those being implemented now, guarantee the upward trend of the economy. He particularly referred to the country's accession to the EC for which the Greeks must be particularly proud.

The first and foremost conclusion from the first 8 months experience of accession, Rallis observed, is that the prophesies of all those who opposed it have been proved wrong in a gala way because we have entered into the Common Market without serious repercussions on the country's economic life. At this moment, the fair's administration is giving a reception at the same hotel in honor of President Karamanlis.

PAPANDREOU INTERVIEW ON CANDIDATE CRITERIA

NC131609 Athens KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 13 Sep 81 pp 1, 24

[Exclusive interview granted by PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou to KIRIAKATIKI ELEVTHEROTIPIA political columnist Yeoryios Massavetas on 12 September]

[Text] Question: Mr Chairman, at this moment the Greek people know PASOK's election slates. Could you tell us what their main characteristic is, the philosophy which prevailed during their final selection, and the numerous proposals submitted by the basic organizational cells of the movement?

Answer: Without hesitation I would state that these slates are slates for battle and work. The criteria which prevailed--as was the case in previous times--were neither narrow and local nor the usual party criteria for serving election clientele. Since we had to deal with cadres, who all had to their credit the same basic virtues of dedication, fighting spirit and ideological background, the weight was placed on the selection of those most suitable to carry the burden of heavy work which awaits PASOK's government. Naturally, there are thousands of other able cadres who were not selected for the slates specifically because they also have to carry an equally heavy burden in the sector of their own responsibility. We are speaking, for example, of PASOK's tried cadres in the area of local self-government, trade unionism and the cooperative movement.

For us it was unthinkable to denude these areas of work--which we consider equally important and which have a considerable proportion of responsibility in the battle for change--from their tried cadres. We have repeatedly underlined that for us the Chamber of Deputies is only one--and not the exclusive--representative for expressing views and for implementing the peoples' authority.

Question: For months now a great deal has been reported about the participation of personalities and even groups with a different political origin in PASOK's election slates. This gave rise to the expression of various forecasts and comments, as for example, that the participation of certain personalities, for example of a center origin, would give PASOK the "aura of authority."

Answer: Let us set things in their proper place. The "aura of authority" or better, the power of authority, is given to PASOK by the people themselves. With this we would not like to ignore the role of any personality in the political life of the country and particularly in the country's political history. However, PASOK started, struggled and gave inspiration not as a group of personalities but as a purely peoples' movement. If at the start the protection of this peoples' character of our movement was desirable, today it has become more than necessary. This is the great guarantee for change that we offer to the people. This is the most convincing answer to any talk on spermatogenesis, to any attempt to cultivate doubt.

Question: Since, Mr Chairman, we are talking of spermatogenesis and about PASOK's beginnings, you must allow me to go back a little. In the past, in 1974, you were accused of allowing the loss of an historic opportunity when you refused to cooperate with the traditional center organizations and personalities. Today, after this 7-year progress--both your own as well as the organizations we have mentioned--very few people now share that viewpoint. I would like to hear your comment on this matter.

Answer: I believe that there is no better answer to those who raised such questions in good faith--because these are the only ones who interest us--than reality itself. In other words, than the fact that most of them have been convinced about the correctness of our course and now travel with us, or than the negative development of the new apostasy of 1978 and later. This nation has been tried so many times that it no longer has the luxury of new experimentation using old methods and material.

We have fought for years and we have managed to inspire this nation with confidence in its own strength. This is because PASOK, in the end, represents this nation. It is a genuine representative of the peoples forces which dream of a human, more democratic, socialist and above all else, a Greek society.

Question: On the other hand, Mr President, other elements have accused you that with your policy you have led the country's political affairs to "polarization."

Answer: If with this they refer to the true fact, that PASOK has become the pole of unity of all the unprivileged Greeks, of all those who have a right for change, then we gladly accept this "accusation." Over and above this, however, there is also a certain amount of hypocrisy among those who allege such things because, at the same time, some of them propose or even attempt coalitions; that is, when they accuse us of not forming a political company with them.

Beyond this, the people also know extremely well, as a result of their political history, as well as a result of the current reality in other countries, that polarization is often essential and comprises the maximum confrontation between the forces of change and the forces of conservatism and reaction. For example, it is from such a confrontation that the great victory of the French Socialist Party and of the French people originated.

When, particularly, it so happens that--as is the case with us--this pole around which the peoples' movement unites has a unique national peoples' cohesion, when it has an identity and clarity of views, of strategic options and tactical goals, then we can speak truly of happy moments for this peoples' movement. I will become a little poetical. I will recall the verses of our Nobelist poet who spoke of dreams taking revenge. The difference is that this will be viewed more directly. For us, dreams gain justification and they do not take revenge. These are the dreams of entire generations of this nation.

Question: Over and above your political and economic positions and analysis to date, Mr Chairman, at Patrai you gave a different tone to your election campaign and more generally to the strategy of your movement. In other words, you underlined the anthropocentric character of the vision for change.

Answer: We must truly underline that PASOK does not fight either for justifying any ideological-political dogma or so that we may create a society which counts on the basis of statistical indices in order to compare various economic dimensions and delusions but ignores the human right to smile, to love and, more generally, person-to-person relationships. This is a society beyond the boundaries of what we describe as the "Greek love of life."

As Yeoryios Papandreou used to say, it is not enough that figures are happy nor is it enough that all the people have their piece of bread. We must rid the modern Greek of his anxiety and we must bring back the lost beauty of everyday life. This is not a promise; this is the reason for PASOK's existence.

AKROPOLIS REPORTS SPLIT WITHIN PASOK PARTY

NC131731 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 13 Sep 81 pp 1, 16

[Excerpt] The announcement of PASOK's--incomplete--election slates the day before yesterday created an explosive atmosphere. The savage war that erupted among the party's various groups that struggled to promote "their favorites" is being further escalated. Another element aggravating the situation has already been added: Mr A. Papandreou has been personally involved in the war. Until recently, he tried to equalize the unbridgeable differences between the two groups by being the arbitrator.

Mr Papandreou has truly "joined the fun":

It has been revealed that he is possessed by a great fear. He fears that coagulating moves are being created within PASOK aimed against the leader. Or else that all these moves tend to question the authority of the present leader and deal with his--substantive--removal. They also threaten to split PASOK.

This new situation was revealed by a series of specific events which have already become known and are being discussed. For example, it became known that Mr Papandreou, last Tuesday, left in the middle of the party's Central Committee meeting during the final debate on the slates. Despite all his efforts, witnesses say that his face was "dark and drawn."

Information from excellent sources within PASOK report another incident: Mr Papandreou himself "dropped" Professor K. Simitis from the slates because--as it is stressed--he fears Simitis has "leadership aspirations," and that he has a strong influence on the party's leftists. Mr Papandreou tried to excuse his inconsistency about Mr Simitis by saying--in a letter sent to Simitis yesterday--that he was not included in the slates after a party leadership decision (whose?) not to include present or former members of the Executive Bureau. (As is known, Mr Simitis was a member of the Executive Bureau.)

It must be pointed out that Mr Simitis was so sure that he would be included in the slates that he had already rented offices for his election campaign....

The same thoughts had a catalytic effect on the case of the veteran cadre of the center and former minister Mr Y. Milonas. He too was dropped by Papandreou personally despite the fact that Papandreou himself had made all the pertinent contacts and negotiations with Mr Milonas.

There is also the case of Mr T. Mavros. Naturally things here are different. From the start of the contacts between Mr Mavros and Mr Papandreou, the entire matter--according to excellent information--strongly concerned PASOK's chairman. For Papandreou the issue had two aspects; a positive and a negative.

--The positive aspect was that cooperation with Mavros would give substantive advantages to PASOK, namely; beyond any vote percentage which Mavros influences as an independent personality, his cooperation with PASOK would multiply possibilities that a great percentage of voters who voted for the Center Union would turn to PASOK. For these voters, the presence of Mavros in PASOK would constitute a firm guarantee that this party--if it came to power--would allow a sound and nationally correct policy, a policy that would not imply dangers and adventures for the interests of the country and the people.

Under this interpretation--all authoritative political observers stressed--cooperation between Mavros and Papandreou would have been definitive on PASOK's fate and, as a sequel, on more general political developments.

The negative aspect for Papandreou was this specific and substantive strength that Mavros would have had on the basis of developments and which, naturally, would have shrunk the authority of PASOK's present chairman. It is this last fact which decisively influenced Papandreou's thoughts and ultimately led to the collapse of negotiations and the cancellation of cooperation with Mavros.

PAPER DERIDES HINTS OF MILITARY INTERFERENCE

NC121935 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 12 Sep 81 p 5

[Editorial: "And None Other!"]

[Text] The latest issue of the well-known U.S. magazine, "NEWSWEEK," carries an article on the Atlantic alliance and, more specifically, on Spain's entry into it in conjunction with the possibility of Greece's withdrawal, at least from the alliance's military wing, if the current official opposition party in Greece wins the October election.

The article itself merits no interest. It includes various commonplace statements and guesses--which contradict and cancel each other out--by the writer. He states that the blow to be received by NATO as a result of a possible Greek withdrawal would be greater than any strengthening as a result of Spain's entry into it. At the same time, he does not rule out that whatever A. Papandreou declares on the issue may be pre-election rhetoric, which will remain without any active sequel after a possible election victory by him.

So far, there is nothing new or interesting. At this point, however, "a diplomat from an allied country" makes his appearance in the article and allegedly stated: "In any eventuality, there are forces within the Greek military establishment which possibly may not accept the country's withdrawal from NATO."

We will deal with this point, because it refers to matters of fundamental principle and order; matters, in other words, not of expediency (whether Greece's stay within NATO is or is not a benefit, etc), but of legality (as to who or how many have a right to decide on this stay or withdrawal under the constitution and the laws of the state).

The positions and views of this newspaper on the essence of the matter of our country's entry into the Atlantic alliance are well known and they have been repeatedly expressed through this column.

This is not the question here, however, as we have said; the question is who and how many have a right to decide on the issue. We will state directly and without deviation that the relevant decision, no matter which way it will go, rests with the representatives who, under the constitution, carry specified authorities, who are elected by popular vote, and who administer and decide within the framework of the constitutional and the legal order. It rests with none other. It particularly does not rest with some other "establishment," whether it be military or not, which, in this manner, would gain a "de facto" identity of a parastate, a power above the state, or even an antistate.

The diplomat in the article is either uninformed about the current Greek reality or he interprets his noble desires as reality.

A military "outflanking maneuver" or, more importantly, a repetition of that wretched April operation is beyond reality and the current possibilities in today's Greece.

The painful experience--which also cost us a terrible national calamity--became a lesson and it inoculated our national being. In any eventuality, even that April operation was not a coup by the armed forces of our country. It was a coup against the armed forces, which were trapped and neutralized by the gang of plotters for the very reason that the leaders never imagined anything of this sort. They thought that certain units had moved legally and obeyed--those who were not neutralized--they thought this move originated with the legal government which was acting according to the constitution.

The "diplomat from the allied country" should bear this in mind because he seems unwilling to grant to Greece what is in power in his own country and who, obviously, thinks of us as some sort of Latin American "banana" republic.

We will add in conclusion that the democratic regime and its processes is an estate worth protecting and a national investment much more important than the benefits of the country's entry into the Atlantic alliance, no matter how important these might be.

The very painful and recent experience has taught us that democracy is interrelated to our national independence and structure and that tragedy lies in ambush, beyond democratic legality, and that no alliance could or can save us from such a tragedy.

Democracy, in any case, incorporates the right of peoples to err--or even to be badly governed....

NEWS REPORTS PREELECTION POLL FAVORS PASOK

NC111746 Athens NEWS in English 11 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] According to a Gallup poll conducted by ICAP Hellas for TAKHIDHROMOS magazine from September 1 to 3, PASOK will emerge from the October 18 elections with enough parliamentary seats to form a self-sustaining government.

The poll was conducted in the Athens area and the sample used ballots and polling booths and voted in secret. This is essentially the same method ICAP-TAKHIDROMOS used in conducting a similar poll early last June.

As indicated in the chart, PASOK's support now stands at 44.8 percent--a 6.1-increase from last June's pulse-taking--while New Democracy's strength is down by 3.7 points, at 26.5 percent.

Comparative Results (June '81-September '81)

PARTY	June '81	Latest	Difference
PASOK	38.7 percent	44.8 percent	[plus sign] 6.1
ND	30.2 "	26.5 "	-3.7
Communist (KKE)	14.7 "	15.2 "	[plus sign] 0.5
Progressive (Nationalists)	5.3 "	4.4 "	-0.9
Communist Int. EDA	4.9 "	2.5 "	-2.4
EDIK	-	-	-
KODISO	-	-	-
PARKE	3.6 "	4.7 "	[plus sign] 1.1
Other	0.8 "	0.2 "	-0.6
Blank	1.8 "	1.7 "	-0.1
Total	100.0	100.0

The poll was conducted among a total sample of 714 registered voters of which 114 refused to cast a ballot.

Extrapolating from the above results--and since both PASOK and New Democracy usually receive higher percentages in the countryside than they do in the Athens area, it can be assumed that the striking 18-point difference will be maintained nationwide, thus assuring PASOK a comfortable parliamentary majority under the existing reinforced proportional system to form a self-sustaning government.

The Athens NEWS is in the process of conducting a similar poll. Incomplete, raw results thus far pretty much agree with the data in the ICAP-TAKHIDROMOS chart above.

TERCUMAN STRESSES IMPORTANCE OF KUWAITI AMIR VISIT

NC111435 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 8 Sep 81 p 8

[Article by Fahir Armaoglu: "The Kuwaiti Amir's Visit"]

[Text] It is a fact that Turkey has been exerting efforts for years to improve its relations with the Arab states. Whichever government was in power, it has tried to achieve something in this direction. Similarly, it has been observed that many Arab states have expressed the desire to see Turkey on their side. And yet, despite all these mutual efforts and desires, the Turkish-Arab relations have failed to reach the desired level, not even on a bilateral basis, let alone embracing the whole Arab world. Naturally, there are several reasons attached to this. We believe that with the passage of time and through mutual understanding these hindering reasons will gradually diminish.

Another point that should be stressed is that steps taken by any Arab state toward improving the Turkish-Arab relations have deeply gratified Turkey. For, the Turkish foreign policy has an extremely complex structure. It is based on a network of interrelated factors.

From the point of view of freedom of action, this imposes certain limitations on Turkish foreign policy, whereas the situation in the friendly Arab states is different. Particularly, the field of political activity in the conservative Arab states, which are closer to Turkey, is very extensive. They enjoy greater opportunities in their approach to Turkey. As these opportunities are used, Turkey does not hesitate to do its utmost to reciprocate.

In this connection, it may be said that the visit of the Kuwaiti Amir Jabir al-Ahmad as-Sabah and his 80-member entourage, including the prime minister, the foreign minister, the minister of finance, and the minister of trade, to Turkey today is of profound importance. The truth is that Kuwait is making great efforts to approach Turkey and to improve relations. The composition and the number of the entourage clearly indicates this. Naturally, Turkey will not fail to evaluate this opportunity down to the last detail. For, if this visit is duly exploited by both sides, it will bring mutual benefits and, apart from the development of the economic and trade relations, it may in the future lead to more comprehensive political results. Because of its very delicate diplomacy, Kuwait has become one of the cornerstones of the Persian Gulf. In the international policy of the Middle East, too, Kuwait is sedate enough to make its voice heard. Therefore, when Turkish-Kuwaiti relations are developed within the framework of mutual understanding, they could link Turkey with the Persian Gulf and at the same time create new opportunities for Turkey's Middle East policy.

Naturally, we must not expect a series of agreements to be signed during this visit. What is important is the ability of both sides to lay the foundations for a healthier and more lasting result in the course of this visit.

EGYPTIAN DELEGATION MEETS BUSINESSMEN IN IZMIR

[Text] A 20-man Egyptian joint military and civilian delegation which has been touring Turkey for some time met today with Turkish industrialists and businessmen at a meeting at the Aegean Chamber of Commerce in Izmir.

Speaking at the meeting, the head of the Egyptian delegation, Gen (Ali Fahimi Hamad), noted that Turkey and Egypt have deeprooted historical and religious ties. He said that Egypt wants to cooperate with Turkey in every field, particularly in the commercial, economic and military fields.

In his statement, Aegean Chamber of Commerce Administrative Council Chairman Yilmaz Adiguzel said that the current level of the economic relations between Turkey and Egypt are much lower than the economic capabilities of the two countries, and that this situation is to the disadvantage of both countries. Pointing out that Turkey can supply the construction and engineering services needed by Egypt, Adiguzel said that in addition to this, joint investments with Egyptian businessmen and public economic enterprises can be carried out both in Egypt and in Turkey.

TCP'S BILEN INTERVIEWED ON PARTY ANNIVERSARY

TA101027 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 10 Sep 81

[Interview with Turkish Communist Party Secretary General Bilen on the occasion of the 61st anniversary of TCP's foundation--live]

[Text] [Question] Comrade Bilen, at a time when the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] is realizing its 62d year in its struggle for the sake of the Turkish working class, the military dictatorship in Turkey is completing a year in power. How do you assess this past year?

[Answer] Our party is marking its 61st anniversary under very grave conditions. But let me first begin by greeting our followers in Turkey who are carrying out their tasks despite such heavy conditions as well as all the detained progressives that are experiencing torture and oppression in the prisons of the military dictatorship. All the branches of our party both at home and abroad are marking the 61st anniversary of the TCP in a revolutionary way. The struggle is continuing.

The reality is now emerging more clearly. To whose benefit is the policy being pursued by the generals in power? It is serving only to strengthen the soverignty of people like Koc and Savanci [prominent Turkish businessmen] on the toilers and to the fortification of the positions of the U.S. imperialists in our country. This policy is serving to preserve subjugation to imperialism, to protect the interests of a handful of monopolist firms in a quagmire on rotten and exploitative rule. During the last year this policy has been proved incapable of bringing solutions to the deep-rooted problems of our country and our people. The military dictatorship was impotent in the face of these problems. Their only excuse was that they were busy exterminating terrorism.

Now our people are paying the price for this operation. During the last year the situation of our workers, peasants and of all our people has deteriorated. The economic crisis deepened even more. The basic democratic rights and liberties were eliminated. A kind of terror was inflicted by the state forces on political forces that were not involved in terrorism.

The worst part of the aggression is directed against the people and the patriotic forces among them. Innocent people are being subjected to barbaric tortures, harsh sentences are being inflicted, young people are being executed. The Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] has been closed down. Some of its officials were detained, others are still being sought by the security forces. The union officials want their rights. All kinds of democratic associations have been banned. The national and social oppression of the Kurdish people is still continuing.

On 12 September 1980, were our people plagued with terror only? They were also tired of unemployment and the high cost of living. Our people wanted new democratic rights and liberties. But the reactionary military dictatorship eliminated even those limited liberties which our people were enjoying.

Moreover, though the ringleader of the terrorist acts, Alpaslan Turkes, and his men have been detained and are being tried, nothing is being done about those who have fed and supported this ring of murderers.

With the policy it is implementing, the junta rule is further strengthening the reactionary circles--within and outside the Turkish Armed Forces--that are trying to defend the fascist Nationalist Action Party [NAP]. Pro-American, pro-NATO and collaborationist forces are preparing to send their representatives to the Consultative Assembly together with the supporters of the Justice Party and the NAP. This assembly is to prepare a constitutional (?draft) to the junta. Would the military junta, which has been unable to protect [words indistinct] the military prosecutors and judges from the attacks of these circles, be capable of eradicating terrorism?

Whoever is involved with imperialism and monopolies can no longer save himself. These circles are now becoming more aggressive. The U.S. administration is demanding fresh concessions in a bid to transform our country into a springboard for their aggressive intentions against peace and progress. (?To this end), the 6th Fleet is making a show. There is no end to the appetite of people like Koc and Sabanci. They are speaking about unlimited rule. They have an eye on the state economic enterprises [KIT] and on the agriculture of the country. They want a wide-open door for foreign investment. They have the support of the most reactionary forces within and outside the armed forces. They are increasing their pressure. The threats are growing. One of the main threats is the possibility of being destroyed in a nuclear war to be ignited by the imperialists. Without opposing definitely the impositions of U.S. imperialism, there is no way to protect our national interests and the security of our people and our country.

[Question] The generals in power claim that there is no other way than the way they are pursuing in order to resolve the present crisis in the country and that they have established a stable rule. How do you assess this claim? What in your view is the way to salvation?

[Answer] It is obvious that the reactionary military dictatorship whose policy's main direction is imperialism and pro-monopolist cannot solve any of the fundamental problems. The general crisis of capitalism is exacerbating in the entire world. The periodic crises are being added to this as well. Under such conditions, in countries such as ours, the economic, political and social crises become long-lasting. This is a structural crisis.

Last year, a reality emerged once again. The crisis cannot be overcome in (?this way). The masses understand and will understand this reality better with each passing day. The collaborationist bourgeoisie has no solution for an end to the crisis. However, there is a way for our people to emerge from this crisis--through putting an end to the sovereignty of imperialism and the monopolies. First the quagmire must be dried up.

The field of action and means of action of the collaborationist monopolies and of the big bourgeoisie--which have maintained their sovereignty with new methods during the past year--are being narrowed down. Empty words do not fill empty stomachs. The dissatisfaction of the people is growing. The 24 January [1980] economic program, which destroys new families every day, is being implemented only with the use of brute force against the workers. The people's reactions to this economic policy are growing. There are conflicts even among the supporters of this policy. The more the army is being used as a tool for brute force, the bigger is the distance becoming between the army and the people. This distance is being reflected in the army. This is becoming a source for the distance between the anti-imperialist Ataturkists and the extreme pro-Americans. The means for the forces who struggle against imperialism, the monopolies and reactionaryism are growing.

Real democracy cannot be established unless an end is put to the junta regime. This path will be opened with the stepping up of the efforts of the widest national democratic forces to establish a single front for the daily and most basic demands of our people. That is the duty which currently faces us.

[Question] The ruling forces have stepped up their anticommunist attacks and provocations during the past months. They claim to have destroyed the TCP. How do you assess this attack and its results?

[Answer] The anticommunist attack of the reactionary dictatorship is neither unexpected nor surprising. Whenever the ruling classes heavily attack the working class, the workers and democracy, they also attack the TCP. The TCP is a party which wages a continuous struggle for the interests of the working class, of the workers and for democracy. Friends and enemies do not deny this fact. That is the reason for the attack. There is no struggle without a bleeding nose. In no way do we minimize our wounds. We have suffered losses. The TCP struggled and is struggling with all its might to save its cadres and its organizations from this flood of attacks.

By announcing figures and names of TCP members arrested--most of them exaggerated or simply lies--the junta is trying to make the people believe that it has destroyed the TCP. It is trying to destroy the hopes of the working class, of the workers. However, it cannot even make all the bourgeois circles believe in these exaggerations. The columnists of the reactionary press which flash headlines such as "The TCP Has Been Destroyed" also say that the "TCP's roots are deep, it is difficult to destroy these roots, more attacks are necessary." First, they said 2,000 TCP members were apprehended, now they say the figure is 600. They do not know what they write! Which of these reports is true? There is only one truth; they have not been able to destroy the TCP.

Let us not forget the proverb which says that the enemy never sleeps. The data shows that the junta is getting ready for a new attack within the coming days. The cadres should be alert all the time. There is another point: The anticommunist attacks do not reach and will not reach their aim. No force can separate our party from the masses. They cannot do that. The TCP lives in the working class, in the people and in their struggles. No force can eliminate the working class or our people.

[Question] Such attacks against the TCP are not new. What are the similarities and differences between these recent attacks and previous ones?

[Answer] Undoubtedly such attacks are not new. Nor are the lies meant to slander our party. On the one hand the ruling classes try to conceal the fact that the communists are part of the working class and the most heroic sons of our people; they spread the story that the TCP has its roots outside the country, they say that the communists are spies; and on the other hand they say "thousands of communists have been apprehended," and they give figures as to how many of them are workers, villagers, shopkeepers, teachers, architects or engineers. They say that the TCP's roots are deep. They talk inconsistently. They contradict themselves. On the one hand they ban the TCP by means of fascist laws, and on the other hand they attack it for working clandestinely. They extract statements by means of torture and brute force. In this way they try to prosecute progressive youths and patriots for being members of the TCP. None of these things are new.

For months, they tried to prove the story that the TCP was behind the terrorism in Turkey. They conducted barbaric torture in order to prove it. Now they are trying to portray the TCP as a foreign force in conflict with our national interests. Look at what they call "proof." They claim that "the TCP gives information to foreign countries about Turkey's light bulb production." This is ridiculous. Such primitiveness shows that it is becoming increasingly difficult to conceal the true character of the TCP from our people. Only one thing is true in the martial law statements and that is that our party is composed of the most heroic and most progressive sections of our working class and of our people, and that it is effective throughout the country. Who are those detained? For the first time the police have been able to strike so little at the nucleus of our party. The newspapers wrote "it was believed that the TCP was eliminated after the 1951 arrests, but now it is facing us stronger then ever." They should have no doubts. We will be even stronger tomorrow. Our working class is qualitatively and quantitatively much stronger today then yesterday. Today our party is in the heart of hundreds of thousands. Hundreds of thousands shouted "freedom to the TCP" at the May Day rallies. This reality, which was ingrained in the consciousness of the people through harsh struggles, cannot be erased no matter how extensive the arrests are. The martial laws, the terrorism, the merciless torture hone the communists' consciousness and hatred further. The torture incidents are not new. Undoubtedly, their methods and kinds have been developed. Under the guidance of U.S. advisers, torture is being implemented in sophisticated ways. Though they are in this way getting some results, the ruling classes still cannot get what they are after. So many communists, so many progressives and patriots, the bravest of our people, have refused to bow their heads during the torture sessions.

Soon the trials will be underway. More efforts will be made to hide the truth from the people. They have in fact detained thousands of patriots accusing them for being members of the TCP. However, they will not be able to silence them. The torture they have implemented will be disclosed. The public will better realize that those being tried for being members of the TCP are the representatives of workers and (?peasants). As patriots, they will voice the national problems of the country and will defend the views of the TCP, to which they are accused of belonging. What does the TCP want and what is it fighting for?

Our people will once more hear this from the mouth of the patriots in the court rooms. Our people will observe that those being accused in the docks as guilty will in fact be accusing the corrupt rule. Ony then will it be clear who is guilty. The progressive forces, which will witness the anti-communist attacks directed against the whole of the democratic forces, will help out with the discovery of the truths.

Another important matter emerges in this connection. These trials should not be held behind closed doors hidden from the people. There is nothing, no view which the revolutionaries want to hide from the people.

[Question] It has been announced that the TCP Central Committee plenum has met. What kind of an evolutionary framework was formulated by the plenum for the working class and our people?

[Answer] Today we are in a position of retreat with the aim of further strengthening. Attacks on the TCP are incessently continuing. However, retreating does not necessarily mean retreating from the bosom of the masses or retreating from the struggle of the classes. This only means resorting to new ways of organizing and struggling. The plenum has reached the conclusion that even under the circumstances of military dictatorship, the possibility of a large mass organization exists.

This development should be examined in the light of history. No matter how strongly based the junta seems to be today, it is standing on shaky grounds. Its scope of activities is not increasing--on the contrary, it is decreasing. This was the situation during the years following 1971 and this is the situation today after a year. This military dictatorship also will collapse and disappear. The government of the national and democratic forces will be formed. The decisive factor in the end is still the struggle of the masses of the people.

What impedes the gathering of their forces is domestic factors and the disarray among the ranks of the democratic forces and the working class. That is why the plenum has especially emphasized pointing out to the party cadres the importance of the task of forming the united front of all the anti-imperialist, antifascist, antimonopolist and anti-chauvinistic forces. Each step which strengthens the unity of action with the Turkish Labor Party and the Turkish Workers and Peasants Party will be a development that will lead the way to political unity and that will facilitate the realization of this task.

As a conclusion, I would like to point out that the plenum has decided to complete the preparations in connection with the holding of the Fifth TCP Congress. Your party which has been able to convene the plenum of its Central Committee will also be able to convene its congress despite the grave circumstances. This has been proved in the past. Undoubtedly, convening the TCP congress will be a historic event for the TCP and a leap forward for us. I am convinced that we will be able to fulfill this task.

Greetings to all those imprisoned in the dungeons, struggling for the cause abroad, all communists, the working class and to our people on the 61st foundation anniversary of the TCP.

MINTOFF SAYS USSR TO GUARANTEE MALTA'S NEUTRALITY

NC131415 Paris AFP in English 1358 GMT 13 Sep 81

[Text] Valleta, 13 Sep (AFP)--Maltese Prime Minister Dom Mintoff said today that the Soviet Union would shortly be signing an agreement with Malta guaranteeing the island republic's neutral status.

Addressing a Labour Party meeting, Mr Mintoff said that Malta has also appealed to the United States for the speedy preparation of a similar agreement which could be signed simultaneously with the Soviet one. The prime minister said that similar proposals had been made to both Moscow and Washington calling for recognition of the islands' neutrality and increased trade. The draft accords also called for good relations with the Arab world and friendship with China. Mr Mintoff added that while Malta had differing views from the United States on certain issues, talks aimed at strengthening relations were currently in progress.

PSOE, PCE AIDES ON USSR 'INTERFERENCE' ON NATO

PM141014 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 9 Sep 81 p 9

[EFE report: "Parties Reject Moscow's Pressures"]

[Excerpt] Union of the Democratic Center and Popular Alliance political leaders consider the memorandum delivered by the USSR Embassy in Madrid to the Foreign Ministry an interference in Spanish affairs, while leaders of the parties of the parliamentary left, though not denying this possibility, point out that there are also U.S. pressures with regard to which the same stance is not adopted. This is revealed in an EFE poll from which we report the most important replies.

Jose Federico de Carvajal (Spanish Socialist Workers Party): "My personal opinion is that the Soviet interference is a consequence of Spain's application to join NATO. There is no doubt that just as the U.S. pressures for our entry into NATO constitute an interference, so too does the USSR's issue of the memorandum. I believe that the Foreign Ministry's rejection of the memorandum is correct because the Spanish Government does not have to accept pressures from other countries."

Santiago Carrillo (PCE): "I believe that the government was quite right to reject the Soviet opinion on Spain's entry into NATO but why does Calvo Sotelo's government not show the same self-respect in connection with the continuous U.S. intereference in Spanish politics? Why does Calvo-Sotelo humble himself? What undertakings do Calvo-Sotelo and Perez Llorca have with respect to the United States? Why don't they demonstrate the same self-respect as they do in connection with what they call the Soviet interference?

PCE APPOINTMENTS--The PCE Central Committee has appointed new names to leading PCE bodies or, to put it another way, following its last Congress, power was shared out today among the strongmen of this party. FOREIGN MINISTER COMMENTS ON SPAIN'S NATO ENTRY

PM140835 Brussels LE SOIR in French 5 Sep 81 p 3

[Christian-Guy Smal report on interview with Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb; date and place not given]

[Text] Spain certainly seems determined to join N Despite opposition from the socialist and communist parties, the Madrid government wants to move quickly. The parliamentary debate probably will take place this month and the membership application is expected in Atlantic circles in the fall. There is no doubt that this candidacy will be welcomed by the Western allies, but it is also certain that it will arouse controversy not only among Madrid political circles but also internationally.

The Spanish left is hostile: It is talking of a break in the established balance, the strengthening of bloc politics and the nuclearization of Spanish territory.

Leonid Brezhnev himself, ever farsighted, confided his irritation to Chancellor Schmidt in June 1980. Since then, the communist leader apparently has warned the FRG Government chief that any initiative aimed at Spain's entry into NATO would violate the principle of the "nonexpansion of the East and West military alliances and that that would prevent any reduction in tension." (note: INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE 8 August 1980)

Brezhnev was referring to the Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Mililla in Morocco, at least that is the assumption. The argument isn't a very strong one because there is nothing in the Atlantic treaty which prevents the signatories from having overseas territories.

As soon as Spain became a democracy, the question of its adhesion sooner or later to the West European countries' defensive alliance was raised. Madrid did not seem to be in any hurry, at least at that time, and made its application dependent on a series of specific political conditions: definition of its zone of responsibility, extension of its sovereignty to the British enclave of Gibraltar, entry into the EC.

The remarkable point at present is that Spain has changed the order of its priorities: It hopes that rapid entry into NATO will speed up the process of joining the Common Market, which recently has been slowed down somewhat by French objections.

But NATO is a delicate subject, especially since the controversy over Eurostrategy is far from settled. What repercussions can be expected? We put this question to Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb, who seemed reasonably optimistic to us. It is true, he told us, that the type of argument used by Spain to gain entry to NATO has changed. But the essential point is Madrid's avowed desire to join the democracies' club. It is obvious that this political aspect comes before the military aspect: Spain's entry into NATO will in no way increase the organization's strength. But its membership might encourage its own democratic development.

[Question] Don't you foresee some reservations, some difficulties, particularly from the countries worried about Moscow's warnings?

[Answer] I have a "feeling of unanimity." I believe that there will be no opposition from the moment Madrid submits its application for membership. Moreover, at the present time, it is easier to join NATO than to join the Common Market.

[Question] You foresee no opposition in Belgium? In our country, the political world is divided on defense issues.

[Answer] I don't think there will be any major problems because, on the one hand, the political arguments in favor of membership are strong and, on the other hand, because we will follow the procedure laid down by the North Atlantic treaty and by our country's parliamentary rules. It is important that Spain should be associated in the political consultation efforts being made within NATO. It is already a member of the Council of Europe; it soon will join the EC. Why shouldn't it now be part of the integrated defense system--especially since as I said, its entry into the "democratic club" will in no way alter the balance of forces. The step to be taken is essentially a political step. In addition, Madrid's participation in NATO's work could consolidate the regime's democratic development. Hitherto the Spanish Armed Forces have been essentially concerned with internal problems. In the alliance, it will be placed in an international framework.

[Question] If it is a question of avoiding a military coup, we should perhaps remember Greece, Turkey and Portugal....

[Answer] That may be, but although the alliance cannot automatically prevent a coup, at least it creates an atmosphere which favors democracy. Finally, and this is not the least important argument, Spain's entry will strengthen the European side in the dialogue between the United States and Europe.

Moreover, Mr Nothomb seems to regard the matter as a foregone conclusion. Isn't Spain already on the side of the democracies in the CSCE?

Finally, the foreign minister thinks it likely that Spain's formal application will be on the Atlantic council's table during the ministerial meeting in Brussels next December.

And the "15" will open their arms wide....

KOREA'S NAM TOK-U CONCLUDES WORKING VISIT

NC112055 Paris AFP in English 1826 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Text] Brussels, 11 Sep (AFP)--South Korean Prime Minister Nam Tok-u wound up his three day working visit to Belgium today after meeting the presidents of both houses of Belgium's Parliament, King Baudouin and Belgian business leaders.

His final meeting tonight was with business leaders at a dinner given by the large Belgian holding company Societe Generale de Belgique. Mr Nam met with King Baudouin [word indistinct] being granted an audience despite the unofficial nature of his visit. On Wednesday, he was awarded the ribbon of the Order of Leopold, Belgium's highest distinction.

South Korean sources today said they were very satisfied with the meetings, both with Belgian leaders and officials of the European Commission. Mr Nam is to return to Seoul via London tomorrow morning, aboard a regularly scheduled Sabena flight.

Many of the questions discussed during his stay here will be examined in detail during a visit by Trade and Industry Minister So Sok-chun, who is to arrive Tuesday for the first stop of a 20-day tour of Belgium, Luxembourg, West Germany and Britain.

On Wednesday, he will give the opening speech at a symposium on South Korean economy and relations with Europe organized by the European Commission, the London-based FINANCIAL TIMES, and the Seoul government.

APEL DISCUSSES DEFENSE EFFORTS, ARMS CONTROL

DW150937 Frankfurt Hessischer Rundfunk Network in German 0930 GMT 13 Sep 81

["Excerpts" from interview by reporters Hoesch and Martenson with FRG Defense Minister Hans Apel in the program "Frankfurt Talk"; place and date not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] The Americans are demanding the establishment of support installations for their troops in the Federal Republic. Can you back out of this?

[Answer] Well, I can. I can because it is absolutely clear that the Foreign or Finance Ministries have the responsibility for responding to the demands of the Americans. I will, therefore, not comment on many of these wishes from the Americans.

[Question] So Genscher is supposed to handle it?

[Answer] I didn't say that. But responsibility for a certain department means that one doesn't take a beating for somebody else's responsibilities.

[Question] Secretary of State Haig and Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko will meet in late September in New York possibly to decide on the beginning of negotiations on the reduction of medium-range missiles. Is it wrong to assume that NATO still does not have a clear concept in this respect?

[Answer] The assumption is wrong. Together with the decision on modernizing medium-range weapons, we have decided on an arms control offer, saying: Please let us negotiate on your SS-20 medium-range missiles and your medium-range Backfire bombers against which the Pershing and cruise missiles will be available for deployment in 1983 in West Europe.

The Soviet Union says it does not want to have such restricted negotiations. It wants to include other systems as well. Then the West will have to say: In that case, we want to include other systems on your side which are equivalent to what you want to have included on our side.

In other words, we have an initial concept for the negotiations, but we will see after the talks you just mentioned how we should negotiate further on this concept. I see no central problems in this connection. If the preparedness to negotiate is great on both sides--and I am convinced it is--due to the obvious interests of both superpowers, the concept will be very quickly supplied.

[Question] So you don't think that the West should insist exclusively on land-based systems in Europe?

[Answer] It is certainly dangerous to let oneself be pinned down in this matter. But it must be noted that we are in a double fix. The narrower the framework for negotiations, the more likely it is that the negotiations will make quick headway. If NATO's offer to negotiate these systems against each other is accepted, we would make comparatively smooth headway. But if the framework of negotiations is expanded--and thus the extent of the arms systems--matters will become increasingly difficult, first, in finding a definition where negotiations should stop and, second, in making quick headway. So the West as well as the East will have to give some thought to priorities.

I would give priority to quick headway or to a wide scope of negotiations, which would need more time. I believe that we will be able to tell after the initial talks what the Soviet Union prefers. Then the West must make a decision.

[Question] U.S. Secretary of Defense Weinberger once developed some sort of linkage between defense expenditures and the need for the neutron weapon. Do you think that your budget will make it more difficult now to defend yourself against the deployment of American neutron weapons here?

[Answer] I see no connection at all between the production decision in America and our budget. It could be construed only for the sake of argument because the one thing actually has nothing to do with the other. I point out that the arms systems we have ordered are being supplied as planned so that our conventional antitank defense is being further increased.

The position is absolutely clear for us: Production decisions on such a weapon are being made in America. It is not our business to comment on it. The West Europeans, however, will be directly involved in deployment decisions. The position of the Federal Government is very clear because of our 1978 decision which the federal chancellor recently again underscored. In other words, there is no reason why we should debate it at the moment.

[Question] Mr Minister, the impression exists that your position in the party has changed somewhat since you have been in this office. Do you occasionally feel abandoned by your party? The key words are Tornado or counterarmament where you are under heavy attack by the Young Socialists.

[Answer] One thing is certainly correct, namely that my position has changed within my party, to put it neutrally. But you see, if you have passed through two-thirds of your life--I hope so at least--or maybe more--you only know in the end--you become more casual and perform your duty where you have been appointed. I do not want to irritate anybody, but sometimes it cannot be avoided. It is important that I well understand the young people without giving up the basic position of my office and the young people will have to understand that Social Democratic government responsibility also includes the Defense Ministry and security policy. If we succeed in doing this, it will mean we have achieved some political maturity.

SOVIETS REFUSE INVITATION TO OBSERVE MANEUVERS

[Text] Bonn, 15 Sep (DPA)--Moscow has turned down the Federal Government's invitation to send a Soviet observer to the Bundeswehr's "Sharp Blade" maneuver in southern Germany. This is the first time since 1978 that the Soviets have not sent an observer to the maneuver area within the framework of the confidence-building measures of the CSCE Helsinki Final Act. In all previous years, Soviet Gen Aleksandr Knyrkov from the Soviet Embassy in Bonn was a guest at the Bundeswehr maneuvers.

DPA learned from diplomatic circles in Bonn today that Moscow apparently refused the invitation under a pretext. In contrast to former times, the Soviet Union permitted no Western observers at its major maneuvers last week. It was learned that Moscow took exception to the fact that Bonn sent its invitation to members of the diplomatic missions in the federal capital. The Soviets regarded this as a "restriction" because they had not been able to choose their observers freely. According to reliable sources, the Soviet Union argued that the choice should have been left to them.

GENSCHER, TURKISH AMBASSADOR SIGN AID AGREEMENT

LD151248 Hamburg DPA in German 1147 GMT 15 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 15 Sep (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Turkish Ambassador Vahit Halefoglu signed the German-Turkish government agreement in Bonn today on financial cooperation and defense aid.

In doing so, Genscher stressed the "longstanding and tested cooperation" between the two countries which are closely linked in the Atlantic alliance and "Turkey's geographically important and exposed position as NATO's southeast flank."

The agreement on defense aid provides for payments of DM130 million for the Turkish Armed Forces. The economic aid amounts to DM460 million and is part of the OECD aid action operative since 1978.

Genscher described the agreement as an expression of the Western states' joint efforts to find lasting solutions to Ankara's economic problems. He expressed confidence that the financial aid will help to smooth's Turkey's path to a return to democracy. If it can be noted today with satisfaction that there has been considerable progress in the stabilization of Turkey's economy, then this is due to an important extent to Ankara's consistent and realistic economic policy.

DIE WELT CONDEMNS ATTACKS AGAINST AMERICANS

[Joachim Neander editorial: "The Threat"]

[Text] This [the 15 September attempted assassination of U.S. General Kroesen in Heidelberg] is the fourth attack with bombs or fire against Americans on German territory. The leaders of the so-called peace movement will certainly stress again how much they are opposed to terror and violence as well as all kinds of anti-Americanism.

Naturally, it would be idiotic to hold the peace movement directly responsible for the fact that people are now operating with bazookas on our country's streets. But we still should consider three things.

First, it is certain that a clear feeling of being threatened is gaining ground among the Americans, despite the most reasonable reactions of the leading men. One cannot be surprised if statements are made in this respect. Something of this feeling may have been expressed in the hasty condemnation of the assassination attempt from the chancellor on down to Karsten Voigt, including all those who used to maintain outward restraint in similar cases.

Second, it must be said that the hardcore terrorists, submerged for years, seem to consider the peace movement with its strongly emotional trend as the proper framework for their actions. They probably believe that the wave of this movement could win them new sympathizers.

Third, the peace movement gradually will have to realize that groups have been marching in their ranks for a long time--not at all unrecognized--who could almost be called "terrorists of the word." The peace movement must get rid of them if it does not want to get into difficulties itself. A reader's letter to a news magazine this week said that the SPD's defenders of NATO's dual decision are those Social Democrats who can and should be flushed down the toilet."

This language was used by the SA in its 1933 gatherings in talking about the Jews. Less than 10 years later nobody could believe it possible that the words had been turned into action.

CABINET COMMUNIQUE OUTLINES NATIONALIZATION PLANS

PM160681 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Sep 81 p 7

[Excerpts] The president called a cabinet meeting at the Elysee Palace on Wednesday, 9 September 1981. In the afternoon, the following communique was issued:

Nationalizations:

The cabinet heard a report on nationalizations from the premier. In keeping with the premier's statement to the National Assembly on 8 July and with the lines laid down by the cabinet meeting held at Rambouillet on 2 September, the main provisions of the draft documents soon to be submitted to the State Council have been decided.

In particular, decisions have been taken on the sphere covered by the nationalizations, the methods of paying compensation and the future organization of the enterprises.

The following five industrial groups will be nationalized: the General Electricity Company, the Saint-Gobain Company, Pechiney-Ugine-Kuhlmann, Rhone-Poulenc and Thomson-Brandt.

Discussions are continuing with the foreign shareholders of the following groups: Roussel-Uclaf, ITT-France and CII-Honeywell-Bull, in order to examine the conditions for restructuring their capital.

In addition, the government has decided to open negotiations with the directors of the Dassault group on gaining a majority shareholding in the near future.

Regarding the Matra group, current negotiations should give the state control of the group, which will, therefore, maintain its unity.

In the iron and steel industry, nationalization will be carried out by converting the state's credits into shares.

The credit sector will be completely nationalized. Banks under foreign control will be excluded, as will be the Sicomi [Commercial and Industrial Real Estate Company] and rediscounting houses, banks whose capital is controlled by mutual insurance or cooperative-type companies and banks whose deposits from residents did not exceed Fr 1 billion on 2 January 1981.

The Parisbas and Suez finance companies also will be nationalized. The government will, as promised, retrocede the nonnationalized industrial shares held by these groups. Former shareholders who would like to acquire retroceded shares will be able to do this by using the bonds they receive in compensation.

The desire to guarantee fair compensation has led the government to choose the method, already used in the past, of exchanging shares or nominal shares for bonds.

The government reaffirms its intention to respect foreign interests.

The nationalized enterprises' management boards will comprise representatives of the state, the staff and the public and private activities concerned by the enterprise until such time as a vote is taken on a further law on the organization of public enterprises and the exercise of the workers' rights within them.

ASSEMBLY REJECTS OPPOSITION'S CENSURE MOTION

NC160824 Paris AFP in English 0741 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 16 Sep (AFP)--An opposition motion to censure the Socialist government of Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy was rejected early this morning by a vote of the French National Assembly.

Only 154 deputies, Gaullists and Giscardians, voted for the motion, well below the 246 needed for adoption. The motion, offered by the Gaullist RPR Party (Rally for the Republic), had been given no real chance of succeeding, since the Socialists by themselves hold a majority of the 491 assembly seats.

The Gaullists complained that Mr Mauroy "has not oriented his action in the most important direction: the fight against unemployment and inflation."

And Jacques Blanc, of the Giscardian Union for French Democracy (UDF), said his faction supported the motion "to mark its unswerving opposition to a politics that, through its intolerance and sectarianism, is spoiling France's future and sending it on the path of decline."

The vote followed Mr Mauroy's presentation to the assembly of the broad outlines of the new government's policy, which centers on the battle against unemployment. In response to opposition criticism, the prime minister insisted: "The battle of unemployment is truly the battle of France. This is a battle we will win."

The battle over the censure motion fell strictly along party lines. Socialist Party leader Pierre Joxe said he was amazed by the rightists' attitude. "Reforms are in the works, others have been announced, some are imminent, a budget is in preparation--and the RPR suddenly announces a motion of censure." He reproached the right for offering criticism without offering any alternatives, and said the censure motion was "an act of foul humor, of spite."

Communist leader Andre Lajoinie said members of his party were satisfied with the program announced by Mr Mauroy.

The Socialists have announced measures aimed at providing thousands of new jobs, decentralizing the government and nationalizing banks and some large industries. The right contends those measures are inflationary and will weaken and destabilize France.

CONFERENCE DELEGATES AGREE ON AID VOLUME

NC132109 Paris AFP in English 2046 GMT 13 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 13 Sep (AFP)--Delegates to the current Paris conference of rich and poor countries reached agreement tonight on all points of the final resolution, including the volume of aid to be granted to the poorest nations.

"Everybody is happy," said conference chairman Jean-Pierre Cot upon leaving the final negotiating session of the United Nations-sponsored parley on the world's 31 least developed countries.

French delegation leader Stephane Hessel said that all donor countries are going to commit themselves to a "substantial increase" in their assistance to the 31 poorest nations. Some will double it, while others will boost it to 0.15 of their gross national products, so that government aid in development of the least favored nations will double by 1989. The level of aid to the poorest countries was the last point remaining to be resolved in the two-week conference, which is slated to end tomorrow (Monday).

EGYPT'S GHALI MEETS OFFICIALS, OUTLINES GOALS

[Text] Rome, 16 Sep (ANSA)--Visiting Egyptian Foreign Affairs Minister Butrus Ghali will have talks here today with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo. He will also be received today by Pope John Paul II and will deliver a personal message from Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat to the pontiff.

Ghali arrived in Rome Tuesday afternoon for a work visit. He told waiting newsmen that his talks with Italian leaders would focus on bilateral relations and various international problems. He stressed the historic ties linking the two countries and said that the Egyptian Government was eager to strengthen these already extremely friendly relations with Italy.

Asked about the Egyptian call to the Soviet Government to withdraw its ambassador in Cairo, Butrus Ghali said that this did not mean a break in diplomatic relations between the two nations. He added that at Tuesday's cabinet meeting, the Egyptian minister of the interior had read a report on contacts between several Soviet diplomats in Cairo and elements of the opposition, in violation of Egyptian law.

The Ghali visit is to be seen within the context of traditional cooperation links between the two countries at a diplomatic level. It will afford a chance to discuss key world problems and specifically the situation in the Mediterranean and in Africa. Ghali said that his government is deeply concerned about these latter two areas.

The Egyptian minister will also brief Italian leaders on the latest developments in Mideast peace negotiations and efforts to create the peace force that is to be stationed in the Sinai after the total withdrawal of Israeli troops in 1982. In this context, Butrus Ghali said that Egypt would greatly appreciate support-in-principle on this matter from various European nations, including Italy.

With regard to bilateral relations, Ghali noted that numerous cooperation projects between Italy and Egypt were in the works. In the economic field, Egypt wants to maintain and further develop a relationship of privileged cooperation with Italy, Ghali said.

L'UNITA COMMENTS ON SPADOLINI TALKS ON ECONOMY

AU111555 Rome ANSA in English 1508 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 11 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini's meetings yesterday with the leaders of the big three national trade union confederations and with the chairman of Confindustria, the national manufacturers association, for consultations on government economic policy goals, came up for editorial analysis in the major Italian dailies today.

L'UNITA, the Communist Party paper, reported that, "an alarming picture of prospects for the Italian economy was presented by Spadolini to labor and industry, a picture where there is no comparison, as regards the seriousness of the situation and the pessimism surrounding it, in other Western capitalist countries.

"The first point", the communist paper continued, "pretty well describes the gravity of the situation. At the end of 14 months of recession, it was announced that the decline of demand and productive investments will continue through the end of 1982. "Despite this, the reduction of inflation, a modest rollback according to the forecast, will take it down only to 16 percent. "The grip of inflation--recession will continue to choke the economy at least through the end of 1982", the L'UNITA editorial said.

POPE JOHN PAUL ISSUES ENCYCLICAL ON LABOR RIGHTS

[Text] Vatican City, 15 Sep (ANSA)--Pope John Paul II drew an "inseparable link" between capital and labor and explained how Catholic Church doctrine "diverges" from both capitalism and Marxism in a sweeping social statement released to the press here today in his "Laborem Exercens" encyclical. The letter to Roman Catholic bishops around the world, the third of John Paul II's reign, was largely devoted to workers' solidarity and union organizing and strike rights, issues which have caused an upheaval in his native Poland.

The encyclical, divided into five chapters, was written to commemorate the 90th anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum", the church's first formal social statement. "Laborem Exercens" (Through Work), which upholds workers' rights to organize unions, to strike, to earn adequate wages, to receive health care, vacations and employment, was viewed by Vatican observers as a statement of church support for the free trade union movement (Solidarity) in Poland although the East European state was never specifically mentioned in the 24,000-word document. It completes a trilogy of John Paul's thinking about the mystery of God, man's redemption and the social problems of day-to-day living, coming after his "Redemptor Hominis" encyclical of March 4, 1979 and "Dives in Misericordia", issued November 30, 1980.

Taking off from the concept of work handed down from the bible, the pope indicated that modern-day political and economic pressures stemming from automation, the energy crisis, pollution and the emergency of the Third World required "a re-ordering and adjustment of the structures of the modern economy and of the distribution of work". In light of modern working conditions, he said, "Christian teachings about work" necessarily stands in opposition to "the various currents of materialist and economics-minded thinking."

The church considers it her task always to call attention to the dignity and rights of those who work, to condemn situations in which that dignity and those rights are violated, and ... to ensure authentic progress by man and society," he stressed. The interaction between the man who works, the tools of his labor and production means, John Paul asserted, has given rise to different forms of capitalism and Marxist collectivism, both of which the church rejects.

The church's own doctrine of private property "diverges radically" from Marxist collectivism as it diverges from "rigid" capitalism, since the church does not consider the right to private property to be "absolute and untouchable. The error of early capitalism can be repeated wherever man is in a way treated on the same level as the whole complex of the material means of production, as an instrument and not in accordance with the true dignity of his work."

Christian tradition, the pope insisted, "has always understood (the right to ownership and property) within the broader context of the right common to all to use the goods of the whole of creation." To stress this concept, the encyclical [word indistinct] the statement, "the right to private property is subordinated to the right to common use, to the fact that goods are meant for everyone."

Yet the Polish-born pope rejected the notion that "the elimination of private ownership of the means of production" offered the solution. Marxist systems, he said, which tried to solve the conflict between labor and capital by eliminating private ownership, only shifted power and control from one group to another. "The mere passage of production means to state "ownership," he went on, was by no means equivalent to "the socialization of the property". On the contrary, the pope charged, the system [word indistinct] up offending "the fundamental rights of the human being."

"Capital cannot be separated from labor, in no way can labor be opposed to capital or capital to labor, and still less can the actual people behind these concepts be opposed to each other," he wrote, advocating worker participation, a formula he called "associating labor with the ownership of capital." Much of the papal missive was devoted to workers solidarity and workers' rights, which the pope asserted were still being subjected to "flagrant injustices" by "ideology and power systems" in some parts of the world.

Upholding trade unions as "indeed a mouthpiece for the struggle for social justice, for the just rights of the working people in accordance with their individual professions," the pope warned that these efforts (to secure the rights of workers) "should always take into account the limitations imposed by the general economic situation of a country. They should show prudent concern for the common good," he said, adding in part: "Unions do not have the character of political parties struggling for power, they should not be subject to the decisions of political parties have too close links [words indistinct]. Furthermore, it must never be forgotten that, when essential community services are in question, they must in every case be ensured, if necessary by means of appropriate legislation..."

The pontiff also stood up for the right-to-strike, saying "workers should be assured the right to strike without being subjected to personal penal sanctions for taking part in a strike." By the same token, however, John Paul warned against abusing the right to strike, saying "It must not be abused especially for political purposes. Abuse of the strike weapon can lead to the paralysis of the whole of socio-economic life, and this is contrary to the requirements of the common good of society," he said.

The encyclical also deplored worldwide economic injustice in an world in which rich countries keep getting richer through their exploitation of the poor. "The re-ordering and adjustment of the structures of the modern economy and of the distribution of work" he called for may "unfortunately... mean unemployment, the need for re-training, for millions of skilled workers." The pontiff indicated that this would probably reduce living standards in the developed countries to the benefit of "millions who today live in conditions of shameful and unworthy poverty." In many developing countries, he complained, "millions of men... are forced to cultivate other peoples' land and are exploited by large land-owners, without any hope of seeing the day when they may own even a tiny piece of land."

The pope devoted a portion of the encyclical to women, whose primary role, he insisted, was caring for the family. Yet women who dedicated themselves to a family should not suffer discrimination "from jobs for which they are capable", he said. "The true advancement of women requires that labor should be structured in such a way that women do not have to pay for their advancement by abandoning what is specific to them and at the expense of the family, in which women as mothers have an irreplaceable role."

The encyclical, which the pope proof-read while recovering from an assassination attempt in May, commemorates Pope Leo XIII's break which the church's historical silence on social issues. Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum", which dealt with the social upheavals of the industrial revolution, caused a sensation when it was issued on May 15, 1891.

Once the precedent was set, other popes came out with major pastoral letters, the most famous of which include Pope Pius XI's "Quadragesimo Anno" in 1931, a [words indistinct] Pope John XXIII's "Mate et Magistra" (1961) and "Pacem in Terris" (1963) and Pope Paul VI's "Populorum Progressio" (1967).

John Paul II's analysis of Marxist "collectivism" in "Laborem Exercens", observers pointed out today, stemmed from his own experiences in his native Poland, just as his condemnation of peasant exploitation in the Third World probably shows how much he was struck by the poverty he saw during his travels in the Third World.

CDS' FREITAS DO AMARAL ON POLITICAL ISSUES

PM140831 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 28 Aug 81 pp 13-14

[Simoes Ilharco interview with Social Democratic Center Party (CDS) Chairman Diogo Freitas do Amaral; date and place not given]

[Text] "I was never a rightwinger," Freitas do Amaral told us when asked whether his entry into the new Balsemao cabinet will not give the government a more rightwing character. Denying that there is a strengthening of the Democratic Alliance's conservative component with his entry into the government--"it was the Social Democratic component itself which invited me"--the CDS chairman and future deputy premier went further, however, and asserted categorically with respect to Christian Democracy: "As is known, it is not a conservative but a deeply reformist and even, in some instances--such as in present-day Latin America--an essentially revolutionary ideology." But the interview was not confined to the political sector in which Freitas do Amaral is located. It broached other urgent issues, and the CDS chairman, also refuting the inference that his entry into the government would rekindle the Democratic Alliance's guerrilla warfare with Eanes, stressed in this connection: "The president of the republic should respect the 5 October election, just as the Democratic Alliance should also respect that of 7 December." It was a polemical interview, as will be seen.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: There are those who say that you will be entering the government reluctantly and that you are only doing so because, following the evolution of the political situation, you were left no other alternative....

Freitas do Amaral: I am not entering it reluctantly; I am entering it voluntarily, and now that almost 8 days have elapsed since my decision, I do not regret it. I belive that I made the most correct decision, and accordingly the other alternatives were worse. But the Social Democratic party [PSD] and Popular Monarchist Party [PPM] leaders explicitly told me that my refusal to take part in the government, followed by possible election as speaker of the Assembly of the Republic, would also be perfectly acceptable.

However, I believe that at this moment my entry into the government, while not being the only way, is the best way to defend the Democratic Alliance.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In the opinion of certain observers your inclusion in the government would rekindle the guerrilla warfare between the Democratic Alliance and Eanes. Is this inference justified?

Freitas do Amaral: I believe that it is unjustified. The Democratic Alliance's strategy with respect to the president of the republic, following his reelection, was laid down at a summit meeting held in December 1980; it is that strategy which is being followed and must continue to be followed.

In short, it is as follows: The results of the 7 December election should be respected by the Democratic Alliance, but those of the 5 October election should be respected by the president of the republic. Among the state bodies--and specifically between the government and the president of the republic--there should be institutional cooperation. If General Eanes pursues a personal political blueprint, that conduct should be denounced, just as any encroachment on the Assembly of the Republic's or the government's own spheres of jurisdiction should be criticized. I still regard this strategy as correct. I have already said this, and I repeat: I have never advocated, nor do I advocate, any institutional warfare.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: The presence of the three Democratic Alliance leaders in the government, instead of constituting a unifying factor, could create internal conflicts, causing a clash of responsibilities. Now do you intend to avoid these possible conflicts?

Freitas do Amaral: It is curious that when two of the Democratic Alliance leaders are outside the government, the criticism arises that things are not working in this way; if the three of them are in the government, then there is speculation that they will not agree....

I believe that this presence will in fact be a unifying factor, partly because it makes possible tripartite meetings far more frequently. As for possible conflicts of responsibilities, I do not see why they should arise; there will be only one prime minister; the other two leaders will head one or more clearly defined departments, although they certainly may be involved by the prime minister in the government's overall policy. The plan already worked in 1980, albeit only with two, and proved its efficiency.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Are your relations with Pinto Balsemao really cordial, so as to make possible the government's proper functioning? It should be noted that in the opinion of some observers, you will find it difficult to resist the temptation to become the "strong man" of the government....

Freitas do Amaral: My relations with Dr Francisco Balsemao are excellent and are far from being recent. I am certain that our cooperation will be excellent. As for the speculation contained in the final part of the question, I know that it is already being created by the opposition and will probably continue to be created. It is a traditional technique employed by oppositions with respect to coalition governments. We should not be impressed by these arguments. As far as I am concerned, I am acting in good faith and am not entering the government with ulterior motives. I believe that the Democratic Alliance is sufficiently strong and solid to defeat successfully these and other attacks which will certainly be launched against it by those who have never done as much as or better than ourselves.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Will not your greater involvement in the Democratic Alliance through your participation in the government give the latter a rightwing character, with the Democratic Alliance's conservative component being accentuated to the detriment of the Social Democratic component?

Freitas do Amaral: I do not see how my entry into the government could help weaken the Socialist Democratic component, which explicitly desired my entry. And why should I give this government a rightwing character, when I was never a rightwinger but a centrist? As is known, Christian Democracy is not a conservative but a deeply reformist and even, in some instances--such as in present-day Latin America--an essentially revolutionary ideology.

The CDS, which the Socialists regarded as genuinely centrist at the time of the Socialist Party [PS]/CDS government, has not changed its nature merely through allying itself with the PSD and the PPM.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Will the fact that you are entering the government affect your availability in the European Christian Democratic Union [UEDC]? Moreover, in entering the government you thus cease to constitute a "reserve of the Democratic Alliance." What comments do you have to make?

Freitas do Amaral: For my part I do not regard my participation in the government as incompatible with the UEDC chairmanship, and the prime minister-designate expressed the same opinion when I raised the issue with him. It remains to be seen whether the UEDC will prefer to opt for a more operational chairman than I will be able to be, being in the government; my post as chairman is, of course, at the UEDC's disposal.

As for the "reserve of the Democratic Alliance," it is well known that it was not for that reason or with that intention that I did not enter the government in January--rather, it was out of consistency with previous statements. Far less could I now remain in reserve when the crisis which we are experiencing could endanger the Democratic Alliance's very survival. We are in a stage of general mobilization, and in such a stage the reserves are not increased. On the contrary, the reservists are called up.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Was not your farewell praise of Dr Balsemao, which made a bad impression in the PSD, rather hasty, all the more so since the return of the Social Democrats' chairman has occurred?

Freitas do Amaral: My praise of Dr Balsemao was sincere and based on the conviction that he had seriously resigned. To believe that the praise was hasty merely because he later returned is to accept implicitly that the prime minister was only making a personal tactical move. That was not my interpretation.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: What stance would you adopt if the PSD "critics" resumed hostilities against Pinto Balsemao while you were in the government?

Freitas do Amaral: I believe that circumstances are very different today and that history does not repeat itself. However, I have no hesitation in responding to your hypothesis: If it were a matter of criticisms of Dr Balsemao as head of a government with my participation, I would support the prime minister; if it were a matter of criticisms of the PSD chairman, I would perform my duty of remaining neutral, because I belong to another party. After all, this is what the CDS ministers in the seventh constitutional government did--and did very well.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you agree with Eurico de Melo's assertion that the previous government was a transitional and unmemorable government?

Freitas do Amaral: It is obvious that all governments are transitional--between those which precede them and those which follow them. I sincerely believe that in Mr Eurico de Melo's recent assertions there is a far more important aspect, which is that of public support for the eighth constitutional government. As for the seventh government, it had my support and that of my party, and so it is not for me to specify positive and negative aspects, which always exist in any government.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You are accused of venerating Sa Carneiro's memory excessively, thereby seeking to present yourself as the former PSD leader's real heir. Do you not believe that an excessive nostalgia for Sa Carneiro could be fatal for the Democratic Alliance, insofar as the latter would be purely and simply Sa Carneiro?

Freitas do Amaral: I am not seeking to be anybody's heir but I deem it perfectly normal--and necessary--to venerate the memory of Dr Sa Carneiro, who was the Democratic Alliance's first leader and proved to be a great statesman and a great Portuguese. Woe be the peoples who do not cherish the memory of their ancestors, their leaders and their saints and heroes!

So I believe that praising Dr Sa Carneiro, continuing his work and following his example are not manifestations of nostalgia but acts of justice--and of intelligence. It is not a matter of claiming exclusive ownership of a heritage but of performing the duties stemming for us all from a political legacy which we must not allow to perish.

Of course, while not being able to be merely the memory of Sa Carneiro, the Democratic Alliance could not be forgetting of Sa Carneiro, either. I believe that we are all in agreement on this.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In what way, in your opinion, could the revision of the construction proceed as rapidly as possible?

Freitas do Amaral: The revision of the constitution has proceeded with excessive slowness, and a great effort must be made to accelerate the process considerably.

It is not difficult to imagine a set of measures to make it possible to move more swiftly; a great number of meetings and longer duration of them, more assiduous attendance by deputies, more direct involvement of the party leaders in the process, the laying down by agreement of a precise timetable and so forth....

It remains to be seen whether or not there is the political will to act to that end. On the part of the Democratic Alliance--and, in particular, on the part of the CDS--I can assure you that there is. The next move is for the Republican and Socialist front--and, in particular, the PS.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you intend to run in the 1985 presidential election, presenting yourself to the electorate as the Democratic Alliance's candidate, in competition, for instance, with Mario Soares?

Freitas do Amaral: I categorically refuse to speculate in 1981 about what I will or will not be doing in 1985.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you believe that this government will last until 1984?

Freitas do Amaral: I have no gift of prophecy, but I can assure you of three things: first, that that is our aim; second, that it would be very bad for the Democratic Alliance, for democracy and for the country if that were not the case; third, for my part, I will do my utmost to make it so.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: In conclusion, I would like to broach the issue of the local elections. Do you believe that the parties should run separately, or do you advocate joint Democratic Alliance lists in all the local authorities?

Freitas do Amaral: I believe--and this is also the CDS stance--that the Democratic Alliance should run on joint lists in all the local authorities. But we are prepared to discuss possible exceptions to the general rule if the PSD or the PPM raise them. As you know, Dr Francisco Balsemao proposed to the PSD National Council in June that an agreement be concluded among the three Democratic Alliance parties--the so-called "protocol" for the local elections--which would embody that general rule and the possible exceptions to it. This proposal was approved by the PSD and subsequently also by the CDS and the PPM.

So at the level of principles, the basic idea has been agreed. It is now necessary to put it in writing. I believe for several reasons that it is the PSD which should submit the draft protocol for the local elections to its Democratic Alliance partners. In my opinion, it would be desirable for this document to be ready for signing by the end of the year; January 1982 is not too early to begin to implement an agreement with a view to elections which will probably be held in December, so that the lists will certainly have to be ready in September 1982.

However, that is not the most important thing: It is that the Democratic Alliance should regain self-confidence and demonstrate that it is capable of remaining united, governing efficiently and resolving--both at the national and at the local level--the Portuguese people's major problems; education, health, housing, the economic crisis, improving the living conditions of the most underprivileged, regionalization, the revision of the constitution and entry into the European Community.

I am certain that will be the case. And if that is the case, victory will be ours, not only in the 1982 local elections but also in the 1984 legislative elections and in the 1985 presidential election.

DEFENSE SECRETARY DISCUSSES UK-EGYPTIAN RELATIONS

JN142257 Cairo MENA in Arabic 2155 GMT 14 Sep 81

[Text] London, 14 Sep (MENA)--British Secretary of State for Defense John Nott reiterated his country's support for President as-Sadat's foreign political objectives. He said that Egypt and Britain enjoy a common objective: to find a solution for the Middle East problem.

In this regard, he expressed the confidence of the British Government in the important role played by Egypt in the area's security. Therefore, he advocated an exchange of viewpoints with the Egyptian Government on defensive and security issues during his visit to Egypt.

In an exclusive statement to the MENA correspondent in London, the British secretary of state for defense praised British-Egyptian relations, asserting that his visit to Egypt, which begins the day after tomorrow, is part of the continued dialogue that aims at improving political and trade relations between the two countries.

Nott expressed the hope that viewpoints will be exchanged during his talks with Egyptian Defense Minister Lt Gen 'Abd al-Halim Abu Ghazalah and Egyptian officials on the threats facing the area and the best means to confront these threats.

He added that the visit is an opportunity to describe the recent changes that were introduced to the British defense program and to discuss ways to improve and expand cooperation between Egypt and Britain in defense.

Asked about his assessment of military cooperation between Egypt and Britain, Nott said: We enjoy fruitful, warm and useful relations benefiting the two sides. We are pleased to give advice and assistance to Egypt in various fields. A number of Egyptian students currently study in Britain. We also seize every possible opportunity to send members of our armed forces to Egypt. Currently, officers of the Egyptian National Defense College are in the United Kingdom. Also, a group from the Royal College for Defense Studies currently is visiting Egypt.

He added: Our defense industries also are cooperating in manufacturing defensive equipment for Egypt and I am very hopeful that these contacts will continue.

Asked about possibilities of expanding military cooperation between Egypt and Britain, Nott asserted that there is a constant recommendation for setting up joint projects between the two countries in the military fields as a means to bolster cooperation between them. In this regard, he indicated that he would discuss with Lt Gen Abu Ghazalah a number of joint projects for the production of equipment.

Nott expressed pleasure at President Anwar as-Sadat's visit to Britain last month. He praised the president's stand in welcoming the European initiative concerning the Middle East.

As for the expected visit to Egypt of Viscount Trenchard, British minister of state for defense procurement, John Nott said that Trenchard has not fixed a date for the visit, but he has accepted an invitation by Maj Gen Jamal as-Sayyid, minister of state for war production, to visit Egypt to resume their dialogue and to discuss cooperation between the two countries in war production and other detailed matters pertaining to equipment.

DAILY TELEGRAPH SEES 'STRENGTHENING' OF CABINET

PM151447 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 15 Sep 81 p 16

[Editorial: "On Balance, Stronger"]

[Text] The first test of a prime minister's decision to refurbish a cabinet in mid-term on the scale just undertaken is not whether it fulfills predictions, nor even how it deals with so-called "wets", but whether, when the dust settles, the administration is left stronger or weaker than it was. That test is particularly difficult to apply to a strong personality like Mrs Thatcher, who makes no secret of preferring to have about her senior ministers willing to work with her towards agreed objectives. There is nothing necessarily wrong with that. Winston Churchill liked to have closest to him those whom he trusted most. He sometimes had trouble in remembering the names of the others. Attlee, by contrast, usually preferred competence to harmony, occasionally to his cost.

The timing of this cabinet reconstruction--and its outcome--suggests that the prime minister was not played a totally lone hand. Her instinct may have said one thing; senior colleagues, among them possibly Mr Whitlaw, may here and there have advised something different.

Her own will, it will be said, has clearly prevailed in respect to Mr Prior. Subject to one condition, membership of a key cabinet committee, and contrary to gossip which he has unwisely fed and encouraged, Mr Prior has taken the Ulster portfolio. The prime minister's authority, no less, depended on it. But it will be a pity if in Northern Ireland or elsewhere the conclusion is drawn that the province is getting for its secretary of state a disgruntled and indifferent minister. Mr Prior is an experienced and resolute administrator, stronger on his feet in a gale than most. He is by nature obdurate, which is sometimes an asset and sometimes a fault, but it can only be good news for Northern Ireland. He takes with him, for good measure, the Earl of Gowrie from employment and Mr Nicholas Scott never notorious as a Tory "dry".

His successor on the bed of thorns at employment, Norman Tebbit, has been widely remarked as a rising star. Like Mr Prior he can think on his feet. Added to that he has a sense of humour, the likely impact of which on both the department of employment and trade union leaders excites the imagination. There is no weakening of the administration there. The same can be said of Mr Lawson's promotion to the department of energy. He has been a marked success in a grey treasury role and is said to be eager for a bigger challenge. To judge from last week's presentation to cabinet by the department of energy over the gas pipeline, it awaits him now.

Mr Cecil Parkinson was not among the long list of those advertised to succeed Lord Thorneycroft as chairman of the party; but it is an excellent choice. He is of independent mind. He embodies the spirit of the prime minister's mission, but is in no danger of becoming her poodle. He will join the cabinet, which Lord Thorneycroft did not. He now faces the long-overdue task of bringing the party closer to the government and charging it with more constructive duties than fund-raising. He has his work cut out.

Lord Soames has never cut an altogether happy figure in an administrative post requiring not so much an ample presence as unremitting attention to detail. Mr Pym will bring different qualities to the job and will enjoy it more.

By the same token, Sir Keith Joseph was happier as secretary of state for social services than he has been at industry. His translation to education may rekindle his zest for office. For ministers to enjoy what they are doing is no bar to administrative success. The rest of the appointments are mainly consequential, but they are not simply bargaining counters.

It will of course be largely in terms of bargaining counters that this reconstruction will be superficially assessed and judged. Have tadpoles or tapers won the day? The only departure worth discussing in those terms is that of Sir Ian Gilmour, and it is not very much to go on. Sir Ian, as his past writing has proclaimed, would be the natural critic of almost any administration in which he happened to be or not to be. That is the turn of his excellent mind. The times are out of joint for such men in this particular administration.

It should be observed that the three most influential posts in the cabinet after the prime minister, at the treasury, the foreign office and the home office, remain unchanged. Lord Hailsham, older than them all, remains on the woolsack. After some huffing and puffing Mr Prior, a strong man in any government, stays in.

An independent judge, precluded like a hung jury from reading newspapers for, say, the past six months and so ignorant of the tittle-tattle, would almost certainly account the regime re-shaped this morning as stronger than the one Mrs Thatcher started with in 1979. That is the only judgment worth weighing.

COMMENT ON TURKISH REACTION TO GREEK PROPOSALS

NC130723 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 13 Sep 81 p 7

[From the Comments column: "The Turkish Reaction"]

[Text] The importance of the current phase of the Cyprus problem can be seen from the orchestrated attack of the Turkish Cypriot press against the additional proposals which the Greek Cypriot side submitted at the negotiations table last Wednesday. This attack is obviously directed by the official Turkish side and aims at acquainting the Turkish Cypriot community with it, before Mr Onan at the talks repeats the views as characteristically put forward through the Turkish Cypriot papers.

From the Turkish Cypriot press attack it is obvious that the Turkish side aims at closing the door to the dialogue by rejecting our proposals, thus furnishing proof of the absence of good will on its part and of its intransigent attitude toward the efforts for a solution to the problem. This Turkish intention became almost certain a few days ago, when it was announced that Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas and an "interparty" parliamentary delegation of the pseudostate would proceed to New York in the next few days in order to support the Turkish positions. This was announced while the Greek Cypriot side was on the verge of submitting its further views for the solution of the Cyprus problem.

We are certain that world public opinion and the foreign governments will make a sound and realistic appraisal as to which side would be responsible in the event of interruption of the talks.

SPOKESMAN REJECTS ALL-PARTY GOVERNMENT SUGGESTION

NC160735 Nicosia O ACON in Greek 16 Sep 81

[Text] In reply to a question related to the AKEL general secretary's statement on the formation of a representative political government, or at least a government approved by the parties which will agree on a program, the government spokesman said that the government's views on this issue are contained in a statement made by the government spokesman on 31 August 1981.

The relevant statement was: "The president of the republic has repeatedly made statements on this issue. If the president of the republic objectively deems that such a government will serve national interests he will not hesitate to form one, but he cannot underestimate the substantive difficulties that may arise and which in the final analysis may possibly result in such a government becoming a government of division, not of unity. For this reason, the unforgettable Ethnarch Makarios instituted--instead of an interparty government--the National Council, an institution which still exists and to this date functions in an especially useful way."

In reply to another question, the spokesman said that he does not know of AKEL having made any conditions to President Kiprianou.

DELEGATION FROM NORTH ARRIVES IN ANKARA FOR TALKS

TA152059 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 15 Sep 81

[Text] A delegation led by TFSC Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay arrived in Ankara this evening for official talks. Cagatay was received at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by State and Deputy Prime Minister and Cyprus Coordination Council President Zeyyat Baykara. In a statement upon arrival at the airport, Cagatay expressed the hope that the work on the strengthening of the TFSC economy will be concluded during the talks in Ankara. He said that the further strengthening of the Federated State would be possible through Turkey's aid. Replying to reporters' questions, Cagatay said that the Turkish Cypriot side will continue its goodwilled efforts and that the Greek Cypriot side must adopt a more positive attitude toward the Turkish Cypriot proposals.

In his statement, Baykara said that efforts are being exerted to ensure the further strengthening of the TFSC economy and the improvement of the Turkish Cypriots' standard of living. Baykara added that Turkey will continue to support the TFSC in all fields. Cagatay will meet with Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, Baykara and state and acting Foreign Minister Ilhan Oztrak tomorrow. The talks will continue on Thursday between the delegations. The financial and economic measures to be taken for the development of the TFSC economy will be discussed during the meetings.

LISSARIDHIS ADDRESSES CADRES' CONFERENCE 12 SEP

NC160650 Nicosia O ANEXARTITOS in Greek 14 Sep 81 pp 1, 10

["Extended summary" of EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis' 12 September speech at the party's pan-Cypriot organizational conference of cadres in Nicosia]

[Excerpts] Dr Lissaridhis, referring to current Cyprus developments, said:

1) In essence, the Turkish proposals constitute a demand to accept two separate states and equal sovereignty.

2) Turkey and Denktas have admitted that the proposals did not come from the Turkish Cypriot community, but from the dictatorial Turkish Government.

3) This was preceded by an intensive propaganda campaign--the time is ripe for Turkey to submit proposals for a viable solution of the Cyprus issue. This propaganda campaign was helped by statements made by both the representatives of the Greek and the Cyprus Governments.

4) The Turkish proposals are not aimed at a solution, but at the fraudulent existence of a dialogue without content, at deinternationalization and disorientation of the Cyprus issue from its correct basis. This basis has to do with occupation and the trampling of human rights.

5) The previous constitutional proposals submitted by Turkey led to a deadlock because of their commonly accepted intransigence, but the new ones are even worse. The addition of territorial proposals completes the insult because the proposals return only a very small percentage of the occupied territories. Nevertheless--despite their general rejection--this time the proposals have been accepted by majority as a basis for a dialogue. This shows the time is not ripe for Turkey; it is ripe for Cypriot leading circles who now accept a course which they earlier unanimously rejected. Agreeing to continue dialogue while the human rights of our people are being trampled upon is a faulty tactic.

6) Even more faulty is the view for further concessions by our side. This not only continuously moves the time limits for starting the dialogue but it also creates the justifiable impression that the stalemate to date is due to our delay in submitting new proposals.

This tactic now gives Turkey reason to reject our proposals and to try to transfer responsibility for the deadlock, even to create confusion about who is the criminal and who is the victim.

7) A possible submission of new territorial proposals will make us responsible for drawing up new maps and, even worse, will change the Cyprus issue into one of settling petty border disputes between the two states; no matter how much, in theory, we declare that the entire issue is for a total solution.

8) Much valuable time was lost in preparation for our return to the internationalization of the issue and for our abandonment of the policy of fisticuffs. If we do go to the United Nations at the last moment with a quasi-existing dialogue in progress, the natural advice would be to continue the dialogue. In this way, those who support the continuation of dialogue even without content will be "vindicated." In essence, this would mean deceiving the people. Now is the time to internationalize the issue and to send delegations to the greatest number of countries possible to clearly explain the two "bases" that we propose for a solution of the Cyprus issue.

9) Even the explanations and facts in the new documents submitted at the talks constitute new concessions at a time when Turkey has proven to be completely intransigent. Had the proposals been substantially rejected because they clash with international principles, the UN resolutions and what was agreed, then the proper impressions would have been created.

10) The following are necessary:
Immediate initiation of an enlightenment campaign.
Recourse to the United Nations.
Categorical rejection of the humiliating Turkish proposals.
A clear stand that there is no room for further concessions by us.
A demand for substantive pressure upon Turkey to comply with the UN resolutions which Turkey also endorsed.
A reminder that the Cyprus issue is not a simple domestic issue but one of liberation from occupation, that concerns all peoples.
Correct foreign policy and not the "prudent" compliance with instructions from circles involved in the conspiracy against Cyprus.
Creation of the proper domestic climate for a popular unity which will rely on a prudent struggle to secure a solution that would allow the viability of Cypriot Hellenism, for a Cyprus substantively independent and integral.

Within these conditions, the duties of the EDEK members are very serious. It is our duty to remain the vanguard of the struggle to foil the conspiratorial plans, to stop the course of compliance toward Turkey's demands, to enlighten the world progressive forces, but particularly to enlighten and mobilize the proud and betrayed Cypriot people who are not prepared to take the path to mass exile and permanently renounce their fatherland and existence.

Situation in the Region

1) Israel's aggressiveness is intensified after the increased aid granted by Reagan's administration.

2) The Camp David agreement is recognized as a failure, even by many forces that supported it initially.

3) The effort to isolate the Palestinian movement is condemned because of its nature and geographic dispersal because of its ability to directly strike at the interests which the postcolonial international establishment has been trying to protect.

4) The dictatorial regime in Turkey is being consolidated with the direct support of the United States and many European countries. Unfortunately, the Greek and Cypriot Governments' stand helps this consolidation by projecting the untenable excuse and allegation that this government can possibly give a fair solution to the Cyprus problem.

5) In Greece, the progressive forces become stronger. PASOK's possible ascent to power will create new conditions for the whole region, particularly in Cyprus.

EDA TO SUPPORT PASOK IN NATIONAL ELECTIONS

NC152000 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 15 Sep 81 p 7

[Text] The EDA [United Democratic Left] Administrative Council, which met over the weekend, approved a resolution stating that the primary and direct strategic goal in the 18 October elections is the removal of the rightwing from the government. The resolution adds: "Under the present conditions and because of the deceitful election system, the political force which has the possibility to beat the rightwing in the elections and to remove it from the government is PASOK. In the elections the EDA, basing its decision on this indisputable fact, will support PASOK throughout the country." In any case, the resolution concludes: "The EDA election policy in Athens will be dealt with in a separate resolution."

PAPANDREOU GIVES CAMPAIGN SPEECH AT MITILINI

NC151045 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 14 Sep 81 pp 1, 19

[Excerpts] Mitilini, 14 Sep (from special correspondent Yiorgos Votsis)--Speaking last night to newsmen immediately after leaving the platform, from which he addressed the biggest political gathering ever held on the island of Lesvos, Andreas Papandreou said: "We will exceed the results brought about by the Union of the Center in 1964 (that is 53 percent)." Papandreou said: "The current now is much stronger, the passion much greater, and the citizens are more conscious of what they vote for."

In his statement to newsmen, Papandreou strongly attacked the government for the election handouts. He said: "It is unprecedented in our history for a government, a party, to go to the elections struggle with slogans and deeds such as 'Since we are sinking, let also Greece sink forever.' This is more proof of what the rightwing has been in our country."

While on the platform, shortly before, Papandreou--who was interrupted by slogans "You are the prime minister," "The rightwing must abandon power," and "Here and now, Andreas, this is your hour"--launched a personal attack on Yeoryios Rallis, the incredible prime minister of today, as he called him, because of his Thessaloniki speech which was screened on television.

"Mr Rallis cannot possibly take advantage of the Thessaloniki international fair and use slogans which expose the president of the republic and shake the country's regime." Using similar language, Papandreou stressed:

--These days we are experiencing the deification of partisanship. Just one month before losing power, the rightwing government announced the settlement of peasants' debts, apparently forgetting that others would have to implement this measure. These preelection tricks make us recall the era of Kordhonis and Tsoumbes [nicknames for two Greek 19th century statesmen].

--They are trying by means of fireworks to buy off the years of misery to which the rightwing condemned the peasants. But the proud peasants do not forget. They reject the endowment booklets for indigent girls; they reject the preelection gifts of the government of oligarchy and they will prove this on 18 October.

--One slogan is characteristic of today's administration of the country: "Hurry up, hurry up, Greece is being auctioned." The government hopes that in this way New Democracy will be saved. But the rightwing's career in power is terminated. During the 18 October elections the people will definitely pension it off because they are determined to take power into their own hands.

--He declared: "Tonight, people of Lesvos, you send forth a message from one end of our fatherland to the other. Tonight's overwhelming gathering, the greatest ever held in Lesvos, proclaims the irrevocable determination of the people to proceed toward election victory and to lay the foundations of a new Greece. Tonight the people of Lesvos declare the end of the monocracy of the rightwing."

--From this frontier region he addressed a greeting to the country's armed forces. In brotherhood, he declared, the people and the army will defend national independence, territorial integrity and the democratic institutions.

--He compared the policy of subjugation of the rightwing with the genuine, multifaceted foreign policy of PASOK, whose radiance has reached beyond the boundaries of Greece--the Mediterranean, the Balkans and all of Europe and the Arab world. The policy of the rightwing, he said, leads the country toward isolation. We have developed bridges of friendship both toward the East and the West, toward the North and the South. We ask for peace which is a vital prerequisite for democracy, for social progress and for socialism.

He specifically insisted that our country's relations with Turkey, unfortunately, are an exception. These days, he stated, the leader of the Turkish junta, Evren, alleges that Turkey asks nothing from Greece. However, we remind Evren that all Turkish leaderships, from Ecevit to Demirel to Koroturk--all of them without exception--presented claims on the Aegean. We must not forget that they question our continental shelf and that they provocatively violate our airspace.

From the frontier region of Lesvos we declare to the Turkish leaders: We have nothing to share with you. The two peoples could have lived in peace and they could undertake joint struggles in order to overthrow dependence [on foreign powers]. We also declare: Greece claims nothing, but at the same time it will not cede one single handful of its land or of its sea.

We have truly condemned the Greek-Turkish dialogue for two reasons: One--because Cyprus is still suffering under the hordes of Attila and, two--because the content of this dialogue only has to do with what we will have to cede to Turkey by legalizing its claims and encouraging its audacity. We denounce the "gestures of good will" undertaken by the government (the readjustment of Aegean air corridors, abolition of the Limnos terminal area, the Rogers agreement for our return to NATO's military wing which places our airspace in jeopardy etc.) because they are dangerous to our sovereign rights.

In the middle of continuous enthusiasm by the crowd, Papandreou also:--Explained PASOK's program for the frontier regions, stressing that although the rightwing does offer some incentives for their development, these wind up in the pockets of the few. The most basic change to be introduced by PASOK, he said,--in addition to the national investments program with real substructure projects and not pre-election laying foundation stones "like the ones now being carried out by the incredible prime minister,"--will be decentralization which will put an end to the bureaucracy of Athens. We mean that local self-government at all levels (village, municipality, district and region) will take over initiative and responsibility for the country's development. We mean decentralization not only of authority but also of resources. The participation of the people, he underlined, is the key to PASOK's program.

--He referred to the more specific problems of Lesvos, stressing that 58 percent of its population is involved in fishing, agriculture and animal husbandry but that they earn only 25 percent of the local income.

--He analyzed the PASOK positions on the three foundations of democracy and of the people's sovereignty which are: The Parliament, decentralization with enhanced self-government and an independent agrarian and workers trade unionism--free of tutelage--that would serve the working people "and not alien interests as the present General Confederation of Greek Workers is doing which is an extension of the Ministry of Labor."

--He stressed that at last the PASOK government will recognize the national resistance, that it will put an end to the discrimination between nationally-minded and nonnationally-minded people, abolish the one-party system of the rightwing and separate state from party. One of its first measures will also be the introduction of the proportional system, the abolition of the vote of preference, the right of voting at the age of 18, and voting rights to expatriates and seamen.

Stressing that PASOK will give the people what belongs to them--power--he particularly insisted on the measures which PASOK will take for the new generation and for education.

Referring to what Mr Rallis said in Thessaloniki, namely that "now about 30 days prior to the elections, the economic crisis is terminated and everything will go well," Papandreou stressed: We warn Mr Rallis that as soon as we take over government, our first job will be to give an account and tell the people the truth about the plight of our economy because of the rightwing's anti-people policy which has been spasmodic and which lacked planning.

Reiterating that the PASOK government will enjoy the support of socialist France and of the Arab nation, Papandreou stressed that after combating the tax evasion of 150 billion--a scandal talked about in Europe--there will be resources for the PASOK investments program for a 4-year period.

Referring to the election slate for the Europarliament, Papandreou underlined: You must remember that PASOK says no to accession and to special relations with the EC. Our goal is a plebiscite. Until that time, however, we will participate in all processes in order to protect our peoples' interests and we will violate those regulations of the EEC which mean selling out our national interests.

After explaining the strategy of national peoples unity, in the midst of warm cheers, Papandreou concluded:

"At this critical moment the people, the unprivileged Greeks overcome party affiliations of the past and they understand that the battle will be won only under the vanguard of PASOK, with a crushing majority which will permit it to implement the program for change. "The unbelievable and unprecedented meeting today puts the seal on the common belief that on 18 October PASOK will crush the rightwing, the people will take authority into their own hands and all together we will lay the foundations for the great change, for a new Greece."

As you know, we had begun to hold these consultations at the end of March and I had first met with Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Klaauw. This will be the second meeting, and I will meet with Lord Carrington as the president of the EEC Foreign Ministers Council. We will discuss international issues concerning both countries and review Turkey's relations with the EEC. After London, I will go to Brussels, where I will hold a meeting with EEC Commission Vice-President in Charge of External Affairs Haferkamp. I will also go to Luxembourg to meet commission President Gaston Thorn. Particularly our relations with the EEC will be discussed during the meetings with Thorn and Haferkamp.

After Brussels, I leave for New York to attend the 36th session of the UN General Assembly. I will address the General Assembly on 28 September and explain our government's foreign policy and its views on world matters. The UN General Assembly session is also an opportunity to meet many foreign ministers. I will hold meetings with several foreign ministers. Some of my appointments have already been set. I will hold a meeting with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim and present to him a gift on the occasion of the Ataturk centenary. In addition, I will meet with U.S. Secretary of State Haig, Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko, Italian Foreign Minister Colombo and, Pakistani Foreign Minister Agha Shahi. I will meet with FRG Foreign Minister Genscher on the day after I arrive in New York.

As always, I will hold a meeting with Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and review the situation of the relations between the two countries. Naturally, I will have more contacts. There are many opportunities at the United Nations to meet the foreign ministers of other countries. [end recording]

Turkmen Interview

NC151250 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 10 Sep 81 p 8

[Interview granted by Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen to MILLIYET correspondent Nilufer Yalcin in Ankara; date not given]

[Text] Question: How do you evaluate the events of the past year?

Answer: Let us dwell upon the main issue in foreign politics, our relations with the West: Our position in the NATO framework is so clearly defined that there is absolutely no room for indecision. Our relations with the United States in particular have reached an extremely satisfactory and smooth stage.

Question: Has the change of administration in the United States played a role in this?

Answer: It must be admitted that relations had already begun to improve during Carter's term in office. President Reagan is pursuing a policy which lends more weight to NATO and to solidarity within NATO. This has proved effective.

Question: Do you observe the same attitude of approach by the other NATO allies?

Answer: As far as our other NATO allies are concerned, our relations with their governments have followed a normal course. However, from time to time we have encountered criticisms and persistent representations from the parliamentary organs of whom we are members and partners. This is mainly due to their failure to make a correct assessment of the situation in Turkey, because of their tendency to forget the conditions prevailing in our country before 12 September, for ideological reasons and, to a large extent, because of our extremist fellow countrymen who are engaged in anti-Turkey activities in Europe.

Question: To what extent have these activities directly or indirectly influenced the policies of those governments?

Answer: Their aim was to influence the policies of the governments, but so far they have failed to obtain any results from their activities.

Question: Was the Federal German Government's decision to postpone the free delivery of economic and military aid to Turkey the outcome of such activities?

Answer: It is not fair to interpret the temporary results of certain parliamentary tactics in this way. The situation will be clarified in the next few days. We must not forget that apart from the economic stagnation in Europe and the rise in value of the dollar, there have been no significant changes in the quality and quantity of the contributions promised to Turkey within the framework of the OECD.

Question: Do you expect the postponement of German economic and military aid to Turkey to be settled during the current month?

Answer: According to information we have received from the German Government there is no cause for indecision. The process of extending aid will continue.

Question: The question of visa requirements imposed on our fellow countrymen could not be resolved last year. Do you believe that a positive result will be obtained in this matter this year?

Answer: Our efforts for the settlement of the visa issue are continuous. But if I say that this problem will be resolved this year, I would be expressing untimely optimism.

Question: Have there been any manifest changes in our Middle East policy after the 12 September takeover?

Answer: Important changes have occurred in Turkey's Middle East policy in the past year. We have begun to play a more active role in the Islamic Conference. Our contacts and relations with many of the Middle East countries have increased significantly. However, this is only the beginning. We expect these relations to achieve greater dimensions in the future. On the other hand, we have reduced our relations with Israel to a minimum and insignificant level, lending more clarity to our Middle East policy.

Question: Are you of the opinion that it is only Israel's behavior that constitutes a source of danger in the Middle East? Is it only Israel's behavior that threatens the peace?

Answer: Israel has proved on various occasions that it is behaving in an extremely irresponsible manner toward peace in the Middle East.

Question: In what framework do you evaluate the Iranian-Iraqi conflict?

Answer: We deeply deplore this conflict between two Islamic countries and we are exerting great efforts toward terminating it. We are a member of the committee which is trying hard to find a peaceful settlement between the two countries. But, unfortunately, efforts exerted so far have failed to produce a positive result. The activities of this committee have been interrupted because of the situation in Iran.

Question: It has been divulged in the indictments of the prosecutors in the martial law courts that the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) provided Turkish leftist as well as rightist terrorists not only with training but also with arms. What kind of representations has the Turkish Government made and what kind of measures does it propose to take?

Answer: We have contacted the PLO in this respect. They did not deny that prior to the establishment of relations with the PLO in 1978, some Turkish fellow countrymen had been trained in the Palestinian camps. But they maintained that these people were meant to fight against Israel. We have been told that these practices have stopped since 1978. Those Turks now in the camps are old-timers and their number is limited.

On the other hand, as you know, there are some extremist Palestinian organizations too. The PLO's control over them is disputable, to say the least. It is argued that certain incidents are being provoked by these extremist organizations. I do not wish to express a clear-cut opinion on this matter. I am merely communicating to you the information given to us. We are naturally taking every possible step to prevent the infiltration of arms into Turkey. We are taking these measures against everybody.

Question: What important developments have occurred since last year, particularly in East-West relations which, directly or indirectly, affect Turkey? And in what way has Turkey been affected by these developments?

Answer: East-West relations and the balance of power between the two sides are matters that closely concern Turkey. In the absence of disarmament, the balance of power is the only assurance for peace. This is our point of view. We also consider the upsetting of this balance against NATO as of vital importance. From this angle, we welcome the importance which President Reagan attaches to this balance and to NATO's defenses. Meanwhile, the continuation of the dialogue between the two superpowers for the control and limitation of arms is very significant to peace. We hope that this dialogue will continue. We also hope that the talks to be held between U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig and the Soviet Union's Foreign Minister Gromyko in September will constitute the beginning of talks concerning the limitation of nuclear arms in Europe.

Question: Do you think that the Soviet suggestion to freeze [manufacture of] nuclear weapons on both sides is valid from the point of view of balance of power?

Answer: No, it is not. This is not the way to maintain a balance. We support the resolution adopted by NATO in the spring of 1979. For the reestablishment of balance, an end must be put to armaments and the dialogue must be resumed.

Question: How do you find Federal German Chancellor Schmidt's statement concerning the neutron bomb?

Answer: We consider it an extremely realistic statement. The intensive propaganda that is being made about the neutron bomb strongly seeks to hide certain truths. It is no use concentrating all attention on a single weapon. The issue must be taken up from the point of view of establishing a balance between East and West and an extremely effective system of defense for the West.

Question: Recently, certain Greek circles have been maintaining that if the Turkish-Greek relations are to be put on to the right path, a righteous solution should be found to the Cyprus question. They argue that the Cyprus issue is the core of the matter, whereas until recently the Greek side had definitely refrained from including Cyprus on the agenda of bilateral negotiations. What, do you think, is the reason for this change?

Answer: Our policy since 1974 has been based on the contention that the two communities in Cyprus should resolve the issue between themselves. Greece had accepted this too. No parallel was drawn between the settlement of the bilateral Turkish-Greek disputes and the Cyprus issue. Linking the two issues cannot be conducive to the settlement of the outstanding issues.

Question: Has the first written reply given by the Greek Cypriots to the Turkish Cypriot proposals given you any hope that the Cyprus question stands a chance of settlement?

Answer: Time will show. The reply given by the Greek Cypriots is largely rhetoric. It is, however, finally understood that they have agreed to continue negotiations. If they are not prepared to accept the Turkish Cypriot proposals as the basis for negotiations, let them put forward their own proposals. I have disclosed our attitude on this matter. The Turkish Cypriot side has acted with the utmost good will by submitting constructive proposals which constitute a turning point. The Greek Cypriot side would be realistic if they duly evaluated these proposals. At this stage, the bulk of the views they have expressed are mere rhetoric. In reality, it is difficult to find a substantive point in the views they have expressed. These arguments are intended more to gain time than anything else.

Question: What is the aim of their efforts to gain time?

Answer: They have been unable to establish their own positions clearly. That is why they are trying to gain time.

Question: At the meeting you will have with the Greek foreign minister in New York toward the end of September, do you think that the question of airspace rights--which had already taken a positive turn at previous sessions--will be taken up again and at last settle the question of airspace?

Answer: I do not believe that at our New York dialogue there will be any development regarding the airspace issue. I shall be very happy to see that I was mistaken, but this is my impression at the moment.

Question: Finally, how can you sum up your evaluation of the Turkish foreign policy in the past year?

Answer: If one has to put it in a nutshell, one could say that Turkish foreign policy in the past year was "full and satisfactory" to the extent that international and regional conditions permitted.

PAPER COMMENTS ON FAILURE OF TALKS WITH GREECE

NC141048 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 9 Sep 81 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "What Can One Expect?"]

[Excerpts] The Turkish and Greek secretaries general held their ninth round of plenary talks in Athens on Monday. The outcome of these talks was not yet known at press time. However, almost all observers do not expect any tangible results from the talks.

The main reason for the failure of the Turkish-Greek talks to produce any tangible results in any dispute is the distrust both countries harbor for each other as well as the atmosphere of demagogy that prevails in Ankara and Istanbul [as published]. The politicians in both countries have done their best to exploit this atmosphere of distrust to their own advantage.

At present, there is an administration in Ankara that is endeavoring to keep itself outside of and above daily politics. Everyone knows that this administration is in a position to make decisions without being scared of the effect of any demagogic tendencies that the public opinion may adopt. When we look at the situation from this angle, we observe that Ankara no longer displays the kind of demagogy which both Ankara and Athens used to share until recently. The responsibility for such demagogy is now the sole monopoly of the Greek politicians. In fact, today Turkish politics are no longer dominated by people who would dread making any concessions because they might lose votes in subsequent elections or by racists who would act in a conquering spirit. Unfortunately, it is not possible to say the same for Greece. As pointed out by Markezinis, leader of the Progressive Party, Athens has halted progress on disputes with Ankara because of domestic policy considerations.

We hasten to state that the presence of even a few politicians in Greece who would dare to describe this situation with open-mindedness is an extremely inspiring development from the point of view of the relations between the two countries.

Unfortunately, PASOK leader Andreas Papandreou, who stands a great chance of winning the forthcoming elections, has recently resorted again to the classic tactic of accusing the government of making concessions to Turkey. If we bear in mind Papandreou's influence and his shrewdness in acting irresponsibly in the field of demagogy, it is impossible to expect this or that government in Greece to sit at the negotiating table with Turkey with a sincere desire to conduct a dialogue and to implement a determined policy.

Unfortunately, Turkish-Greek relations have not yet taken such a turn, which would be extremely useful to both countries, and as long as politicians like Papandreou dominate Greek political life, there is no hope of attaining such a stage.

ASIAN-AFRICAN INDUSTRY CONFERENCE IN ISTANBUL

[Excerpts] Istanbul, 14 Sep (AA)--Industry ministers or their representatives from 15 developing Asian and African countries met in Istanbul Monday for the Asia-Africa Legal Consultative Committee (AALCC) conference on industrial cooperation. The 37 delegates includes the industry ministers of Kenya, Pakistan, Uganda and Turkey, a minister of state from the Philippines, and the deputy minister of industry from Thailand, as well as the AALCC secretary general, and the heads of the Kuwaiti and Arab funds.

In an opening address, Turkish Industry Minister Sahap Kocatopcu told the conference that unless a more "equitable" new economic order was established between the developing and industrialized countries, the old economic system would have adverse consequences for both groups. He called for constructive and effective cooperation toward reducing the imbalance between the two groups of countries. Solutions should be sought both to structural matters in the world economy as well as to cyclical problems, Kocatopcu believed.

As for priorities and criteria that should be applied to cooperation among developing countries in the joint exploitation of natural resources, joint investment, or technical assistance or technology transfer, the Turkish industry minister listed: increased production of food, increased production and foreign exchange earnings and creation of new jobs. Developing countries in Asia and Africa could cooperate particularly in establishing large-scale industrial plants to manufacture products needed in their own region, he added.

Prime Minister of Turkey Bulent Ulusu said in a message to the conference his government favored an "open and multilateral system of cooperation" in economic relations. The decade of the 1930's [as received] had demonstrated the need for a worldwide system of economic cooperation, he commented.

FOREIGN MINISTRY TO REJECT ISRAELI PROTEST

[Anne Ponger dispatch: "Austrian-Israeli Relations Reach New Low"]

[Excerpt] Jerusalem--Israeli reactions to the remarks by Chancellor Kreisky in an interview with the French magazine NOUVELLE OBSERVATEUR have reached an unprecedented sharpness. The chancellor is charged with publicly calling for acts of terrorism and with expressing understanding for the murder of women and children as long as it happens in Israel. The recall of the Israeli ambassador from Vienna is being considered. The Austrian Foreign Ministry intends to reject Jerusalem's protest as an "attempt to interfere in internal affairs." In Israel, there is talk of a political glacial period.

As a Foreign Ministry spokesman told DIE PRESSE in Vienna, the Austrian charge d'affaires in Tel Aviv, Wilfling, has been instructed to reject the note of protest submitted to him on Sunday by (Yohanan Meroz), deputy director general of the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem.

PSOE COMMUNIQUE ON JUSTICE MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

PM151520 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 2 Sep 81 p 8

[Excerpt] Madrid, 1 Sep--The press bureau of the major opposition party, the Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE), published a communique stating that Fernandez Ordonez' resignation as justice minister is a logical decision in view of the Union of the Democratic Center's [UCD] internal situation and the government's policy. According to the opposition, in general, it can be said that this resignation will lead to a greater rightward shift in government policy. Almost unanimous praise has been expressed for the work done by the former justice minister.

The text of the communique released by the socialist party is: Francisco Fernandez Ordonez' resignation can be regarded as logical, bearing in mind the situation being experienced by the UCD and the policy that has been pursued by the government that it supports. "The rightward shift and lack of clarity in government policy have caused some degree of uncertainty and inconsistency within the cabinet itself, as clearly demonstrated by the justice minister's resignation. Moreover, this resignation highlights the UCD's internal crisis and the ruling party's loss of identity and spirit within which it was formed, having clearly opted for a conservative policy."

BRANDT VIEWS U.S.-EUROPE, SPD, PEACE ISSUES

AU151935 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 15 Sep 81 p 5

[Georg Hoffmann-Ostenhof interview with Willy Brandt, SPD chairman and Socialist International president, in Vienna "last weekend"]

[Text] AZ: Mr Brandt, in view of the economy budget, the FDP has spoken of a trend reversal. Does this "austerity policy" which is in the offing actually constitute a trend reversal in Germany, a turn toward the SPD's economic policy?

Brandt: As I see it, the turn is not one concerning our attitude but one caused by the need with which we are confronted, the need to reduce the net credit volume and, if we are lucky, to create by our budget policy the prerequisites for ending the policy of high interest rates which produces a paralyzing effect. The discussion about which role the administration can and should play to promote measures to stimulate business and employment is not yet concluded. I myself have declared for the record that we reserve for ourselves the right to take up this issue again in the coming months.

AZ: Budget cuts even for social expenditures--that certainly means a reduction of the effective demand. Won't that exacerbate the recession already existing in the FRG and lead to still higher unemployment?

Brandt: It might look like that and it would then be highly regrettable. But it is necessary to clearly see the magnitudes involved. It isn't as if we were cutting the budget in real terms. The budget will increase by 5 percent. In other words, it will be slightly below the inflation rate. But what matters is what role is to be played by the factors I have just mentioned, namely, the high interest rates. What matters is whether the assumption is correct--we will soon see--that a more cautious policy of public expenditures will enable the Federal Bank to lower the interest rates. That would have a strong stimulating effect. And, second, will we succeed through such a policy in making the D mark "prone to revaluation," which might also favorably affect the balance of payments?

AZ: The question of high interest rates actually also involves foreign policy. The high interest rates are certainly, above all, caused by Reagan's financial policy.

Brandt: ...Yes, unfortunately....

AZ: What can be done about this, politically? Is it possible to exert influence on U.S. economic policy?

Brandt: I have the impression that in the United States criticism of the new President's economic and financial policy is increasing. And I do not give up hope that a distinct exertion of influence by the Europeans on the people in Washington could shorten the period from now to the adoption of a--in my opinion--more reasonable interest policy. And I will not give up the idea that, if there is no other alternative, the Europeans would also have to disengage themselves somewhat from the dominance of the Americans.

AZ: During the budget negotiations, it seemed as if the government coalition was about to break apart. How stable or unstable is the social-liberal coalition?

Brandt: I told my political friends quite frankly last weekend that I cannot guarantee the maintenance of the coalition until 1984. But the chances for its getting together again are now better than they were 2 weeks ago. They are better primarily because the big CDU-CSU has put such an unconvincing alternative program on the table.

AZ: The current peace movement largely has developed outside the SPD. Isn't that sad for the Social Democratic movement which indeed has a long peace tradition?

Brandt: Yes, that is certainly something which forces one to do some thinking. However, the biggest initiative at present is that which has emanated from the German Trade Union Federation. And only at the end of August, a dialogue started in Bonn which we regard as an example. Discussions were held between leading Social Democrats and representatives of those who call themselves the peace movement, who--I am not holding that against them--come from widely different political camps, some of whom also hold different views on elements of our foreign and security policy, but all of whom in consensus represent the great worry that increasingly prevails in Germany, especially among the young people.

It has never before happened in world history that so many means of destruction were deployed in so limited an area as that of divided Germany and things may even get worse. This situation has caused additional fears. I am of an age where I can say: I have seen worse things on German soil than young people demonstrating for peace and disarmament. If they are doing it one-sidedly, in an exaggerated manner, or if some of them are blind in one eye, then that is something that has to be discussed.

AZ: But surely the matter is dramatic in a way. Isn't the peace movement crystalizing around the question of the complementary armament decision, which is supported by the government but which is meanwhile opposed even by people in the highest party bodies?

Brandt: Well, the next SPD party congress will be held in April next year in Munich. The negotiations between the two nuclear world powers have considerable difficulty in getting started. Some people doubt whether the forthcoming Haig-Gromyko meeting will ever materilize. My own assessment is that there will be negotiations. I don't know what their outcome will be. But if negotiations get underway, the Munich SPD party congress will fall in a period where the great majority of German Social Democrats will concentrate on formulating their expectations.

The difficulty could conceivably come a year later, in 1983, if the negotiations are fruitless and then the question arises: What should be done? Should one, in light of one's assessment of the negotiations, stick to what results from the NATO decision (deployment of the new nuclear missiles on FRG territory) or will it be felt at that point that it is necessary to draw new conclusions?

AZ: There has been much talk about European anti-Americanism. What is your opinion?

Brandt: I regard that as foolish. Look, there are people in the United States, let us take for example Paul Warnecke, the disarmament delegate who negotiated SALT II for the previous administration. He adopts a critical position toward the current administration. But no one would seriously say that this was anti-American. This one example alone shows how foolish all that talk about anti-Americanism is. And thus I would say: Most of those--not all of them--but many of those who in my country are worried about certain tones coming from Washington feel friendship toward the American people, but it does not follow for them that they have to cheer everything that comes from Washington.

AZ: It is not a paradoxical situation that a people--such as the Germans in the FRG--which certainly has a long-standing tradition as far as fear of the Russians is concerned, now, as has been said on one occasion, feel "more fear of the alliance partner than of the traditional enemy, the Soviet Union?"

Brandt: It may occasionally look like that at present, but it is not actually true. No, even if it looks like that sometimes, the people haunted by anxiety in the FRG have something against the intensified armament of the world powers and in this manner want to bring about negotiations on arms limitation. They do not contest the striving for an equilibrium--but an equilibrium at a lower level.

AZ: But the discussion in the FRG frequently focuses on the fundamental assessment of the Soviet Union: expansionism for fear of encirclement; does a military equilibrium exist or does it not exist and so forth....

Brandt: I believe that the element of fear of encirclement, which you have mentioned, does play a certain role, but other factors enter into it as well. Russian tradition did not die when Russia got a new political system in 1917. Russian tradition, and what is inherent in a big power, also includes the trend to expand one's power. Thus, I am not taking a naive approach to assessing Soviet policy, only, I think one should take the Soviet side much more often at its word. And one should also be more objective in making numerical comparisons than is done in the West, among other things in the armament sector. One cannot arbitrarily say: In this or that field, the Russians are stronger and then omit the fields where the West is stronger.

AZ: SPD politician Eppler once said if anyone were to claim that the Soviet computer industry was ahead of IBM, he would be regarded as crazy. The same applies to armament. What is your opinion about that?

Brandt: Above all, the first part can hardly be contested. Regarding the second part, since World War II, the Soviet Union has shown itself capable of keeping abreast with developments. Incidentally, I conclude from that--an essential objection against one element of the current U.S. policy--that it is absurd to believe that one could finish, ruin, the Soviet Union through armament. The Soviet Union will always follow.

AZ: Are the activities, including the demonstrations, of the peace movement something useful for disarmament negotiations or something harmful that distrubs negotiations?

Brandt: It is almost immaterial whether it is one or the other because it does exist and people do not ask whether politicians regard it as harmful or not harmful. I believe it is unfavorable if it leads to misunderstandings and it could be that in the Soviet Union things are sometimes assessed wrongly. On the whole, as far as my country is concerned, I consider the stronger engagement of people for questions of security, questions of peace, as helpful, even where they overshoot the mark. One is compelled to think things over anew, again and again. Thus, I am rather inclined to a positive reply.

AZ: Lately, a growing, shall we say tiredness of NATO can be observed. Isn't the Atlantic alliance heading for a severe crisis?

Brandt: It is true of course that there are growing worries in many countries. Nevertheless, I see for West Europe no alternative to maintaining the Atlantic alliance. Should it erode, negotiations would become more difficult because then the Soviet side might get the wrong impression that it need not also make some concessions to reach agreements. What I would like to see is a more pronounced European component within the alliance. But that is a question which has been on the table for years without any tangible progress. But objectively, it would be desirable if the Atlantic alliance, of whose necessity in the years ahead of us I am convinced, were to have more clearly than at present two pillars--the North American and the West Eruopean.

AZ: One more question about the future of Social Democracy: Isn't the SPD facing a test of strength? On the one hand, the big problem of unemployment and all social problems connected wtih it. And on the other hand, the question of peace? Aren't these two painful points for the SPD?

Brandt: I don't think that the test of strength will come where you have pinned it down, in connection with social security. That will not be a front where Social Democrats will struggle against one another, in the sense of splitting. The two fields where the Social Democrats face a new challenge are ecology and what calls itself the peace movement. Both contain valuable elements, both contain at any rate some elements that cannot be bypassed by the Social Democrats. The future of the German Social Democratic movement will essentially depend on whether in the years to come an essential part of those forces which today have engaged themselves in the ecology sector or in the peace movement can be reunited with the trends that traditionally have their place in the Social Democratic movement.

CABINET TO DECIDE ON ADDITIONAL AID TO POLAND

LD161752 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] No decision was adopted at today's Federal Cabinet session on the German contribution to additional aid for Poland from the European Community. Government spokesman Becker said that no formal application has been made but the Federal Republic is ready in principle to give further aid. A decision will be made during the next few weeks. According to agency reports, the Federal Republic will have to contribute DM350 million to the EEC's Poland fund of DM1.2 billion. The Poles want to buy more food from the community.

GENSCHER, ANGOLAN MINISTER DISCUSS NAMIBIA

[Excerpts] Bonn, 16 Sep (DPA)--Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Teixeira Jorge gave assurances in Bonn today that the People's Republic of Angola, as one of the so-called frontline states, acknowledges Western efforts for Namibia's independence. Speaking at a luncheon given by Federal Foreign Minister Genscher for the African politician, whom Genscher had invited to Bonn, Teixeira Jorge thanked the Federal Government for its efforts over the Namibia problem and Bonn's condemnation of South Africa's invasion of Angola.

During their talks, Genscher and the Angolan foreign minister agreed on further development and cooperation "in various spheres." Bonn diplomatic quarters believe that the meeting was a sign of progress in Genscher's efforts to resolve the Namibia question on the basis of the UN resolution and within the framework of the Western group of five, without disruption by extremist demands.

The Angolan foreign minister tomorrow will call on representatives of Bonn parties and then fly on to Paris.

CABINET EXPRESSES 'MAJOR CONCERN' OVER KROESEN ATTACK

LD161334 Hamburg DPA in German 1219 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 16 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Cabinet today expressed its "major concern" at the political consequences of the terrorist attack on U.S. Gen Frederick James Kroesen. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said at a federal press conference that "the political value and prestige of the Federal Republic" could be "damaged" by the attack. The government spokesman stressed that this attack was on the same lines as recent "many smaller, disregarded" attacks.

An official statement by the Federal Government says: "The acts of violence against members of the U.S. Armed Forces and their installations in the Federal Republic are attacks not only on our American allies but equally on our own security and freedom. Particularly abhorrent in this respect is the intent to murder which has become evident again."

The Federal Government will make every effort to continue successfully the fight against terrorism, the statement continues. The past years have proved "that terrorism stands no change in our country."

The statement emphasizes the "strengthening of German-American cooperation" which the visit by U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig brought. The impending initial contacts between Haig and his Soviet counterpart Gromyko in New York and the arms control talks between the superpowers scheduled for November "are important steps along the road to arms limitation."

With regard to progress in this respect, the government spokesman remarked that Haig already this year has spoken 18 times with the Soviet ambassador in Washington, Anatoliy Dobrynin, whose unique position in Soviet foreign policy is well known.

Group Claims Responsibility

LD161042 Hamburg DPA in German 0946 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Heidelberg/Frankfurt, 16 Sep (DPA)--In a letter to the FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU today, the Red Army Faction claimed responsibility for the Heidelberg attack on the commander in chief of the U.S. Ground Forces in Europe, Frederick James Kroesen.

According to the paper, the three page letter posted in Aschaffenburg only 4 and 1/2 hours after the attack, states: "Today we attacked the commander in chief of the U.S. Army and the NATO command for central Europe, General Kroesen, with the Gudrun Ensslin Commando. This man is one of the U.S. generals who control imperialist policy from West Europe to the Gulf because he makes the decisions on the means to be employed in a confrontation."

The letter, which reached the newspaper this morning, contains no details on the attack, which terrorists usually supply to back up the authenticity of their letters. The security authorities to whom the letter was forwarded have not yet made any comment on the letter. One thing suggesting the letter's authenticity is the brief interval between the attack and the time the letter was mailed.

With regard to the U.S. general's position, the letter goes on to say: "He is the one who orders devastation by conventional weapons and decides when and where neutron warheads will be fired... He will be one of the American military men to take command--instead of Schmidt, Genscher, Strauss, Kohl or whoever--of the FRG as soon as resistance seriously shakes the colonial status of this country."

The Heidelberg headquarters' computer for years has stored data on the leftwing forces in the FRG. Kroesen has held regular meetings with the Federal Prosecutor's Office to coordinate and assess the situation. This assessment, together with the Western intelligence reports collated by NATO, determined U.S. antiguerrilla warfare in West Europe.

The letter continues in this style to the following paragraph, which is written in capital letters: "The struggle in the metropolis can keep the global imperialist machine in check so that another breakthrough can be achieved with the revolutionaries in the Third World. Fighting in the metropolitan centers is the real direction of the revolution in the process of developing revolutionary resistance."

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU Reacts

[Commentary signed KK: "No Good Perspectives"]

[Text] Two weeks ago a bomb exploded at the American base in Ramstein and now there has been an assassination attempt on General Kroesen, commander in chief of U.S. troops in Europe. These new and grave acts of violence bear the handwriting of the RAF [Red Army Faction] even though investigators have not found anything definite in this regard. This is because, since its establishment, the RAF has declared that it will fight the hated U.S. imperialism.

Baader-Meinhof and the other terrorists of the first generation planted bombs at U.S. headquarters in Frankfurt and Heidelberg. It is obvious that their successors have returned to the strategy of the RAF founders after the unsuccessful blackmail attempts and murders in 1977. That was determined from the documents found in a Heidelberg apartment last October.

So there is nothing new about terrorist violence and its aims? Too little is known so far to give a reliable answer to this question. Certain parallels, however, seem obvious. At that time, the terrorists were motivated by the Vietnam war, hoping that their attacks on U.S. installations would gain them sympathy and new followers. The current broad discussion of new U.S. foreign and armament policies may nourish similar hopes of being able to find at least secret approval among many young people.

However, the general peace movement with its high moral potential is being viewed suspiciously because of the new assassination attempt. Its followers will again be forced to loudly disassociate themselves from every kind of violence, a depressing ritual which in no way will prevent the charges that the loud criticism of U.S. policy has fanned the mood and prepared the ground for the acts of violence.

In the meantime, the small minorities are using almost every demonstration to create destructive riots and a new wave of terrorist assault. This is not a good setting for a quiet domestic political climate. We must fear that the call for harshness and stricter laws will again be heard. However, the authorities and politicians involved should first answer the important question of whether terrorists Christian Klar and Adelheid Schulz, who were spotted this spring, were involved in the recent attacks. The report on what really happened at that time is overdue anyway.

MAUROY OUTLINES DEFENSE POLICY IN 14 SEP SPEECH

[Text] Being faithful to the Atlantic alliance and rejecting neutralist isolation, France is to modernize its countercity strategic deterrent and its tactical nuclear armaments--without retroactively ruling out the prospect of the neutron bomb--while maintaining the period of military service at 1 year for the time being. Furthermore, it must try to convince its European partners of the need to build a political entity having an autonomous defense system.

These are the essential points of the defense policy which Premier Pierre Mauroy outlined in Paris on 14 September to an audience of civilians and military at the Higher National Defense Studies Institute Mauroy described himself as the premier of change but, he added, according to several members of the audience, that there is at least one point--defense requirements--on which countinuity of government action is vital.

"Aside from the fact that our nuclear deterrent force cannot alone guarantee our defense and that it is vital for our three traditional armed services to have adequate well-trained and well-equipped manpower, national service is one expression of national solidarity. It is through it that the French people's support can and should be shown--a support which is vital to the efficacy of our defense policy," Mauroy said. And he added: "Aside from those aspects of the situation which prevent us from reducing the length of national service at present, it is still necessary to make this service more effective. This period, during which each citizen fulfills a duty but above all exercises his right to learn the profession of arms, must be a real training. Since this is each citizen's right, there is no reason why women should be excluded from it for the sake of historical tradition. Thus, it is appropriate to encourage women to volunteer. A more intensive military service which is truly operational by nature would make it possible to dynamically pose the problem of defending the territory by resorting to a true mobilization of the people."

After recalling that France intends to remain faithful to its allies, one of the most important of which is the United States, and to all the treaties which gave rise to the WEU [Western European Union], Mauroy stressed: "France's policy is in no way neutralist. Even if we wanted it to be, the country's very geographical position would prevent it. Furthermore, in view of our level of development, any isolation is impracticable. We must act accordingly, especially when we examine the defenses of our borders and of the approaches to them. An attack on France does not begin when an enemy enters the national territory."

But France, the premier explained, wishes to maintain the means of taking independent decisions in the military sphere, in other words, the nuclear deterrent: "The reason why General de Gaulle was able to pursue an independent military policy which led to France withdrawing from the NATO integrated military organization is that he chose to give the country nuclear weapons. It is true that research in this sphere started well before General de Gaulle arrived in power. The government is full adopting this option."

"Therefore, French strategy remains one of deterrence of the strong by the weak, in other words, a strategy which is bound to be a countercity strategy," Mauroy stated, rejecting the U.S. deterrence strategy. "According to this concept," the premier remarked, "Europe might well simply be a rung on a ladder of violence for the United States and not one of the supreme goals of its defense. This possibility is unacceptable to the French people. It is a possibility which should make the Europeans consider the prospect of a political entity having an autonomous defense system."

Mauroy then turned to tactical nuclear weapons which "increase the value" of conventional forces and whose vocation is to "restore the deterrence at strategic level."

"As for our strategic forces, it is appropriate to follow technical progress by periodically adapting and modernizing the vehicles and weapons of our tactical nuclear armaments," the premier stated, commenting with regard to the neutron weapon: "As far as we are concerned, it would not be rational to retroactively abandon the possibility of acquiring a weapon which could increase our deterrence potential. This capability must be studied in greater detail. This is why the government has decided to pursue the studies in this sphere.

"The French Republic will never take the initiative in a conflict--an initiative which by very definition belongs to the aggressor, as do the methods of attack. This means that we must take several hypotheses into account. To refrain from providing ourselves with the means of responding to a possible ground attack would ultimately cast doubt on our determination to defend ourselves and, hence, on our deterrence strategy," Mauroy concluded, before expressing the view that, although he is the premier of change, "there is at least one point on which continuity is vital: defense requirements."

FRANCE TO SUSPEND ACCEPTANCE OF FRG NUCLEAR WASTE

PM161213 Paris LE MONDE in French 12 Sep 81 p 32

["J.W." dispatch: "Paris Has Officially Notified Bonn of Its Decision To Suspend Reception of Irradiated Nuclear Fuel"]

[Text] Bonn--The French Government recently notified the West German Government of its decision not to accept for the time being any irradiated nuclear fuel from abroad. By 1985, the La Hague reprocessing plant is to accept some 2,300 tons of fuel from German nuclear power stations--191 tons are to be transferred this year, including 127 tons which apparently have already been delivered.

The French decision to provisionally suspend such transfers prior to the conclusion of the parliamentary debate on energy has been received with attention in Germany where it has been stated, among other things, that the operations of four nuclear stations would soon have to be stopped if the 64 tons which remained to be delivered in 1981 were not accepted at La Hague.

The West German Foreign Affairs Ministry is preparing a reply to the French Government's "verbal note." Without in anyway taking the form of a protest, that document is to recall in a precise manner the commitments entered into by France. In any case, at the time of the July French-German summit, Mitterrand gave assurances about Paris' intention to keep its word in this sphere. (LE MONDE note: On 18 August, during a nuclear conference in Paris, Research Minister Chevenement publicly stated that France's commitments as to reprocessing will be respected.)

CHAD PRESIDENT MAKES FIRST OFFICIAL VISIT

NC162244 Paris AFP in English 1849 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 16 Sep (AFP)--President of Chad Goukouni Queddei arrived here today for his first official visit to France, which is expected to centre on aid for the former French colony.

Mr Goukouni, who was met by Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot, was scheduled to meet President Francois Mitterrand tomorrow.

The visit marks the official resumption of relations between Chad and France, which were eclipsed during the last major fighting in Chad, between forces loyal to Mr Goukouni and those of rebel Hissene Habre.

The civil war was ended early this year with the help of Libyan military intervention. Libyan forces are still present in Chad and are helping fight Habre forces in the east of the country.

Mr Cot said the French Government was "determined to do everything to help Chad recover and restore its political unity, its territorial integrity and its independence." It would spare no diplomatic effort to set up a proposed African peacekeeping force in Chad, Mr Cot said.

Observers thought a meeting in connection with such a force between Mr Goukouni and Cameroon President Ahmadou Ahidjo, also visiting France, could take place.

Mr Goukouni was accompanied by Chadian Interior Minister Mahamat Abba Said.

Mr Cot also said that France was ready to grant unconditional aid to rebuild the Chadian capital, Ndjamena, which was badly damaged in the fighting, notably by the restoration of its essential services.

The "Transitional Government of National Unity" headed by Mr Goukouni has formally asked the French authorities for administrative, health, and educational aid.

Regarding possible military help, Mr Goukouni said today that "France does not wish to meddle anew in military problems concerning Chad. It retains a bitter memory of the past."

Mr Goukouni is due to leave Paris on Saturday.

SOCIALIST VIEW ON MOROCCAN ARRESTS STRAINS TIES

PM160919 Paris LE MONDE in French 12 Sep 81 p 6

[Text] As a result of a statement by the French PS following the arrest of Abderrahim Bouabid and several other leaders of the Socialist Union of People's Forces (USFP), whose "immediate release" the PS "demands," tension has occurred in relations between Paris and Rabat, which condemned Wednesday night "such impertinent interference in Morocco's domestic affairs."

The Moroccan Government "states with profound regret that by using the word 'demands' the PS has shown a complete lack of realism and total ignorance of ways and customs accepted throughout the world. It is also really perplexing -- to say the least -- to see the PS spring blindly, deliberately and illogically to the defense of an antireferendum attitude (that of the USFP) in West Sahara. Finally, it sincerely regrets this untimely and deplorable polemic and hopes politically that the PS will abandon the myth of split personality to the greatest advantage of French-Moroccan relations."

In fact, the Moroccan Government takes the view that since the PS is now in power in Paris its statements must reflect the French Government's opinion.

With reference to this, PS National Assembly Group Chairman Pierre Joxe made the following statement to us last Friday: "The fact that we have had some disagreements on certain political problems with our USFP comrades has enabled us to intervene the more forcefully and independently when their liberty and even their lives have been endangered. I was personally acquainted with Ben Barka. I know to what risks Moroccan progressive activists are exposed. The release of the USFP leaders is now a precondition for normal relations between France and Morocco. I am to receive this very evening the chairman of the group of USFP deputies to consider what measures expressing our solidarity would be the most effective."

In Rabat, two more USFP Politburo members--Mohamed el Yazghi, deputy from Kenitra and chief editor of the newspaper AL-MURHARRIR, who has been under a suspension order since the Casablanca events on 20 June, and Lahbabi, a university professor and writer--were arrested and questioned by the prosecutor on Thursday. This means that five USFP Politburo members have now been arrested and are to appear at the Rabat magistrates' court on Friday morning.

LE FIGARO CALLS FOR CLEAR, PRECISE U.S. STRATEGY

PM161501 Paris LE FIGARO in French 15 Sep 81 p 1

[Serge Maffert article: "Priority to Morale"]

[Text] Alexander Haig used his short visit to Germany to combat the "pacifists" or "neutralist" tide with which the FRG and some other Western countries have been affected. The American secretary of state rightly emphasized the moral aspect of the matter, which is a fundamental element of any defense system. This usefully complemented the traditional American attitude which mainly expresses its defense potential in figures--warheads, megatons, bombers and divisions are drawn up whereas the human factor has been rather excessively neglected, mainly in the United States but also in other countries.

Reagan arrived in the White House with some simple and consistent ideas--the United States has throughout the world one and only one enemy, namely, Soviet revolutionary imperialism, which appears either in its original form or in various other guises (Cuba, Libya, Vietnam and so forth). It is necessary to fight it vigorously everywhere and, to do this, it is necessary to increase American military power on a massive scale and to ensure that the United States is able to fight back whatever form any conflict may assume. Hence, the announcement of a gigantic financial effort. And hence, the desire to mobilize America's friends and allies for that unparalled combat.

As always, there is a big gap between theory and reality. And Reagan's enthusiasm has come up against three obstacles:

In Europe, the idea of introducing new theater nuclear arms has aroused more criticism than support. The main reason for this has always been the same--the more the United States gives the impression that it wants to fight on European soil, the less credible is its total nuclear commitment to the defense of Europe. What would be important for "European morale," if it is as low as Washington asserts, would be an announcement of a clear and precise global strategy.

In the Near East, Reagan would like to unite within the framework of a single alliance--at least a de facto one--Israel and moderate Arab states to combat the Soviet danger. He must have realized that, to both sides, this theoretical danger seems much less important than the fierce conflict between the Jewish state and the Islamic world.

In the United States itself, the President has come up against a budget deficit of unacceptable proportions. To reduce it to some degree, defense also will make some big sacrifices. Plans for new programs (MX, bombers and so forth) will be either postponed or implemented only gradually. Reagan, who rightly believes that the USSR is in no state to embark on a large-scale arms race, now realizes that the U.S. economy cannot withstand one either.

The United States already has huge means at its disposal. It would act in a more effective and less costly manner if it gave the impression of a coherent and united country, ready to sacrifice, if need be, its own existence. That great nation would then recover the quality of leadership which it once possessed but which it has lost.

MITTERRAND SET TO VISIT SAUDI ARABIA 26-28 SEP

[Text] Paris, 17 Sep (AFP)--French President Francois Mitterrand will visit Saudi Arabia from September 26 to 28, a spokesman at the presidential office said here today.

The official visit is in response to an invitation from King Khalid Ibn 'Abd al-Aziz, who visited France in June.

EGYPTIAN FOREIGN MINISTER GHALI CONTINUES VISIT

Meeting With Pope

AU161523 Rome ANSA in English 1515 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Castel Gandolfo, 16 Sep (ANSA)--Visiting Egyptian Foreign Affairs Minister Butrus Ghali delivered a personal message from President Anwar as-Sadat on the Middle East crisis to Pope John Paul II here today. Ghali's meeting with the pope at the papal summer residence in this lake town south of Rome today was his second with the Catholic Church leader. The two men last met at the Vatican on May 29, 1980, a few months before the pope granted an audience to Egyptian Vice President Husni Mubarak.

On that occasion, September 6, Mubarak delivered another message from As-Sadat on the Middle East conflict, one which dealt primarily with the Palestinian problem. The Egyptian vice president had met the pope earlier on March 22, 1979.

As-Sadat himself was received by the late Pope Paul VI while on an official visit to Italy on February 13, 1978. Egypt and the Holy See have had informal ties since 1839. Their relations became formal in 1947, with Cairo sending an ambassador to the Vatican and the church dispatching a nuncio to the Middle Eastern capital.

Statement on USSR Ties

LD161808 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Statement by Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali when interviewed "during his visit to Rome" by correspondent (Pascal Delanoye); date not given--recorded]

[Text] Before leaving Cairo for Rome, I attended a cabinet meeting at which the minister of the interior read to us a long report on the subversive activities carried out by certain members of the Soviet Embassy in Cairo, either in the form of contacts with fundamentalist circles or contacts with parties which are viewed as illegal in Cairo. It was after the reading of this report, which was extremely detailed, that the cabinet unanimously adopted these measures: we pointed out, the (?under) secretary of state pointed out to the ambassador of the Soviet Union that it is not Egypt's intention to break off diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. We have an embassy in Moscow and there is a Soviet Embassy in Cairo. We would like diplomatic relations to continue between our two countries.

SOCIALIST BLAMES COMMUNIST FOR GOVERNMENT CRISES

[Text] Rome, 16 Sep (ANSA)--Polemics between Italian Socialists and Communists hit unprecedented levels yesterday when Socialist Transport Minister Vicenzo Balzamo accused the Communist speaker of the house, Nilde Jotti, of being the person most responsible for the crises that often halt parliamentary functioning. Balzamo also called for her replacement by a member of a party in the government coalition (a five-way affair of Christian Democrats, Socialists, Social Democrats, Republicans and Liberals).

The accusations he levelled against Jotti are the harshest ever lodged against a house speaker since the formation of the Italian Republic. These accusations were outlined in an interview published today by the "GENTE" weekly magazine.

Balzamo claimed that Jotti failed to use her discretionary powers with regard to parliamentary regulations, and this because she is a Communist and as such a member of the opposition.

If the house speakership had not been in the hands of a Communist, it would have been possible to avoid the crisis of the government led by Christian Democrat Francesco Cossiga, he charged. This was a coalition of Christian Democrats, Social Democrats and Liberals in power from August 1979 to March 1980. It would have been enough to adjourn the house session or to postpone the second vote in order to give majority deputies a chance to reach the chamber, to avoid that crisis, Balzamo continued.

Reactions to his charges will doubtless pour in during the day. The text of the interview appeared too late last night to allow political leaders a chance to comment.

There was also a flare-up yesterday between the Communists (PCI) and the Social Democrats (PSDI). The PSDI leadership has come out against participation in local leftwing government which include the Communists. This decision was sharply attacked by Communist Senator Arnaldo Cossutta. PSDI Secretary Pietro Longo yesterday said that Cossutta's was an act of heavy interference in the party's independent functioning. Nevertheless, Longo was unable to get unanimity on his bid to keep out of local leftwing governments in Rome and Genoa. Seven members of the PSDI leadership abstained on the issue yesterday.

Preparations are still underway for a meeting between the government and the unions on how best to remedy Italy's economic ills. Yesterday, "CGIL", "CISL" and "UIL" union leaders met with representatives of the industrialists association. Nothing concrete came out of the meeting except agreement to meet again tomorrow.

L'UNITA CARRIES 'TEXT' OF PCI-LCY COMMUNIQUE

PM151538 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 9 Sep 81 pp 1, 14

["Text" of PCI-LCY joint communique issued in Belgrade]

[Text] There follows the text of the PCI-League of Communists of Yugoslavia [LCY] joint communique:

At the invitation of the LCY Central Committee Presidium, PCI Secretary General Enric Berlinguer made a visit to Yugoslavia 6-8 September 1981. The PCI secretary had talks with LCY President Lazar Mojsov, attended by: Central Committee member Romano Ledda for the PCI, and Presidium member Aleksandar Grlickov, Presidium Executive Secretary Vlado Janzic and Deputy Executive Secretary Borislav Milosevic for the LCY. During the visit, Enrico Berlinguer met with LCY Presidium Secretary Dobroslav Culafic and with Presidium members Stane Dolanc and Milos Minic. The talks and meetings took place in the atmosphere of friendship and mutual respect which characterizes the traditional good relations between the PCI and LCY. The talks gave rise to an exhaustive exchange of information and ideas on the activity of the PCI and LCY in their respective countries and at international level, on the world situation, on the international workers and communist movement and on the possibility of further developing cooperation between the two parties. Substantial agreement and a broad similarity of views were observed on all the questions examined.

Comrade Mojsov provided information on Yugoslavia's present economic and political situation, on the LCY's activity in implementing the current policy of economic stabilization for further developing socialist self-management, and on the preparatory work for the 12th LCY Congress, which will take place in 1982.

Comrade Berlinguer described the Italian political, social and economic situation and the PCI's democratic alternative line.

Both parties noted with satisfaction the positive development of cooperative relations between the PCI and LCY and decided to intensify them by increasing the exchange of ideas and experiences on both national and international questions.

As regards relations between Italy and Yugoslavia, it was confirmed that important achievements have been made in various spheres of bilateral cooperation, and agreement was reached on the need to improve them further on the basis of the principles of sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity, noninterference and respect for differences of social system and international position. In this framework, cooperation between the PCI and the LCY represents a significant contribution to the positive development of relations between the two neighboring and friendly countries.

The two parties express their serious concern at the deterioration in the international situation. Detente is in a state of crisis and extremely negative trends are appearing in international relations; the arms race has acquired new impetus, hotbeds of tension are increasing, conflicts are on the increase and the problem of underdevelopment is growing worse. All this seriously threatens world peace and security. This situation lends decisive importance to the intensification of initiatives by all progressive and democratic forces in the struggle to build a more democratic system of international political and economic relations based on the just solution of the problems behind the tensions and conflicts in order to guarantee lasting peace. The two parties maintain that the resumption of the detente process and the establishment of a climate of confidence in international relations are the preconditions for finding a positive solution to the present international crisis. To this end, it is vital to make a more decisive and sustained effort to strengthen the detente process through the active participation of all states. It was also reaffirmed that active peaceful coexistence is the basis of world peace and security and the only stable basis for cooperation among all states with full equal rights irrespective of their social system.

The PCI and LCY reaffirm their determination and commitment, together with all progressive and democratic forces in the world, to halt and reverse the process of international crises, to establish a new and more just basis for the world and to establish a new international economic order.

In this framework, the arms question assumes decisive importance. The struggle to halt the arms race, to hold immediate negotiations on arms reduction and to start an effective disarmament process is one of the two parties' main objectives.

The PCI and LCY stress the importance of the nonaligned countries in achieving this goal in their capacity as an autonomous force independent of the blocs. They also stressed the role which Europe and the European left and other democratic forces can play in attaining the same goal.

The PCI and the LCY confirm their conviction that cooperation among communist and workers parties, progressive and democratic forces, and among states, should be based on full respect for the principles of independence and sovereignty, equal rights and noninterference. They confirm that each party is responsible to its own working class and its own people and has the inalienable right to freely and autonomously choose the forms and contents of the struggle to change society and for socialism.

MINISTER OF DEFENSE ADDRESSES PARLIAMENT

LD161438 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 16 Sep 81

["Excerpt" of speech given in parliament by Prof Freitas do Amaral, Portuguese deputy prime minister and minister of defense, on 16 September--recorded]

[Excerpt] Many observers have noted the lack is possibly due to the profound jurisdictional split that has existed since 1974 among different organs of sovereignty on matters relating to national defense.

For its part, the government has no fear of proclaiming its views from the outset. These views can be summed up in the following 10 points:

1. Portugal is an independent state. The first duty of the national community is to ensure its independence by every possible means.

2. Defending Portugal against any external threat is essentially a task for the Portuguese people, and only secondarily for their allies.

3. It is a categorical imperative of our independence, full sovereignty and national dignity that Portugal should have its own armed forces and that these forces should be comprised exclusively of Portuguese.

4. The fundamental task of the Portuguese Armed Forces is to ensure national independence, the unity of the state and the integrity of the territory. Any other tasks, such as cooperating in economic and social development, are positive but accessory.

5. The armed forces is committed to defending democracy and ensuring the free operation of the democratic institutions; it is strictly nonpartisan.

6. The armed forces owes obedience to the organs of sovereignty under the terms of the constitution and of the law.

7. The organizational framework of the armed forces is the same for all of the national territory.

8. The defense of the motherland is a fundamental duty of all Portuguese people. National service is universal, personal and compulsory in the terms of the law.

9. In the present circumstances, national security is not compatible with any kind of neutral status. In addition to ensuring Portugal's defense, the Portuguese Armed Forces should participate--within the framework of the Atlantic Alliance--in the collective security system of our geopolitical region.

10. Because the basic legislation on national defense is of a quasiconstitutional nature and--solely due to the normal operation of the principle of alternating in power--should not be changed, it should be drawn up on the basis of a broad democratic consensus and, whenever possible, by an enlarged majority in the Assembly of the Republic.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS HELD 16 SEP, STATEMENTS ISSUED

[Text] A new meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon.

Before the meeting, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, said that he will go to New York next Saturday for consultations with Mr Waldheim. He added that he will remain at the UN headquarters for about 10 days.

In answer to a question on his assessment of the outcome of the talks exactly 1 year after their opening, Mr Gobbi said that progress has been achieved. Although it is little, it is progress, he said. Mr Gobbi expressed the hope that the next stage of the talks will be more fruitful.

In answer to a question on whether the next stage will be here in Cyprus or in New York, Mr Gobbi replied: Of course in Nicosia. All important events happen here.

In reply to a question regarding Waldheim's report and his new ideas for creating movement in the Cyprus issue, Mr Gobbi said that the secretary general always consults the sides before taking any initiatives.

Mr Ioannidhis, the Greek Cypriot representative to the inter-Cypriot talks, in a statement described the additional proposals that he submitted last week as the Greek Cypriot sidess contribution to a constructive dialogue, and he expressed the wish that the other side would also show a similar spirit. Mr Ioannidhis also said that at today's meeting he expected the Turkish Cypriot side's reaction to the additional proposals that he had submitted.

In answer to a question on how he assesses the results of 1 year of talks, Mr Ioannidhis said that, without a doubt, no progress whatsoever has been achieved. He added that the time has come for the Turkish Cypriot side to seriously contribute toward the success of the talks. The two sides, he added, must understand--and this he said is referred more to the other side--that we must establish a federated republic and, therefore, any solution outside the framework of a federation must be ruled out.

Regarding the territorial issue, Mr Ioannidhis stressed that it must be understood that this aspect of the problem must be solved logically and according to the criteria. We have submitted a map on the territorial issue. As you know, it is not our side that occupies territory. All of us know that the Turkish side must make concessions for a solution of the Cyprus issue. Moreover, Mr Ioannidhis added, we have our own map and the map of the other side at the negotiating table. What remains now is to proceed to serious and constructive talks.

In answer to a question on what is the opinion of the Greek Cypriot side on the new ideas to which the UN secretary general referred in his yearly report, Mr Ioannidhis said that the Greek Cypriot side is studying this part of the report, adding that it is too early to express any views.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, Mr Onan, stated that during the meeting he will comment on the additional Greek Cypriot proposals. In answer to a question on what is the first Turkish Cypriot reaction to the proposals, Mr Onan replied: No Turkish Cypriot would like to return to the situation that prevailed before 1974 or before 1963. He added: A proposal must be made that will safeguard the life and property of the Turkish Cypriot community.

To a remark that before 1974 and 1963 a federated system did not exist, Mr Onan said that there was a semifederation in its operational structure. He added that now a federated system is being sought that will take into consideration the security of the Turkish Cypriot community.

He continued: Whatever does not take this security into consideration cannot be accepted. Mr Onan further said that his side supports a federation and not a confederation, adding that the difference between a federation and a confederation is not great. The question is, he said, whether we support partition or a separate state. The reply is no. We are striving for a united Cyprus in which the two sides will prosper and will try to develop the island together. Therefore, there must be two zones.

Mr Onan also explained that the Turkish Cypriot proposals on the constitutional aspect use Switzerland as an example, which started as a confederation and today it has developed to a classical type of federation. He reiterated his position for a developing federation in the case of Cyprus.

On the Waldheim's new ideas, Mr Onan said that it is too soon to make any comments, adding that he was going to study them. I do not think, he added, that the new ideas constitute an undesirable development.

NC112125 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Text] Greek Prime Minister Rallis has explained the positions of the New Democracy party on national and international issues during a luncheon given in his honor by the Foreign Correspondents Association. Mr Rolandhis [as heard] said that in the event that his party wins the 18 October elections, Greece's policy of good relations with its Western allies in NATO and the EEC will continue. He also promised the preservation of good neighborly relations with the Balkan states; the continuation of the spectacular as he described, relations with the Arab world; the cultivation of better relations with Turkey; and the promotion of a just solution of the Cyprus issue.

With regard to the Cyprus issue, Mr Rallis said that Greece is interested and follows very closely Cyprus developments and believes that it is time that the other side showed a better disposition so that the UN resolutions may be implemented at last. In reply to a question, Mr Rallis said: With regard to the Cyprus issue, to be honest, I hoped 3 months ago that better proposals would be submitted than those ultimately put forward by the Turkish Cypriot community. Unfortunately, he added, I was disappointed. However, I would like to believe that the other side's position is not firm and that there will be an improvement, because only then will it be possible to preserve to preserve the dialogue and come to a happy ending.

NATURAL GAS DEPOSIT LOCATED IN IONIAN SEA

[Text] A floating drilling platform has located exploitable natural gas and benzene deposits off Katakolon, Ilia, in the Ionian Sea. This was announced today by Minister of Industry and Energy Manos, who added that it is evident that the natural gas deposit is much bigger than the south Kavala deposit, and that the Katakolon deposit's size and output are already being studied. According to Professor Zakhos, chairman of DEP [Public Petroleum Corporation], who went to the floating drilling platform today to observe the burning tests, it appears that the deposit is four to five times larger than that of Kavala.

The minister of industry and energy instructed Mr Zakhos to precisely define the productive potential of the deposit and to increase the depth of the drilling to at least 3,000 meters because of the likelihood of crude oil at that depth. This discovery opens up favorable prospects for more hydrocarbon deposits in the area and confirms the prediction that the Ionian Sea is a likely oil producing area.

The minister of industry and energy said that an agreement was signed between DEP and the Italian state firm AGIP a few days ago on prospecting in the northern part of the Ionian Sea. In the firm to be set up, DEP will own 51 percent of the shares if exploitable deposits are found and receive 81 percent of the oil produced. Finally, the minister of industry and energy said that the recent discovery of petroleum in the Ionian Sea confirms the soundness of the policy laid down last year, which has produced its first very encouraging results.

TA161634 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] A document has been signed in Sofia envisaging the increase of cooperation in various fields and of the volume of trade between Turkey and Bulgaria. The document was signed by State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal who was in Bulgaria on an official visit, and the Bulgarian Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers Andrey Lukanov.

The document envisages the increase of cooperation between the countries in the fields of agriculture, industry, transportation, communications and energy and the increase of their mutual trade.

The Bulgarian official news agency reports that the meetings were beneficial and constructive and that the countries were aiming at developing their cooperation--which is based on stable foundations--in all fields.

Turgut Ozal and his delegation have returned to Turkey by land. In a statement to Turkish Radio and Television upon his arrival in Edirne, Ozal said that during his visit he held talks for the development of commercial and economic relations between Turkey and Bulgaria. Noting that he had also met the chairman of the Bulgarian State Council, Todor Zhivkov, Ozal expressed the belief that the energy sales and the economic and commercial relations between the two countries would further develop. He also pointed out that during his visit he was able to tour various industrial, agricultural and tourism installations.

LIBYAN OFFICIAL HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON TIES

TA161714 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 1545 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] Adana, 16 Sep (AA)--Libyan People's Committee Secretary General az-Zayyani who is in Adana on the occasion of the 12th anniversary of the Libyan People's revolution held a news conference today during which he said that, as always, the relations between Turkey and Libya are on a very good level and that head of state Al-Qadhdhafi attaches special importance to Turkey as a Muslim and friendly state.

In summary, Az-Zayyani said: Throughout history, our relations with Turkey have been social ones based on love and brotherhood rather than economic relations. No force can undo the ties between our countries and our peoples. The Libyan people are always on the side of Turkey. These historical ties have pushed our economic relations to a higher level. The Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has signed a deal of $1.25 billion with Turkey. This figure will continuously rise and reach $2 billion at the end of the year. We intend to buy goods from Turkey continuously in the next years.

We Will Continuously Sell Oil to Brotherly Turkey at the Most Convenient Prices

Az-Zayyani pointed out that upon a decision of the Libyan People's Committees, Libya would sell oil to Turkey at prices it sold to its closest friends and that Libya was determined to continue to do that. He stressed that better conditions were being supplied to Turkish workers and firms in Libya than to the workers and firms of other countries. He added that 45 Turkish firms were working in Libya.

More on Libya Relations

NC170839 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 12 Sep 81 p 8

["Telex" column by Teoman Erel: "Bitter Cherries"]

[Excerpts] The constant but unconvincing suggestions being made by Western powers in the name of Western culture to a Turkish Government which is basically pro-West, may push even the most cautious authorities into speaking openly.

While they themselves are doing everything in their power to develop trade with Libya and the other Arab states, they are simultaneously exerting immense efforts to protect us against "dangerous relationships." They say "for goodness sake, reduce your relations with Libya," and "the Arab world is in a state of great agitation, see that you do not become contaminated."

The other day, Foreign Minister Turkmen could stand it no longer. This is how he reacted: Maroun Labaki, correspondent of LE SOIR, a newspaper published in French in Belgium, asked him: "Is it not contradictory that Turkey should be both a member of NATO and at the same time maintain close relations with Libya?" Responding sweetly, Turkmen said: "Life is full of difficulties. We are not the only country doing this. Some other NATO countries too are in close touch with Libya, while Libya has some problems with other NATO members. Diplomatic relations are a very delicate matter."

This reply given to those who advise us to "abstain" from trading with Arabs was very appropriate, and it has double meaning. It is true, life is full of difficulties, but this does not reflect a one-sided truth. These difficulties exist not only for the awakened small ally, but for big allies too who have been using double standards for years.

Even when their insincerity becomes apparent, the big powers never abandon their habit of advising and checking on others. If their advice is not heeded, they let their black cats loose. Not only are they not happy about our relations with Libya, neither do their hearts approve of our relationship with even Kuwait, a moderate Arab state.

Head of State Kenan Evren said: "We are not in any way trying to differentiate between our neighbors and all the Arab states. This constitutes the basis of our policy."

Evren's statement that Turkey does not differentiate between Arab states has come just in time, because certain exaggerated and confusing comments have again begun.

The successive visits to Ankara by delegations from Iraq, Egypt and Kuwait, which are considered as "moderate" Arab states by the West, are being interpreted like this: "The United States is trying to bring about a rapprochement between Turkey and moderate Arab states with the intention of forming an alliance between them."

Meanwhile, the disturbing speech made by Libyan leader Al-Qadhdhafi and Syria's decision to extend its territorial waters to 35 miles, a decision which could violate Turkey's rights, constitute sweet developments for the "big black cats." Head of State Evren's statement at this stage that "Turkey does not differentiate" between her friends and neighbors has been very useful.

MINISTER OZAL COMMENTS ON DOMESTIC SITUATION

TA162029 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has said that the standard of living of the low income groups will improve next year compared to this year. He was speaking on a television program entitled "The Turkish Economy in September 1981." Noting that the economic program being implemented in Turkey for the past year and 1/2 had been prepared considering the country's specific conditions, Ozal stressed that the policy of free interest rates had caused a substantive increase in savings. He stated that the rate of inflation would have to be reduced to around 25 percent next year. He added: Regarding the entire country I will tell you that we will have certain difficulties for another 2 years, I am not saying 3 years.

TCP SECRETARY BILEN'S REPORT TO PARTY PLENUM

Part One

TA111730 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 11 Sep 81

[Part One of the report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] Dear Comrades: I am opening the plenum of the Central Committee. Our meeting is being held under very harsh and extraordinary conditions. The 12 September military coup confronted our party with new problems in every field and with the duty to solve these problems; so much so that [words indistinct] remove our party organizations and cadres from the oncoming flood and protect them in the face of the attack.

Comrades, the fact that the Central Committee plenum has convened at a time when the collaborationist big bourgeoisie and the sovereign circles have engaged in an attack against the working class and our party through their most powerful means, namely the power of the army, constitutes a great achievement. This event demonstrates that the anticommunist attack has not achieved its purpose and that it has not succeeded in breaking the struggle force of our party. The majority of the party members are of a new generation. Numerous comrades have experienced 12 March [1971]. On the whole, our cadres are passing through a fierce fire and a very harsh test. It is necessary to learn lessons from all these experiences--whether they are good, bad right or wrong--and especially ponder over our mistakes without exaggerating or concealing them. The plenum must approach the problems with constructive criticism.

Comrades, we are convening the plenum during extraordinary internal and external conditions. What are these conditions? First, the expansionist and aggressive circles of imperialism, the new U.S. administration and the leaders of NATO have abandoned the policy of detente for the policy of escalating international tension and provoking confrontations. The Pentagon is according priority to its offensive strategy. This is the main threat. Opposing this escalation, the arms race and the eruption of a new world war are the most burning issues of our day. This is possible. There is the Soviet Union, the socialist world, peaceful forces and the world working and communist movement. The Turkish working class and its militant communist party, the TCP is part of this struggle. It is an inseparable part of these forces.

Second, U.S. imperialists and their allies that follow in their wake have engaged in a general counterattack everywhere against revolutionary forces and against the entire world revolutionary process. The political situation in our country underwent a significant change following the 12 September military coup. The pressure by the reactionary military regime against the working class and the progressive forces brought Turkey face to face with a series of international threats.

Third, our party was faced with severe pressure and the recently intensified arrests. Despite all these negative developments, the possibilities and sources of struggle for the working class, the TCP and all the patriotic forces have not been exhausted. Reactionary forces are not the only existing forces in our country or in the world. The days when imperialists reigned in the world have long been left in the past since the Red October Revolution. The colonial system has collapsed. The national liberation movements are achieving great successes and victories. Some of the liberated countries and peoples are turning toward socialism. Revolutionary movements in Asia, Africa and Latin America are developing in peaceful ways or in other ways that are not peaceful. The main struggle is between the imperialist world and the socialist world. The socialist countries bloc constitutes the chief force in the struggle against imperialism. Turkey's great neighbor--the Soviet Union--is leading this bloc. The CPSU--Lenin's party--is the most experienced, farsighted and capable leader of this struggle. The Soviet Union, which has made dazzling scientific and technological progress, started the space era and directed itself from socialism to communism, and the socialist countries' bloc are invincible. The struggle to protect and strengthen world peace and detente and the struggle against the mad and barbaric plans of the likes of Reagan to transform our world into ashes through nuclear arsenals depend on such a source of power. The consistent peaceful policy of the CPSU imparts large possibilities to the struggle of the Turkish people as well.

The world revolutionary process and the forces that are joining this process are attaining new positions and achievements. The Turkish working class is not alone in the world or in our country. The sectors of the working class who are experienced and who have faced great dangers maintain their organizational traits and continue their struggle. The severe pressure by the junta has not been able to sever the ties of the TCP with the working class and its militant sector.

The discontent among the toiling masses and increasingly among the various strata of the population is mounting against the tryanny and the policy to deprive the people of their last mouthful by the junta and the rightist military dictatorship. Grumbles are turning into reactions.

The TCP has struggled with all its might and is still struggling to protect its cadres from the oncoming flood. The Marxist-Leninist unity of our party and our iron discipline is becoming further enhanced. The events prove the correctness of the flexible policy determined and implemented by our party vis-a-vis the junta.

We have exhausted many of our legal working possibilities. However, the attack has not succeeded in isolating our party from the masses. The TCP is living inside the working class and our people. We are starting our plenum with such an awareness and power. Our party's viewpoint is clear; a revolutionary and democratic solution to the current situation is possible if all the national democratic forces can unite and if our party can intelligently exploit all its means for struggle, assist the struggle of the masses with a correct policy, show the masses the path of solution, and link with them in their struggles.

The oncoming harsh terror and the merciless and barbaric torture methods applied by the junta are further sharpening the awareness, the resentment and the fury of the communists. If such emotions were absent, as stated by Lenin, communists would not have been able to view the revolutionary horizon and the revolutionary (?tendency) with hope and trust. There are elements among leftist forces outside our party who base their political tactics on this ideal and [word indistinct] emotions alone. However, revolutionary tactics are not based on revolutionary feelings. Tactics, Lenin says, must be based on a sound, concise and objective evaluation of all the class forces in the relevant country.

The plenum must handle and assess the situation and developments in our country and in the world within this framework. The work conducted by our party in every field, its errors, its shortcomings and its achievements must all be fully dealt with from this viewpoint.

Struggle for Peace

Comrades, protecting and strengthening peace and detente is the basic issue of today. The struggle for peace is now, foremost, an issue of life and death for the human race. We are living in a world where there are 60 tons of explosives per person. Nuclear weapons are stored on our soil, in U.S. and NATO bases. If the imperialists attempt the madness of igniting a world nuclear war, this is tantamount to Turkey being transformed into a nuclear graveyard. The struggle for peace is, in a way, a part of the struggle for the happiness of our people. It is part of the struggle to save our country from its current deep economic crisis. Some 40 percent of the Turkish budget is allocated to armament. The struggle for peace and detente is the struggle for social progress and for a humane life for the working class and the toilers. The interests of entire humankind and our people render the struggle for peace into the most important task for our people. The communists are in the first ranks of this struggle.

There are two lines opposing each other in the world. One of them is the line to curb armament and reduce it and defend peace and detente. The Soviet Union and the socialist countries are leading this struggle. The other line consists of exacerbating the arms race, creating new hotbeds of tension and hindering negotiations. This course is led by U.S. imperialists, extreme reactionaries and militarists. By deploying new nuclear missiles in the middle of Europe, the United States wants to ignite a new world war from this place. CPSU Central Committee Secretary General Comrade Brezhnev said: There is no duty for our party and people as well as the people in the world more important than defending international peace. The new peace program of the 26th Congress of the CPSU has constituted a milestone in the struggle for peace.

The proposal to freeze the number of medium-range missiles in Europe as a first measure to create a positive atmosphere for negotiations and the proposal to start negotiations as soon as possible has become the burning wish of the current struggle for peace.

The Soviet Union has also made significant constructive proposals for the reduction of the tensions in the Persian Gulf and Far East. It proposed measures to the United Nations to prevent the destructiveness of a nuclear war and ameliorate international relations. Particularly the proposal during the 26th congress to expand the scope of confidence building measures is very important for our country as well. The Soviet Union is persistently continuing the struggle for peace in accordance with the congress decisions. It proposes to transform the Mediterranean into a sea of peace. It guarantees that it will not use nuclear weapons against those countries that do not depioy nuclear weapons on their soil. The Soviet Union has called on the parliaments and peoples of all countries to support negotiations in a bid to prevent a nuclear war.

On the other hand, the United States is pursuing a policy of underming the negotiations and increasing the tension. It is applying pressure and blackmail against other countries in this direction. U.S. imperialists and militarists are distorting the facts. The United States is (?tipping) the close balance in the military field. It wants to disrupt this balance, start a new phase of the arms race and increasingly use its Chinese trump card in a more intense manner. The military-political cooperation between the aggressive U.S. administration and the hegemonistic Beijing administration further endangers world peace.

The U.S. adventurous policies are in complete contradiction with our national interests. Our people together with peace-loving forces in Turkey support the realistic and constructive peace proposals of the Soviet Union. These proposals create great opportunities for peace-loving forces pursuing a realistic foreign policy course and for masses resisting the deployment of the deadly missiles in Western Europe. The communists are the most devoted supporters of the struggle for peace.

The TCP approves the resolutions reached at the struggle for peace. All communist and workers parties and suggests the continuation of such meetings and the convening of a european forum of peace-loving forces in view of the great dangers facing mankind nowadays. The TCP believes the time is ripe for a world forum of all communist and workers parties.

Developments in Socialist Poland

Developments taking place in the Polish People's Republic interest not only the [illegible] and the socialist system, but the whole world public. Imperialists are doing their utmost in a bid to push socialism back, to destroy it from the inside and to erode it. For them Poland only means a military, strategic and political bridgehead. Imperialists--led by the United States and the FRG--are openly interfering in the internal affairs of Poland. They are exerting economic and political pressure through sophisticated and sly methods. The aggressive NATO includes Poland into its agenda. The same was done against socialist Hungary and socialist Czechoslovakia in the past. Their aim is to take advantage of the present internal crisis in Poland in order to provoke the counterrevolutionary forces against the socialist rule and the very essence of socialism.

In a letter it addressed to the Polish United Workers Party, the CPSI pointed out that socialism in Poland was facing real danger. This letter, which was the result of communist concern and sensitivity, says that mobilizing the healthiest forces of the society is the main problem in order to repulse the class enemies and to fight against counterrevolution.

At various times socialism has experienced many tests, and has been able to overcome them successfully. The result will be the same in Poland, too. Socialism will be victorious. The TCP is at the side of forces struggling for peace and socialism in the world.

Part Two

TA121745 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 12 Sep 81

[Part Two of the report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] Peace and Security in Our Region

Basing themselves on the lie of the Soviet threat, the U.S. imperialists are trying to impose their adventurous policies on their allies in the Near and Middle East as well as in the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean. The United States and the most aggressive imperialist circles have declared this region their vital interest region. The United States is threatening the Persian Gulf with its warships. It is openly blackmailing the Gulf countries. It is trying to form new military blocs with the most reactionary forces in the region. It wants to use its Rapid Deployment Force [RDF] as a tool of pressure to impede all progressive and peaceful developments in the area. The reason behind all this is that the adventurous imperialists have lost their positions in the region.

The most militant and aggressive circles in the imperialist U.S. administration are supporting Israeli international terror and aggressive policies against the Arab peoples. The Palestinian people's rights to their own state are being violated. These circles want to expand their effective region using the Iran-Iraq war as a step. They want to transform Cyprus into an unsinkable NATO aircraft carrier at the expense of that island's independence and territorial integrity. They are trying to station troops of their RDF in the occupied territories of Karpaz [Karpasia] in northern Cyprus. In the Aegean region, they are, on the one hand, sowing the seeds of enmity between the Turkish and Greek peoples and, on the other, after having succeeded in returning Greece to the military wing of NATO, they want to use these two countries as an aggressive tool against the region's peoples. Under these circumstances great tasks and responsibilities face all the revolutionary forces of the region. The TCP supports the further development of links among the brotherly parties as well as among the national liberation movements in our regions.

The imperialists are exerting efforts in a bid to involve our country in the undeclared war they are waging against the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan. The junta government's decision to lower the level of Turkish diplomatic representation in Afghanistan proves that efforts to this end have been effective. By declaring that loans will be reduced for countries which use their votes in the United Nations without taking into consideration U.S. requests, the United States has openly reiterated its policies of imposition and blackmail. To bow to such impositions and blackmail is to pursue a policy that completely contradicts the national interests. The TCP has supported and is still supporting the internationalist support extended by the Soviet Union to the brotherly Afghan people. Proposals by Comrade Babrak Karmal in May to the effect that the Afghan problem should be solved through peaceful negotiations among neighboring countries are a constructive and just stand.

The stand of the Soviet Union is exactly the opposite of that of the imperialists. The concrete proposals made by Comrade Brezhnev during the 26th CPSU Congress are realistic proposals that could solve the regional problems. If it were not for the imperialist interventions, the region's peoples could solve their own problems among themselves. Our people are in favor of a just peace and the friendship and brotherhood of the peoples in our region.

For an Independent Peaceful Foreign Policy

The U.S. administration and the NATO ringleaders are trying to transform Turkey into a springboard of aggression against the socialist countries. They want to use Turkey as a tool against the region's peoples for the sake of their own imperialist goals. To this end, they are exerting economic and political pressures on Turkey by all means. That is why currently anticommunism and anti-Sovietism is being used as a means of provocation.

The crucial point for the solution of Turkey's problems in connection with peace, independence, a national army and a national economy lies with Turkey's membership in NATO. The TCP envisages Turkey's withdrawal from NATO and the pursuing of a dignified foreign policy. It is supporting the continuation and promotion of links with the Soviet Union as well as with the neighboring countries as the realistic aspects of this policy. The U.S. pressure is being intensified in a bid to use our soil for the stationing of the RDF. The TCP appeals on all peace-loving circles to oppose such a move and to struggle against the U.S. and NATO bases and nuclear arsenals on our soil and against the arms race imposed by NATO, which is a heavy burden on our economy.

The struggle for the cause of peace being waged in Turkey has an international significance. However, it also aims at providing a better livelihood to millions of toilers and at strengthening the independence of our country. Though this struggle is connected with the preservation of our national interests, it also contributes to the fight being waged by our people for the sake of democracy. This struggle for the cause of peace constitutes the widest common base for the unity of action in the country. That is why the smallest common ideas and aims must be discovered in a bid to attract the widest forces possible to this cause. The communists should not consider the anticommunist prejudices of these forces as an obstacle in the common struggle. They should not look for strong anti-imperialist support of democratic revolutions. The TCP does not even expect them to be completely aware of the problems involved in the cause of peace. The TCP supports all their concrete actions related to their specific demands. All objective conditions for the creation of a large peace movement exist in Turkey. To heighten the struggle for the cause of peace in Turkey, taking advantage of all kinds of possibilities, is the present task of the TCP. Communists support and encourage the struggle being waged by the peace-loving forces.

The 12-September Military Coup

Comrades: The 12 September military coup terminated the bourgeois parliamentary regime in our country. The generals' junta seized the power. For the third time in 20 years, the army directly interfered in the political affairs of the country.

During the period of almost 1 year under the reactionary military dictatorship none of the basic problems of our country have been solved. Moreover, the situation of the working class, the middle classes and the peasantry was further exacerbated. The economic crisis, unemployment, inflation and economic stagnation are continuing. The economic and social policy dictated by the imperialist financial centers and implemented by the junta is at the root of all this. The threats against the country's independence and national security and the pressure by imperialists--particularly by the United States--are increasing every day. The elimination of the democratic gains obtained by the working class and our people through long struggles is added to all this.

We do not deny the fact that the chaos created by fascist and Maoist leftist terrorism has been contained. However, why should our people pay the price for this? Therefore, the question before our people is as burning as ever.

How can we solve the deep economic social and political problems of the country? Despite all its optimistic statements, the junta displayed its inability to answer this question. The junta spread the struggle against terrorism in the direction of an attack against all the progressive forces. It ceded the command of the economy to the likes of Ozal--the spokesman of imperialism and the collaborationist and monopolistic bourgeoisie. The differences between the army and the people are expanding. Tens of thousands of citizens have been arrested. Over 100,000 people were detained at some point in time. Torture, executions and heavy imprisonments are continuing. Through these methods, they are attempting to avert the progressive forces. However, the national problems currently facing our country can be solved only be relying on the anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic and democratic movement of millions of workers and toilers and all the progressive forces.

Comrades, the international situation is becoming more tense in even more dangerous ways. This process deeply affects the political situation in our country. We are faced with enormously complicated problems. Our national and international responsibilities are also growing at the same rate. At present, the working class and our people are faced with the task of foiling the imperialist plans to involve Turkey in situations of confrontation with its neighbors in the region and pull it into centers of tension. They are faced with the task of restraining the actions of the landowning bloc and the bourgeoisie who want to retrieve the democratic gains and fully seize economic and political power. The struggle of the working class to this end expresses perfectly the interests of the crushed majority of our nation. All those who are in favor of independence, freedom and comfort can achieve their goal only by uniting with the working class. As for the communists, they are fulfilling their duty to direct the struggle of the working class and the toilers through a revolutionary policy and a revolutionary party.

The TCP Central Committee undoubtedly developed your current political tactics step by step. From the first day, in a statement issued on 12 September [1980], we expressed our opposition to the military coup. The bourgeois parties were [words indistinct] from their own parliament. On the other hand, [word indistinct] the parliament, the TCP raised the banner of democratic freedoms on behalf of millions of workers, peasants and patriots. From the first day, the party informed the masses that the attack is directed against the working class and the progressive forces. On the other hand, the TCP took into account the junta's attitude against the fascist NAP, its approach to foreign policy, the effect of the patriotic forces within the army and the existence of the contradictions within the army. It opposed the development of the regime as a fascist dictatorship. The 12 September statement stressed that the junta will not be able to solve any of the vital problems facing the country. It called on all the national and democratic forces to unite and organize in accordance with the new conditions. However, in a short time, the party eliminated the biased assessments that emerged due to political inexperience, lack of sufficient (?insight) into the army and certain exaggerated views regarding the situation of the masses.

There are different evaluations among progressive circles today regarding the assessment of the junta regime and the policy to be pursued. It is necessary to grasp the concrete truth with all its independent aspects. The Marxist-Leninist basis of scientific analysis necessitates a class approach to problems. The socials and political atmosphere and factors that led to the 12 September military coup must be fully assessed before reaching a correct solution. It is necessary to determine the policy of the junta, its aims and implementations in all areas and their class characteristics. It is also necessary to ponder the role of the army and Kemalism and supply the right answers to these questions.

The Situation Prior to 12 September and the Factors Which Led to the Coup

Turkey's history of the past 30 years is characterized by economic, social and political upheavals. The 27 May 1960, 12 March 1971, and 12 September 1980 military coups, the government crises which followed one another and the long periods of martial law are proof of that. Terrorism, which is the fruit of the moral crisis--in addition to the other crises in all fields of the community--of increasing unemployment and poverty, shows that the capitalist community is in the process of rotting. The most reactionary spokesman of the ruling bourgeoisie claim that these facts are brought about either by foreign incitement or by subversive and divisive forces. What do they want to hide from the people? They want to hide the fact that, at this stage, the country's dependence on imperialism and the capitalist relations of production hinder social developments. It has become extremely important to underline this fact today.

The generals who usurped power have declared that they will eliminate the factors which brought Turkey to the brink of the 12 September coup and that they will prevent a return to the pre-12 September conditions. Many people who were tired of the crisis, of the terrorism and the chaos are tolerating the present oppressive situation by considering these remarks. Many Kemalist and patriotic officers and NCO's who really want to save the country from the brink of the precipice believe that they are on the right path with their present actions. However, most of them cannot see the basic reasons which lie behind the economic, political and social crisis that brought the country to the brink of the 12 September coup. Consequently, they are not aware that, given these conditions, the steps they are taking are for nothing. What the junta is doing is only aimed at strengthening the sovereignty of a handful of profiteers at the expense of the workers, at promoting the order of exploitation and U.S. imperialism's positions in our country.

Today, Turkey is no longer the Turkey of the time of Ataturk. Capitalism has been sovereign in the country's economy for a long time. This capitalism entered the process of monopolization during the second half of the 1950's under the guidance of the imperialist monopolies, with the means supplied by the state and with the merciless exploitation of the working class and the people. A reaction to that was the 27 May coup. However, the patriotic officers who carried out the coup did not establish a connection with the working class or with the progressive forces. In the end, they were defeated by the collaborationist monopolies and the imperialists. The monopolization process was stepped up in the mid 1960's. The generals of the time, who are now on the payroll of banks, stepped up this process even further during the 12 March 1971 coup. They suppressed the working class struggle against the local and foreign monopolies. They broke the national democratic efforts of the patriotic officers in the army. What is the situation today? The private capitalist monopolies are becoming a little more sovereign to the national economy with each passing day. Some 300 big industrial and commercial firms and 5 big banks--in fact, 10 big monopolist establishments owned by the likes of Koc, Sabanci and Eczacibasi [prominent businessmen] who are interwoven with imperialist monopolies have the lion's share of the national income. The industrial monopolies and the bank monopolies are interwoven. The representatives of the financial oligarchy are rising in the financial-capital scene, and together with the imperialists and with the minority of the biggest landlords, they suck the blood of the workers. The military and civilian groups which rule the army Mutual Aid Association [OYAK] and other military funds and mediate for [word indistinct] arms monopolies are intermingled with this parasitic minority. This process incites militarism in our country.

However, this development passes through much more complicated and conflicting processes caused by the economy's dependence on imperialism and its backwardness. The small and medium-size establishments are widespread. They have not yet sufficiently become integrated with the monopolies' and the banks' sovereignty system. The state economic enterprises which produce the greatest share of the national income basically serve the monopolies but they also serve the interests of the widest bourgeois circles.

Due to such factors, the monopolist sovereignty in our country is not based on deep-rooted national foundations. Its economic power is not derived from a determining role in the production or from its contributions to the national income. It is derived from the specific nature of its development, that is, from its growth through cooperation with imperialism and under the protection and support of the state. However, the direction of the development and its dynamics are becoming more pronounced with the increasing sovereignty of the monopolies over the economy with each passing day.

MILLIYET EDITORIAL ON TAKEOVER ANNIVERSARY

[Editorial by Mehmet Barlas: "The First Anniversary..."]

[Text] We are profoundly grateful to the Turkish Armed Forces, from the highest-ranking commander down to the last private They have once again proved that they deserve the traditional care and attention which the entire nation shows to them. They have restored the lost security of life and property and they have turned into an indisputable concept our country's integrity which was vehemently threatened. Can there be a loftier service to the state and nation than this?

This is why we wish to express our sense of gratitude on the occasion of the 1st anniversary of the "12 September" [intervention].

However, we know that this is a military regime. The existence of the present status spells out the absence of democracy and the constitutional state of law.... If a return to democracy is retarded, other problems different from those of "12 September" but at least as serious and as frightening may crop up.

That is why in enumerating the problems resolved by the "12 September," we feel the necessity to recall that there are also issues that a military regime cannot resolve. However, our greatest assurance is both the fact that the Turkish Armed Forces have accepted democracy as an unrelinquishable philosophy and the fact that the way the "12 September" has been conducted inspires us with confidence.

Far from being a "military regime," "12 September" is displaying "a state administration." The intervention was carried out not by a junta, but by the Turkish Armed Forces through a chain of command. All echelons of the state participated in this intervention. These echelons enjoy the extensive support of the people.

In other words, the "12 September" administration is inspired not by a group but by the state and the public. This is why the cadres and leaders of political parties who carry the votes of millions have complied with certain restrictions--which conditions of this period have dictated--without any resistance.

Everyone believes that once the bend in the road of the first year has been negotiated, the end of the road will bring a multiparty democratic parliamentary regime.

From this point of view, the second year must look forward, not backward. The pre "12 September" nightmare is now a matter of the past. A year has elapsed, the state has been redeemed. Now it is the turn of democracy to be redeemed. From now on, we will turn our attention to the future, not to the past. This is what we must all do...!

POLICE MAXIMUM ALERT IN MADRID CONTINUES

[Text] Madrid, 17 Sep (AFP)--Police helicopters watched over Madrid today as the Spanish capital entered a second day of maximum alert against a possible terrorist attack. The authorities fear action by a Madrid cell of the Basque separatist organisation ETA-Military. Security contingents have been tripled or quadrupled around key public buildings.

A state of maximum alert preceded the attack last spring on General Joaquin de Valenzuela, head of the king's Military Household, in which the general was wounded and all members of his close escort killed. ETA-Military is suspected of having one of more permanent cells in "pisos francos" (safe houses) the organisation has in the Spanish capital.

SWISS, AUSTRIAN OFFICIALS DISCUSS REFUGEES

[Summary] President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger yesterday concluded his 4-day official visit to Switzerland. He was in Berne, St Gallen, Chur and Geneva. His talks centered on refugee problems and economic questions. Swiss President Furgler declared at a press conference that the new asylum law enables Switzerland to admit refugees whose life and liberty are threatened. Moreover, Switzerland has remitted 50,000 Swiss francs to Austria for refugee aid and made clear that this is to be regarded as only a first installment.

The refugee problem also was discussed by Foreign Minister Pahr with his Swiss counterpart Pierre Aubert. On this occasion, Pahr stressed Austria's wish that Switzerland also admit transit refugees. "Pahr summed up the outcome of his endeavors saying that the Swiss reaction gave rise to some hope but not necessarily to expectations." The two foreign ministers also discussed the Madrid CSCE followup meeting. "There will be consultations by the neutrals on the civil servants level in the second half of September and a meeting of the neutrals and nonaligned countries in Cyprus in October. As far as a third followup conference is concerned, it could take place in 3 years at the earliest, possibly in Stockholm or Bucharest. Vienna might consent to become the venue of such a conference, should no agreement be reached on either of the other two cities."

FOREIGN MINISTER STRESSES LOYALTY TO ALLIANCE

[Text] Bonn, 17 Sep (DPA)--Speaking in the Bundestag debate today, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher warned opposition leader Kohl against allowing doubts to arise about German loyalty to the alliance.

"Particularly, with regard to our allies in the United States and Europe, but also addressed to our Eastern neighbors, one thing must remain completely beyond doubt--that our place is in the Western alliance and with the Americans," Genscher stressed. "There should not be mutual recriminations about this." The Federal Government never failed to make its stance and the aims of its policy clear.

Genscher stressed that the Federal Government's policy is in harmony with that of the United States. He said that on his visit to Bonn, U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig again pointed out the importance the American administration attaches to cooperation with the Federal Government.

Genscher warned Kohl against turning the present political dispute about the German position in the alliance into an internal political dispute in which the impression could arise that some are in favor and others are wholly or partly against. "Don't do anything which could be quoted in the United States and thus give the impression that things are different in this country." This could seriously damage joint interests. The substance of the alliance must under no circumstances be called into question.

Genscher said that disagreement with the prevailing tone expressed in certain sections of the population regarding doubts about the need for German defense efforts, for the alliance and for cooperation with the United States is a different question. Here clear positions are required.

Genscher also responded to Kohl's criticism of Chancellor Schmidt in connection with counterarming with nuclear medium-range missiles. He asked: "Shouldn't our aim be to see the Soviet Union remove and scrap the missiles it already has deployed in order to make a mutual zero option possible?" He said he fears that anyone who abandons an optimum negotiating aim from the outset will not achieve even the realistic result of a reduction by the Eastern side. But, Genscher said, a reduction by the Eastern side could not mean the complete renunciation by the West of medium-range missiles, only a review of the West's counterarming needs. Given the fact that the reason for the West's counterarming is the Soviet arms buildup, the political task has to be that of constantly pointing out that the USSR has in its power the ability to make the whole business of arms buildup and counterarming superfluous. The American secretary of state also referred to the "zero option" as a possibility under ideal circumstances. The key to the need for counterarming lies neither in Bonn nor in Washington, but solely in Moscow.

AGREEMENT SIGNED TO SUBSIDIZE PORTUGUESE MILITARY

[Text] Bonn, 17 Sep (DPA)--The Foreign Office in Bonn today announced that Bonn is subsidizing Portuguese defense spending in the NATO alliance to the tune of DM45 million. A relevant agreement--the third of its kind--was signed today by Berndt von Staden, state secretary in the Foreign Office, and Portuguese Ambassador Paulo Enes.

The Foreign Office said that the assistance is aimed at strengthening the Portuguese Armed Forces which "have important alliance tasks to perform on NATO's southwest flank." The sum of DM45 million, which is now being paid for the third time, covers the period to March 1983. The Federal Republic produces similar amounts of aid to Greece and Turkey, the other two partners on NATO's southern flank.

SCHMIDT, OFFICIALS MEET WITH ANGOLAN MINISTER

LD171116 Hamburg DPA in German 1031 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Excerpts] Bonn, 17 Sep (DPA)--Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Teixeira Jorge was received by Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in Bonn today at the end of his 2-day political talks.

At a news conference, Teixeira stressed that he is in agreement with his German counterpart, Hans-Dietrich Genscher. He is convinced that Genscher's efforts in the Western contact group of the five states will help toward a "better solution" of the Namibia problem.

At the news conference, Teixeira accused the United States of wanting to undermine the position of his government and of the "revolutionary movement" in Angola with its policy of "stronger relations with South Africa". However, he has no knowledge of a planned coup against Angola as published in the Portuguese press yesterday, in which the United States, Zaire, Gabon and South Africa are alleged to be involved. He declined to give figures on the number of foreign, mainly Cuban, troops stationed in Angola.

Before his departure, the Angolan foreign minister visited Economic Cooperation Minister Rainer Offergeld and SPD Deputy Chairman Hans-Juergen Wischnewski. He also reached agreement with the German Red Cross in Bonn on humanitarian aid for Angola to alleviate the results of South Africa's "criminal invasion."

OFFICIALS MEET WITH CHAD, CAMEROON LEADERS

Mitterrand-Goukouni Meeting

AB171957 Paris AFP in French 1726 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Excerpts] Paris, 17 Sep (AFP)--France's participation in solving Chad's problems was at the center of the talks held on Thursday between Goukouni Oueddei, chairman of the Transitional National Union Government (GUNT) and President Francois Mitterrand.

"We have made a lot of progress on the issue of understanding and, I hope, also on common projects," Francois Mitterrand said at the end of the talks which were attended on the French side by Claude Cheysson, minister for external relations, and on the Chadian side by Mahamat Abba Said, minister of interior.

Francois Mitterrand stressed that the Chadian president has before him the uneasy tasks of the reconstruction and the unification of his country as well as the normal exercise of its sovereignty.

Apparently satisfied, Oueddei, for his part, declined to answer reporters' question--as did Mitterrand. He simply stated that he would hold a press conference before his departure on Saturday.

This visit, observers note, marks the resumption of French-Chadian friendship and Paris' approval of the legitimacy of the Ndjamena regime. The French example could be followed by several African countries which are concerned about the Libyan presence and hesitate to resume normal relations with Ndjamena.

The French Government already on several occasions expressed its readiness--particularly in a statement by Cooperation and Development Minister Jean-Pierre Cot--to unconditionally grant the war-torn Chadian people humanitarian assistance on the one hand and technical assistance on the other hand to help reconstruct the capital city destroyed during the war.

Cheysson-Ahidjo Talks

AB171424 Paris AFP in French 1209 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 17 Sep (AFP)--France's foreign policy, especially in regard to North-South dialogue, was one theme discussed during talks held late Thursday morning in Paris between President Ahmadou Ahidjo of Cameroon and French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson.

After the meeting, which lasted more than an hour, Cheysson disclosed that the discussions were also on African problems which, as he said, could be solved by the Africans themselves as in the case of the Western Saharan conflict.

We also discussed the possible contribution of France toward the solution of problems facing countries like Chad--with the agreement of the countries concerned--which must be united and totally independent, Cheysson went on to say.

Finally, the French External Relations Minister added: we also discussed problems for which the international community has to find solutions, the Namibian problem in particular.

France, Cheysson said, plays a very active role in the contact group. South Africa must accept the entire application of UN resolution 435.

After describing the South African military intervention in Angola as intolerable and illegal and after condemning Pretoria's apartheid policy, Cheysson praised Cameroon's role in Africa and the personality of President Ahidjo without whom, he stressed, the community accords may not have been what they are today.

MARCHAIS VIEWS PCF POSITION, UPCOMING CONGRESS

PM171441 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Sep 81 p 3

[Yves Mourousi and Patrice de Carolis television Channel 1 interview with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais from L'HUMANITE festival at La Courneuve 12 September]

[Excerpt] [Question] One of the themes of the festival is stepping up struggles, especially social struggles. Does this mean that you aren't satisfied with the rate of change?

[Answer] No, I and my party think we have started a positive process in most areas. Obviously, there are two fundamental questions holding the French people's attention--employment and prices. In those areas, the government must take the necessary measures to solve those problems. I am not saying it must have a magic wand and make the present 1.8 million unemployed vanish. No, I am saying we must reverse the trend.

[Question] Is this trend being reversed quickly enough and is enough being done at government level?

[Answer] I think that important measures have been taken in various areas. The French people know what they are. However, we think that more must be done. Moreover, that is what I intend to say in the National Assembly.

Of course, measures have been taken to create a number of jobs in the civil service. That is positive. Debate has started on reducing the working week. That is positive. Proposals on lowering the retirement age will be submitted to the French people. That is positive.

Most important is to create jobs, primarily, jobs in industry but also in agriculture. For that, we need a vigorous boost to consumption and to production. We can only solve the unemployment problem by new growth, by the creation of jobs in industry. If this is not done, the measures we are now taking will be inadequate and likely will become artificial at a given point.

Implementing What the French People Wanted

[Question] Can the nationalizations help achieve this?

[Answer] Obviously, the nationalizations constitute one of the ways to implement a new industrial policy.

First, because they will give us the opportunity to resolutely attack big capital's policy--a policy of confusion, speculation, the export of capital to foreign countries and the destruction of factories. On the basis of industrial nationalizations, we can pursue a new industrial policy, which, in my opinion, should flourish particularly in leading sectors.

I would like to add that the nationalization of the banking and credit system gives us the financial means of promoting this new policy.

Of course, in my view, the nationalizations are not adequate compared with the proposals which I submitted to the French people. But it is important to be realistic: The majority of the French people did not vote for my proposals. Some 4.5 million men and women did. That is positive. But the majority wanted less. I think they were wrong but you must be democratic and we are democrats. Consequently, we simply will implement what the French people want.

But it is important to be vigilant with regard to nationalizations. We must not have any illusions: The bosses of "nationalizable" enterprises will do all they can to try to prevent us from attaining the objectives which I mentioned before. The bankers will do all they can to prevent us from using the money which exists--and there is money in this country!—to finance the economic recovery.

This brings me to what I regard as a fundamental question following the decision to nationalize and it is the decision to allow the workers to take part in the necessary decisionmaking in the nationalized enterprises.

[Question] The latest opinion polls show that Francois Mitterrand's popularity has dropped by a few points. I would like to know your feeling on the state of grace which is beginning to be eroded somewhat, according to the opinion polls...

[Answer] I am not surprised that there are people who voted for the left, who voted for Francois Mitterrand, and who are now rather disappointed. There are some voters who voted for a different policy, who thought they were casting a useful vote from their viewpoint.

[Question] Are you not, after all, disappointed with the first 100 days?

[Answer] I refuse to make a clear-cut assessment after 100 days. In my opinion, we are at the beginning of a process which has begun in a positive way. We are only at the beginning and it is too soon to make a judgment.

Of course, there are measures like the increase in family allowances, the increase in the minimum wage--still inadequate—and a whole series of other measures which we can already judge. But, nonetheless, it is too soon to judge the record. A final decision still has not been made on nationalizations. We just announced which enterprises will be nationalized; we just announced which banks will be nationalized but the nationalization still actually has to be carried out and, above all, we still have to implement the new economic policy with the help of the workers on the basis of a new growth which will make it possible to create jobs and reverse the trend toward increasing unemployment.

Consequently, this is not a criticism but I am a lucid man. I assess our progress in the process which has been started day by day.

[Question] Last year, you expressed the view that the Socialists had turned their backs on change and had even combated the idea of the leftwing union. Do you now feel that things are going better?

We Want the Change To Succeed

[Answer] You have raised an important question because it enables me to allow the French people to judge. After 1977, we did indeed criticize the PS attitude. We wanted to clarify things. This was because we have always said--and this is the main question facing us today--that it is not enough for the left to win, we must create the right conditions for change in order to solve the problems of employment and all society's existing problems.

We wanted to defeat Giscard and to succeed in bringing about change. We do not want the men and women of this country to be disappointed. To do this, certain conditions must be fulfilled. And I still believe that the conditions I listed during my election campaign are essential and will one day be imposed.

But I repeat that I am a democrat and I take account of the way in which French men and women voted.

So what conclusions must be drawn from this? It is a conclusion which is damning for the media and those in the media. You were sorely mistaken. When I was appointed candidate, I said: "I am the anti-Giscard candidate and I want to defeat Giscard." You said: "No, that's not true, the Communists, on Brezhnev's orders, want to have Giscard elected." You were wrong. We defeated Giscard. Without the 4.5 million Communist votes, Giscard would not have been defeated.

Throughout the campaign, you said: "The Communists do not want to enter the government. We are in a crisis period. They do not want to shoulder that responsibility." There are four Communist ministers today and, if we had had more votes, there would have been more. And that would have been better, but that's the way it is. So you were sorely mistaken on that point too. The media shamefully distorted my election campaign. I did, in fact, say: These are the things I don't like in the PS and I still think that the PS falls short of the mark in some things. I am entitled to do so. But there were always two fundamental ideas central to my campaign. First, Giscard must be defeated. Second, we are not abandoning and will never abandon the union.

[Question] Let's turn to this statement: "We note that Francois Mitterrand and the PS, after abandoning the joint program and breaking the leftwing union in 1978, are now turning their backs on change." I ask you: Have they done another about-turn?

[Answer] I don't go back on anything I said at each stage of the battle, in my effort to clarify things to show the French people what had to be done to successfully bring about change. You just mentioned the fact that opinion polls already show that some people are impatient. That is possible. Especially regarding jobs and prices. This clearly shows that we must take care not to do anything which might lead to disappointment. This is why since 1977, and even before that, during the whole joint program period and during my election campaign, I never stopped making the necessary effort to clarify things: what economic, social, democratic and foreign policy does France need to overcome the crisis?

I still think that the proposals I made are good, otherwise, I would not have made them. Nonetheless, the French people have voted. We are in government and we are struggling on the basis of the measure of agreement which we, Socialists and Communists, reached after the elections, on the basis of the agreement which we concluded with the PS. We are fighting for success on those bases. Things are clear.

[Question] How long do you intend to remain in the government?

[Answer] Here we go! That was the third theme. I just recalled that the media said that the Communists did not want to defeat Giscard, that they did not want a union. They also said: "If they are in government, it will be for a short time." No! We are in government and are absolutely determined to do all we can to succeed. Consequently, if some people think we are there for a few months or for 1 or 2 years, they are wrong. We are doing and will do all we can to progress and to move in the right direction.

[Question] Let's turn to the PCF. More than a year ago, at a meeting at the Porte de Pantin, Francois Mitterrand said: "We are facing a party, the PCF, which is more than 50 years behind the times!" So have you changed between the 23d congress and the 24th, which will be held at the beginning of 1982? If so, in what way? If you have not, I would like to know how the party is feeling?

[Answer] Although some things have changed in France, nothing has changed in television! You have learned nothing. You are continuing the campaign you followed for 1 year, stirring up rivalry and arguments between Socialists and Communists.

My adversaries, the party's present adversaries, are the National Council of French Employers under Ceyrac, the bankers and Chirac, Giscard, Lecanuet and the rest. You are once again trying to make people believe that we are irresponsible allies, that we are only in the government for tactical reasons and so forth.

So I repeat: Things must be clear. There is a great difference between the PS and the PCF. We are Communists and intend to remain Communists. That is clear. Second, the form of union advocated in the joint program--I repeat, the form--was not the right one.

We are going to discuss this question in the preparation for the congress. The discussion has already started. We want union but the form was not the right one.

The third observation is: We are fighting for change. Change in the government, the country, the factories, cities and villages. The class struggle exists. It is being stepped up against people who do not want to accept change, who do not want to accept the nationalizations, who do not want to accept the wealth tax--a tax which, moreover, I regard as inadequate in view of the needs of the present stage. I will tell Pierre Mauroy that on Tuesday. But the capitalists don't want those taxes although the money exists. They want to do all they can to prevent change. Well, it is against them that we are fighting with all our strength.

Very Enriching Congress Preparation

So what is the state of the party? There is, of course, a great deal of discussion in the party. How could that fail to be the case? We didn't obtain the results we were entitled to expect in the elections. We have been weakened. That is indisputable. This is, therefore, one question. The reasons for this situation must be sought.

I put a number of ideas to the Central Committee meeting in June and, in our preparation for the congress, we will make a detailed examination of these questions which are connected with the nature of the election and of the institutions but also, I repeat, with the form of the union we established and, in a way, with our history as we have lived it during the past 20 years.

So, we are going to have a major discussion on this question. On the one hand we are presently in the government. We are no longer in opposition. That also poses questions we must debate. The preparation for the congress will, therefore, be extremely interesting and enriching, with a great democratic debate. Of course, there are rules governing our party's life. These rules were drawn up by the Communists themselves and they are relatively new since we drafted them at the last congress, the 23d congress, 3 years ago. On the basis of those rules, all Communists without exception will be able to take part in this great discussion, this great debate to draw the necessary lessons from the past and to draw up the policy we must implement during the next 3 years, since we have a congress every 3 years. Hence, there will be a great debate, a great, serious, high-level discussion. I welcome this and I hope that each party member will take part in it with a spirit of responsibility.

LE MATIN SEES HAIG SPEECH REVIVING COLD WAR

PM171155 Paris LE MATIN in French 14 Sep 81 P 2

[Editorial: "Cold War Speech]

[Text] Even though people are unwilling to use the expression, the style of relations between the United States and the USSR has been--for several months already--reminiscent of the cold war. The speech made by Secretary of State Alexander Haig to the Berlin press confirms as clearly as possible that, as far as Washington is concerned, the hour of detente has passed and the time has come to accept all the bellicose challenges presented by Moscow. "When democracies become either too weak or too timorous to offer resistance to aggressive dictatorships, how can democracy be safeguarded?"--the head of American diplomacy declared. His entire speech showed a fierce ambition to score maximum points by utilizing all the resources of intimidation and by assuming the role of a real leader of an anti-Soviet crusade. This warning was delivered just before a Gromyko-Haig meeting which, all things being equal, should take place in New York at the end of September.

Alexander Haig, who doesn't indulge in useless talk, in fact, restated the axiom proclaimed by Winston Churchill in Fulton, Missouri, that "the Russians respect only force." Incidentally, that Fulton speech was deemed to represent the beginning of the cold war.

What is new in the secretary of state's speech appears on two levels. On the one hand, the harshness of the words he uses to condemn the Soviets represents a break with the diplomatic practice current in the past 20 years, that is, the practice adopted after the Cuban missiles crisis in 1963. Haig mentions the "hideous" Berlin wall, asserts that "Soviet tanks, not NATO's defensive efforts against those tanks, threaten peace in Europe," and maintains that "Vietnam has reduced its southern peoples to slavery." True, since Ronald Reagan's election, people in Washington have become used to calling a spade a spade as far as the USSR is concerned. However, it was in the city of West Berlin--whose significance as a symbol in the sphere of American-Soviet relations is generally known--that Alexander Haig spoke. This fact endows his speech with much greater importance. And, on the other hand, the secretary of state did not hesitate to make some precise accusations on the subject of the use, by the USSR and its allies, of lethal chemical weapons--"We now have material proof from Southeast Asia."

Detente and peaceful coexistence are now far away. Obviously, through his "realistic" approach to "arms control," Alexander Haig intends to alert Western opinion and mobilize--in strictly Manichaean terms--the governments of the Atlantic alliance. It is a question of winning back from the Soviets all the lost ground, demonstrating that detente has profited Moscow and, consequently, initiating an intensive policy in favor of defense. Last week President Reagan spoke in a similar vein, albeit rather less forcefully.

However, in addition to the question of the rearmament of NATO's allies, the campaign pursued by Washington has another objective--economic revival. The Americans are becoming increasingly convinced that expansion is dependent on a reactivation of the celebrated military-industrial complex. If that close interweaving of diplomacy and economy proves real in the United States, it undoubtedly will influence the European nations' own decisions. In other words, if Washington initiates another era of cold war, won't Europe be obliged to follow suit?

EGYPT'S FOREIGN MINISTER CONFERS WITH LEADERS

Meeting With Colombo

NC172002 Cairo MENA in English 1925 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Excerpt] Rome, 17 Sep (MENA)--Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Dr Butrus Ghali conferred here today with Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo on the international and Mideast situations, as well as preparations underway for the resumption of the Palestinian autonomy negotiations in Cairo later this month. During four hours of marathon talks, Dr Ghali expounded in detail the latest Mideast developments, and the two sides voiced hope that the resumed autonomy talks would make tangible progress. They also voiced hope that Europe would back up such peace efforts, proceeding from the EEC's Venice declaration. Dr Ghali handed the Italian minister a number of documents clarifying Egypt's stance on the autonomy negotiations.

The two ministers also reviewed the position in the Mediterranean area and in Africa as well as attempts to destabilise those vital areas, and the importance of maintaining regional security, which was part of world-wide security. They further reviewed the situation in the Horn of Africa and Egypt's and Italy's efforts to see sound and stable relations established among the region's states, which should keep out of foreign interventions that ran contrary to their interests. Dr Ghali and Colombo also discussed the establishment of the multinational peace-keeping force in the Sinai, and it was learnt that Egypt requested Italy to contribute to the force. Italy's response was to study the issue seriously, while welcoming any further efforts to bring about a just and lasting Mideast peace.

Following the talks, the Italian foreign minister lauded President as-Sadat's positive efforts in this connection and voiced satisfaction with the talks he has had with the Egyptian minister.

Dr Ghali noted the crucial role played by Italy and expressed support for the recent Italian initiatives for boosting the peace and security of the Mediterranean, an issue of common interest to the two countries.

Talks With Spadolini

NC172240 Cairo MENA in English 2145 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 17 Sep (MENA)--Premier Giovanni Spadolini said today that Egyptian President Anwar as-Sadat chose the difficult way to Middle East peace and gained the admiration and respect of the whole world. In his talk with Dr Butrus Ghali, Egyptian minister of state for foreign affairs, Spadolini called for continued efforts for peace to surmount the difficulties on the way.

Dr Ghali conveyed an invitation for Spadolini from President as-Sadat to visit Egypt, which the latter accepted. The date will be fixed later. Ghali told Spadolini that Egypt was keenly interested in Italy's participation in the peace-keeping multinational force, and Spadolini said Italy was carefully considering the subject and would keep in contact with Cairo in this respect.

TUNISIAN FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS TALKS WITH COLOMBO

[Text] Rome, 17 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and the head of Tunisian diplomacy, Beji Caid es-Sebsi, have reached an understanding on an Italian credit line for some 90 million dollars for Tunisia and an additional 25 million dollar development aid package for the North African country's sixth five-year plan for 1982-86 The final agreement is expected to be signed before the end of the year.

The two foreign ministers, in their consultations here Wednesday, also discussed two further projects for future accords in the areas of double taxation and cultural relations. In the area of their talks turned over to Mediterranean security, the Tunisian foreign minister pointed out that he was pessimistic as regards the future in this region. Colombo replied that, "through relations like those in effect between Italy and Tunisia, ties of cooperation and mutual respect for national interests, it is possible to lend a real contribution to peace and security in the Mediterranean."

In this context, Es-Sebsi voiced his government's "appreciation" for the agreement through Italy guarantees the neutrality of Malta, a document, Colombo said, open to participation of other European and African countries on the shores of the Mediterranean. The foreign ministers also conferred on the situation in the Middle East and a range of bilateral issues which included Tunisian development plans and the three Sicilian fishing boats seized while trawling in Tunisian waters.

News Conference

AU172002 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 17 Sep (ANSA)--Tunisian Foreign Minister Beji Caid es-Sebsi, in Rome for two days of talks with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo, said today in a press conference here that the Italian proposal for a meeting of Mediterranean countries, discussed during the recent European Security Conference in Madrid, would be examined by Tunisia "with considerable interest." The Tunisian diplomatic chief, who also conferred today with Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini and President Sandro Pertini, added however, that the suggestion concerns a "delicate theme."

"If a solution is sought purely on the Mediterranean level," he added, "an agreement would be possible. But we must be realistic: The Mediterranean is also important for the 'bigs', the countries which exercise an influential role in world affairs." Es-Sebsi defined his discussions with Italian leaders as a "success," and said that Italian and Tunisian positions on both the Mediterranean security problem and proposals for bilateral relations were converging in a "reciprocal analysis" and approaching an identical viewpoint despite the fact that Italy is a member of the Atlantic alliance while Tunisia is a non-aligned country.

Referring to recent disturbances in the area, Es-Sebsi added that "our two countries alone cannot eliminate tensions.... but our common objective must be at least to reduce them." In a reference to an Egyptian request that Italy be represented in a Sinai peace-keeping force (at least symbolically) when the territory is given back to Egypt according to the Camp David agreements, Es-Sebsi remarked that "I don't believe a decision (of this nature) would please the Arab countries.... the Arab attitude is understandable if you consider that they have all condemned the Camp David agreements."

Commenting further on the Mideast situation, the Tunisian minister said that he was "personally pessimistic about the fact that a solution could be reached in the short term. The failure of the Camp David agreements," he added, "gives rise to a very serious consideration: That negotiations (in the Mideast crisis) are useless and the only alternative remains that of war."

On the subject of peace proposals Es-Sebsi maintained that these [word indistinct] by Saudi Prince Fahd initiatives need to show results, and to be accepted by both Israel and the Palestinians on the same level as a condition for success. The same is true for European proposals, he added. "Europe should resign itself to believing that pressure must be brought to bear on Israel, which is blocking the negotiations, and that dialogue with the Palestinians must continue."

PCI'S NATTA REVIEWS FOREIGN, DOMESTIC ISSUES

PM150908 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 29 Aug 81 pp 1, 14

[Report: "Open Debate Based on the Facts and on Ideas for Overcoming the Crisis"]

[Excerpt] Florence--The PCI held a rally in Florence yesterday evening which was attended by a large number of citizens, workers and young people. There was a march through downtown Florence ending in Piazza Strozzi, where PCI Secretariat member Alessandro Natta made a speech. In the first part of his speech, Comrade Natta discussed the international situation and the extremely serious threats to peace in the world; and the second part of his speech he devoted to domestic policy.

The following is a summary of the speech.

Throughout Italy and in the world in general, Natta said, there is a growing condemnation and awareness of a very serious and alarming situation--of the threats to peace. For our part, we are once again calling on all people, whatever their social class, their beliefs or their ideological convictions, to join forces in a common effort and united action to safeguard peace, guarantee security, freeze and reduce armaments and assert the need for detente and international cooperation.

Some people accuse us of painting too dramatic and alarming a picture of the situation in our country and in the world. We are certainly not cultivating a taste for prophesying doom and spreading alarm; we know that there are forces and energies capable of solving mankind's great problems. But to do this we must face facts and not be afraid to tell the truth, we must have no hesitation in apportioning blame, and not weaken in the determined struggle to search for solutions and to impose them. And the fact which must be reaffirmed first is that a conflict today could lead to a general holocaust, the destruction of civilization and human existence on this earth by nuclear fire. The truth is that, whatever the assessment of the balance of forces might be, the two major powers and the two blocs have a potential which, once unleashed, could bring about nuclear destruction not once but seven times, that there are nuclear bombs equivalent to 80,000 explosions like the one at Hiroshima. The level of war potential is such as to render scandalous yet another race to perfect new devices.

This makes it even more outdated and unrealistic to think that peace can be guaranteed by the balance of terror, by the deterrence of mutual nuclear destruction, or by the possibility of "limiting" the nuclear clash to the European theater. This is the terrifying new idea behind the cruise and SS-20 missiles and the neutron bomb.

But if this is true, it must be clear that balance is possible only if we succeed in breaking the spiral of distrust and suspicion, the logic of the arms race, and if the trend is reversed. We remain convinced of the need for all--the United States and the USSR, NATO and the Warsaw Pact--to take actions and measures inspired by reason and wisdom, in the common interest and by the search for an agreement to reduce armaments. It is increasingly clear that we--Europe and the Mediterranean--are the focal point of a possible conflict.

If we are aware of the cost and risks of a course which could lead to Europe's subjugation, we must set aside all diplomacy, timid reservations and overrespectful warnings and feel the duty and find the courage to speak clearly.

This commitment to peace, disarmament, detente and cooperation is fundamental and has a prominent place in our party's political outlook, in the strategy of the democratic advance toward socialism in Italy and in Europe, in the idea of Eurocommunism, of the third path and of a new kind of internationalism.

And we consider that this struggle for democratic socialist change, this vision of socialism with freedom and democracy is more valid than ever. We have seen this confirmed in events in other European countries, in the difficult Polish renewal and in the progressive reform plan on which the left's victory in France was based and on which it is now being consolidated.

Recently we have frequently heard people ask what the substance, content and objectives of the alternative are, as if there were a conflict, a clash of lines, directions and proposals in our party. They ask, on what alliances, on what political bases can it be achieved if you Communists level such strong criticisms at other parties?

I do not think we have been vague, uncertain or reticent about the substance or elements of an alternative policy, starting with the reform of the state and the renewal of the parties. I do not think we can be accused of having failed to draw up and define important and responsible stances and proposals on the major problems such as foreign policy, institutional reform, the fight against terrorism, justice and economic policy. Nonetheless, we feel no embarrassment in admitting that we must go further and make our programs clearer, more precise and more practical. We have no hesitation in asserting, as we said at our last Central Committee meeting, that the change, the alternative must be achieved through confrontation and struggle on real problems, through political initiative capable of arousing mass movements, uniting forces and attaining positive results, and that our party feels committed to a line of progress and democratic change to build a broad alliance, a lineup of new and progressive forces which lie mainly on the left but go beyond the left, the PCI and the PSI and involve and include secular and Catholic democratic forces.

We have no doubts or reservations in holding the view that the alternative essentially requires a positive relationship and a political understanding between Communists and Socialists. We do not question the PSI's autonomy or its function. We feel no envy or jealousy if the PSI aims to expand and win more members, or if it wins positions; it does not annoy us, it does not annoy Berlinguer, Napolitano, Pajetta, Ingrao or even me. After 21 June, speaking to the Central Committee on behalf of the Directorate, I stressed the PSI's progress in the June election as a positive fact, the value of confrontation and political competition within the left, and the role which the PCI and PSI have in the country's renewal.

Having said that, it is legitimate to ask the PSI what policy it is going to pursue with its increased power. And we certainly cannot conceal the fact that we consider the governability policy, with its ambivalence, to be a mistake; collaboration with the DC, even if it is competitive, and the substantial postponement of a battle for an alternative until the balance of forces within the left has changes, is, I repeat, a mistake, in view of the serious nature of the situation and the urgent need to reform society and the state.

We unreservedly admit the value of the Communist-Socialist cooperation in the trade unions, the mass organizations and local government. We want and are fighting for leftwing democratic local councils wherever possible, and we consider it important that the PSI is rejecting the move toward homogeneity advocated by the DC secretary. But should I perhaps refrain from mentioning that I regard the idea of the Rome-Lazio and Genoa-Liguria balanced councils as by no means convincing or justified? I would not dream of maintaining that we favor leftwing councils in order to keep the PSI in the left, because I believe that they are justified because they have proved their worth and are in the population's interests. But should I allow to go unchecked Minister Formica's gratuitously offensive and ludicrous statement that the PSI wants these councils to force our party to "become Westernized?"

PICCOLI ON DC REFORM, RELATIONS WITH PSI, PCI

[Mirian Mafia interview with DC Secretary Flaminio Piccoli: "We Christians Will Survive; Now Berlinguer Is Sailing in Stormy Waters"]

[Text] His office is more like a drawing room than an office. The walls are hung with tapestries depicting country scenes; the entire ceiling is covered with cherubs weaving garlands of roses; the desk is a dainty, heavily inlaid table; and the chairs are Louis XVI style. From this drawing room, Deputy Piccoli leads a party in decline, in a state of crisis and now close to its end. Should he not be depressed?

"Degeneration, decline.... you are biased, factious and ill-informed. You portray us like the Ottoman Empire, the moribund giant that never dies, or as a center of wickedness, which is in fact the opposite of a refuge for incompetents that must be ousted as soon as possible! If you only knew how many times I have heard these opinions repeated; when De Gasperi lost the 1953 election some people were already predicting our inevitable downfall. And you see? We are still here. And in 1970 some people, including some within the DC, announced that we had only a few years' life left. But 10 years have already passed. Then in 1975, following the local elections, some people maintained that our fate was sealed. Instead, you see? We are still here...."

[Question] Yes, you are still here, but--how can I put this?--you are in rather bad shape following the latest elections.

[Answer] But the DC lives and survives by virtue of more than electoral consensus. We have stronger roots than you think. They are real roots which stem from a particular view of the individual, an idea of justice and freedom and a blueprint for society. These roots must be reinforced, and this is what we are preparing to do. Real decline would occur if the plans for democrac stemming from those roots had proved in vain. In this connection, on the other hand, there is a crisis within the PCI because the root which it invokes is drying up.

[Question] Not only do you not seem depressed, but in fact you seem extraordinarily optimistic. But it was not we journalists who invented the DC's crisis. You held a National Council meeting on the subject....

[Answer] Why should I be depressed? I am worried, yes. I am worried about whether the party, involved in this entirely internal examination of conscience, will find as soon as possible the necessary energy to provide its own answer to the country's problems. This is my worry; our debate needs to continue vigorously until the November National Assembly meeting and until the congress, and must find both a point and a moment of truce to carry out a synthesis between the two aspects--the regeneration of the party and the answer to the country's problems.

[Question] What is meant by a moment of truce? Are you referring to the dissolution of the currents, which everyone approved at the latest National Council meeting?

[Answer] That was not the only time that I have condemned the ills of unrestrained factionalism.

[Question] I know. In fact, back at the December 1980 National Council meeting you decided to correct this system by revising the methods for internal elections. Then what happened?

[Answer] It is true, we did propose a number of internal reforms to surmount the difficulty of integrating new and valid energies into the party's life and to overcome the outright immobility dictated by the leaders of the currents. This was unanimously approved by the National Council....

[Question] What happened next?

[Answer] We appointed a committee. But considerable resistance to innovation emerged.

[Question] From whom? Can you name the current leaders who obstructed these reforms?

[Answer] I will not name any names. Let us say that the resistance to innovation stemmed from a general laziness, a general resistance to change.

[Question] Your national assembly is due to meet in November. Galloni has mentioned the need for a "transfusion" of Catholic blood to make possible your regeneration. Do you identify with that hypothesis? Or with Bisaglia's of a clearer characterization of the DC as a liberal democratic party?

[Answer] Earlier I mentioned to you our roots. They are Christian roots, and it was on the basis of these that we grew strong and became a decisive force in Italian society. Therefore, we will not accept for the DC a different role from the one forged for it by the founders and the history of the Catholic movement.

[Question] Does this mean no Bisaglia-style liberal democratic party?

[Answer] A popular and democratic party such as ours accepts liberal democratic values but transcends them and combines them with everything that the Christian message contains for mankind, for the individual and for the aims of a society that is not merely hedonistic....

[Question] What is the meaning of this condemnation of a hedonistic society? Is it an outstretched hand to Berlinguer?

[Answer] What do you think? Am I conceding too much to him?

[Question] Mr Piccoli, the critique of hedonism on the one hand and the proposal of austerity on the other are both rather vague. Let us turn to specifics. Would you care to talk about the councils?

[Answer] On 10 September we have a meeting on the parties of the majority on this very topic.

[Question] I know, but I would like to know more about what you think of this problem. You have made the forming of the Rome council a government problem. I do not know whether you mean what you say or whether you want to use the polemic to achieve something else.

[Answer] In the local authorities, it is an 80 percent gamble for the interests of the classes of which the Italian people, including our own voters, consist. Now in some councils, outright discrimination is being carried out against us, sometimes even involving government parties. Nobody must imagine that our desire to cooperation in the democratic management of the country can be exchanged for a mere supporting role to suit and to please others....

[Question] In other words, you are saying to the Socialists that there must be a five-party coalition everywhere. Formica has already replied to you that you can forget it.

[Answer] I believe he was speaking in a personal capacity. You cannot discuss these matters in humourous or arrogant quips. It is true that the Socialist Party has never adopted an entirely consistent stance at the center and on the periphery. But a patient reflection on the issue is also demanded by the respect commanded by our party's consistency in always opting in favor of democratic forms of cooperation, even on the periphery. Consider for a moment: How long can a situation persist in which the DC is discriminated against, even in cases where it holds a relative majority, such as Sardinia, to name but one? We are now being left out of not only the administration but even the collegial examination of programs which I believe should precede any understanding. We are being excluded even from this stage....

[Question] I would like you to be a lit le more specific on this point. You seem to be saying: We should all meet together during the stage of formulating programs; then we shall see who will implement the agreed program....

[Answer] Precisely, do you not consider that right?

[Question] This is what Zaccagnini's and Andreotti's supporters said about the national government when they maintained that there should be no discriminations regarding who should sit at the negotiating table to draw up a program. At the latest congress they were defeated, partly thanks to your contribution....

[Answer] But that was different; there we were talking about a national government, which involves other issues. I am talking now about local councils. Take the case of Rome. The problems there are certainly linked partly with national policy. Do you consider it right for the DC's thoughts, ideas and proposals to be ruled out in advance even during the policy formulation stage?

[Question] What would happen in Rome, Sardinia or elsewhere if after negotiations it was discovered that it is possible to reach a program agreement between all the leftwing forces on the one hand and the DC on the other. Would you form a national solidarity council?

[Answer] That is a problem. I would rather not answer. No comment.

[Question] As secretary of the preamble majority [former DC current], you can boast a success in having brought the Socialists back to the government....

[Answer] I have nothing to boast about, but I do regard the Socialists' return to the government as a very important event. I made sure that the coalition was based on parity and made the entire party accept even major sacrifices, in comparison to the past, in the formation of governments to guarantee in our allies a new and lasting willingness. Do you regard that as insignificant?

[Question] It is Donat Cattin who considers it insignificant. Indeed, he accuses you of not having established with the PSI the agreement valid for the entire legislative term offered to you by Craxi.

[Answer] But that is entirely untrue. There was never any Socialist proposals of an agreement for the legislative term. And as you will recall, at its Palermo congress the PSI rejected my proposal of consistency between decisions at the center and on the periphery.

[Question] Do you regret it greatly?

[Answer] Perhaps it was a good thing that things went that way, for the sake of testing the new stretch of road, which has demanded a great sense of realism. We have encountered more obstacles than rewards and consensus. Be that as it may, the governability which is so important in the anxious quest for the country's stability has been guaranteed.

[Question] Let us talk for a moment about other routes, other roads. As chairman of the DC parliamentary group, you played an important role during the national solidarity years in implementing that policy. People are still talking about the daily meetings between Evangelisti and Di Giulio. But you had frequent meetings with PCI floor leader Natta. Do you have any regrets about that period?

[Answer] I regret that that period was not consolidated. Others should have more regrets about the period than we--the PCI, for instance, which could have revived a democratic line of reasoning which it is now unable to find.

[Question] Both Christian Democrats and Communists are now saying that that experience cannot be repeated. Do you share this verdict?

[Answer] There is never anything that cannot be repeated. But the immobility into which the PCI has lapsed gives one the impression that the road is now impractical. Recent disputes within the PCI show that the PCI's system has become clogged....

[Question] Would you care to express an opinion about the Berlinguer-Napolitano controversy?

[Answer] There is a debate between Berlinguer and Pajetta as well, but I believe that one must go beyond individuals. We are witnessing an extraordinary significant and extremely valuable phenomenon. If the PCI has the courage to conduct an open debate--not only in its internal forums--on topics that indicate substantial differences in the Communist Party's approach, in its internal administration, in its role in society and in its links with the other political forces, it can be said without fear of exaggeration that we are at the start of a decisive turning point for the country's democratic system.

[Question] Some of your party colleagues have spoken in favor of Berlinguer's line. For which do you opt?

[Answer] I do not believe that the debate yet makes it a priority that either of the lines indicated prevail. They are intersecting lines, pointers which reach deep into aspects of party management. For the first time a capacity for self-discussion and for acknowledging even fundamental errors is emerging; a kind of arrogance on the part of those who believe that they are always right, the belief of being a party that never errs, is disappearing....

[Question] You seem to draw some satisfaction from the fact that even Berlinguer is being criticized.

[Answer] Well, you know how many criticisms there are of DC secretaries! Now the criticism of Berlinguer coming from authoritative leaders of his party provides a fortunate opportunity for the PCI to distinguish between the party and its secretary. It will be a fortunate innovation for a secretary who can understand the significance of the precariousness always reflected in consensus, support and even criticism....

[Question] You are very well acquainted with this feeling of precariousness, Mr Piccoli.

[Answer] I have no complaints.

[Question] But you yourself said of the DC's internal debate that it is marked by a kind of "pitiless cruelty." Has this always been so in the DC, or has this cruelty increased over the years?

[Answer] No, it has always been so. The DC has always questioned itself openly. We have no secret documents. Our National Council sessions are open to the press and our upheavals emerge from a debate that we do not conduct in secret forums but which we open to the newspapers, radio and television. This is all an aspect of democracy, one which reveals elements that are not always calm and well mannered; but it does teach us and the new generations the course of freedom.

[Question] It is a tough school; from the outside the impression is that rather than criticisms, it is often a matter of stabs in the back....

[Answer] You are right, it is tough school. But it also accustoms us to recognizing in other people's criticisms the basis of truth, whether great or small, that they always contain.

[Question] Do you mean that the criticisms made of you do not hurt you?

[Answer] Of course they hurt me, because everyone is sensitive to some extent, unless he has a hide like an elephant's--and I do not.

[Question] Have you ever considered resigning?

[Answer] No, I have never considered resigning, though I have declared my willingness to accept dismissal if other solutions beneficial to the party were to be found. That is all there is to it.

L'UNITA REPORTS BERLINGUER REMARKS ON YUGOSLAV TV

PM170909 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 11 Sep 81 p 14

[Report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 10 September Yugoslav television interview]

[Text] Belgrade--The political and social situation in Italy, relations on the left and Eurocommunism were the subjects discussed in a lengthy interview with Comrade Berlinguer broadcast on Yugoslav television yesterday evening.

The PCI, the PCI secretary general said among other things, will work to create a convergence of outlooks and to surmount the present divergence among the leftwing forces, which is preventing a joint struggle for a democratic alternative. With reference to the French experience, Berlinguer points out that "in France too there have been disputes and polemics between Communists and Socialists, but even at the most tense point in their relations they maintained a shared objective, namely to overthrow and replace the Giscard regime and create a leftwing alternative. This is what made possible the leftwing forces' victory, which is considered a historic importance for France, but which is also of great significance for all West European democratic leftwing forces."

In Italy, Berlinguer stressed, "there is not yet a convergence of outlooks among the leftwing forces, particularly between Communists and Socialists. There is rather a divergence of outlooks at present; this is preventing a more effective pursuit of a struggle that will bring about in our country too an alternative to the power system centered on the DC. The PSI maintains a government alliance with the DC; and the PCI proposes a joint struggle with the PSI and other democratic and progressive forces for a democratic alternative."

"We believe," Berlinguer concluded, "that we in Italy too must work to surmount the existing divergences. By all means let there be a debate and polemics on a series of issues on which the Communists' and Socialists' opinions differ; but an attempt must be made to make shared efforts converge, with the aim of completely regenerating our country's social and political life."

PCP SECRETARY GENERAL MEETS BULGARIA'S ZHIVKOV

PM171217 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 3 Sep 81 p 2

[Text] Bulgarian Communist Party [BCP] Central Committee First Secretary Todor Zhivkov met with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal, who was resting in Bulgaria. During the meeting, the two leaders informed each other of the BCP's and the PCP's current activities. They exchanged opinions on important current problems of the world situation and of the international communist and workers movement.

Comrade Todor Zhivkov reported on the Bulgarian communists' activity in implementing the 12th BCP Congress decisions, the Bulgarian people's successes in building the developed socialist society and the People's Republic of Bulgaria's active policy in support of peace, detente, good-neighborly relations and the Balkans' transformation into a nuclear-free zone.

He expressed the Bulgarian communists' unshakable solidarity with the PCP's consistent and courageous struggle in defense of the Portuguese workers' rights and freedoms, the democratic transformations achieved with the April [1974] revolution and the constitutional democratic system.

Comrade Alvaro Cunhal conveyed the Portuguese communists' fraternal greetings to the Bulgarian communists on the occasion of the 90th anniversary of the founding of the BCP and assessed highly the Bulgarian people's successes in building socialism, as well as the BCP's foreign policy of peace aimed at consolidating security and cooperation among the peoples of the world. He reported on the PCP's struggle in defense of the working people's interests, the gains of the April revolution and the democratic system and for cohesion among all the democratic and patriotic forces.

Comrades Todor Zhivkov and Alvaro Cunhal (at the same time as emphasizing the successes of the workers and peoples' struggle for democracy, national independence, peace and socialism) expressed their deep concern at the deterioration of the international situation and at the continuation of the dangerous arms race. In this connection, they categorically condemned the U.S. decision to begin manufacturing neutron bombs. The U.S. Government is shouldering a great responsibility for the deterioration of the international situation since the U.S. actions are creating a real danger of the possible spread of new mass destruction weapons in Europe--something which represents a grave threat not only to security in general but also to the security of the European states.

Comrades Todor Zhivkov and Alvaro Cunhal stressed the BCP's and the PCP's firm determination to continue to struggle to preserve and enhance detente. They emphasized the enormous importance of the peace proposals of the USSR and the other socialist countries, which are in keeping with the interests of all peoples and offer a sound basis for achieving lasting peace and cooperation in the world.

The BCP and PCP leaders stressed the need to consolidate the cohesion of the international communist movement and to strengthen the unity of action and cooperation among all anti-imperialist, progressive and peace-loving forces struggling for peace, detente and the peoples' independence.

Comrades Todor Zhivkov and Alvaro Cunhal assessed highly the relations of friendship, cooperation and fraternal solidarity existing between the BCP and PCP, which are based on the inalienable principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. They emphasized the need for these relations of friendship to be developed and enhanced in the future in the name of the common struggle for peace, democracy and socialism and in the interest of friendship and cooperation between the Bulgarian people and the Portuguese people and between the People's Republic of Bulgaria and the Portuguese Republic.

BCP Central Committee Secretary Dimitur Stanishev took part in the meeting which took place in a cordial and comradely atmosphere. August 1981.

RABOTNICHESKO DELO Interview

AU151549 Sofia RABOTNICHESKO DELO in Bulgarian 12 Sep 81 pp 1, 6

["Text" of interview of Alvaro Cunhal, secretary general of the Communist Party of Portugal, by RABOTNICHESKO DELO reporter; date and place not given]

[Text] Alvaro Cunhal, secretary general of the Communist Party of Portugal, who visited our country, was kind enough to answer questions from RABOTNICHESKO DELO:

Question: Comrade Cunhal, what is the Communist Party of Portugal's evaluation of the political situation in the country? What is the essence of Portugal's recent political crisis and what can be expected from Balsemao's next government?

Answer: The political crisis, which culminated with the resignation of Premier Balsemao, correctly reflects Portugal's political situation. The parties which form the government (the "Democratic Alliance" coalition consisting of the Social Democratic Party, the Social Democratic Center and the Popular Monarchist Party) disposes with a majority in the National Assembly. Then why did Balesemao resign? There are three reasons: The government, through the policy of the parties forming it, was not able to solve the country's problems, and even intensified them. The cost of living is increasing sharply. The national economy is stagnating and the dependence on imperialism is growing. The second reason is that the government activity evoked a wave of deep indignation and protest, which were manifested by powerful strikes and other mass actions. The third reason is that as a result of the first two reasons, the contradictions, conflicts and rivalry in the government coalition itself sharpened. This means that a new government led by Balsemao will not only fail to overcome the crisis, but on the contrary, will intensify it.

The policy of the reactionary government coalition is characterized first of all by the fact that it aims to destroy the great achievements of the Portuguese revolution (the national agrarian reform, the rights of the working people and so forth), to revive the monopoly groups, to restore monopolist capalism and, in the final account, to liquidate Portugal's democracy.

The crisis can be solved only through renouncing this policy and forming a democratic government with a democratic policy which will defend and strengthen the achievements of the revolution and follow the road of liberty and social progress which began on 25 April 1974.

Question: What are the concrete tasks of the Communist Party of Portugal in the context of the situation you described?

Answer: The Communist Party of Portugal thinks that the reactionary coalition must be removed. This coalition already has proved that its policy cannot solve even one of the problems of our people and country. It has proved its subversive character by daily violating the Constitution and democratic legality and by cynically expressing its plan to liquidate the current regime. Under these conditions, the Communist Party of Portugal is defending the opinion that the assembly be dissolved and new elections be conducted which will show that the reactionary parties are a minority. To achieve a democratic alternative, we are defending the need for uniting all democratic and patriotic forces. Unfortunately, the Socialist Party and especially its Secretary General Mario Soares are rejecting the unity of action with the Communist Party of Portugal and are searching for new agreements and alliances with the reactionary parties. On the other hand, the workers movement is highly organized and powerful, the struggle is also broad and powerful and the Portuguese people are firmly determined to defend their democratic achievements. We believe in the future. The last word will belong to the Portuguese people.

Question: The relations between the BCP and the Communist Party of Portugal are characterized by full unity and fraternal unity of action. How is your current visit in Bulgaria going to contribute to developing these relations?

Answer: During my vacation in Bulgaria, I had the opportunity to meet with Comrade Todor Zhivkov and other BCP leaders. The exchange of opinions was very beneficial. The relations of friendship and cooperation between the BCP and the Communist Party of Portugal are constantly expanding on the strong basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Proletarian internationalism is not an empty phrase in the activity of the Bulgarian and Portuguese communists. During the fascist dictatorship in Portugal, as well as in new, democratic Portugal, our party and people have always relied on the fraternal and active solidarity of Bulgaria's people and communists. On its part, the BCP and socialist Bulgaria have always relied and can rely on the friendship and fraternal solidarity of the Communist Party of Portugal.

PEREZ-LLORCA INTERVIEW ON NATO ENTRY, GIBRALTAR

PM161047 Madrid ABC in Spanish 5 Sep 81 pp 12-15

[Guillermo Luca de Tena interview with Spanish Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca: "NATO Entry Will Help Resolve Gibraltar Problem"]

[Text] [Question] During your July visit to Washington you said that NATO membership would take place "in due time." Why has this "due time" come?

[Answer] This is dependent on both domestic and international calendars. With regard to the domestic plane, the prime minister is better qualified to speak than the foreign minister. On the international calendar, we are at the moment when we are absolutely sure that there is a unanimous welcoming stance and that in any problems connected with the Atlantic option, such as the Gibraltar issue, progress can be made. And we are at the moment when we have a complete view of the prospects of bilateral negotiations. In July it was clear that this moment would occur in September. But the final decision lies with the government and this is why I had to use the phrases, in English, "due time," which is used in a colloquial and therefore imprecise sense.

NATO and Treaty With United States

[Question] Nevertheless, some suspicions still remain. It seems that the government, which at first completely separated the subject of negotiations with the United States from the Atlantic issue, subsequently connected them to some extent when it observed that it was not obtaining what it wanted from Washington.

[Answer] Clearly, at some point it was said that it was a topic that should be considered separately. But I do not believe that the government ever separated them. Obviously, the 21 September expiration date is a key factor in the temporal aspect of the decision. Therefore, I believe that the criticisms of untimeliness come from people unwilling to enter thoroughly into the debate. They emerge because they find the decision uncomfortable, but they are not real criticisms. With regard to the criticisms regarding the timing, it seems to me that to take the decision now, when the treaty with the United States is expiring and parliament has to issue a decision on the extension and future of the treaty, is perfectly timely and enables the Spanish people's representatives to examine the issue as it really is. And the fact is, as I have said previously, that Spain is in a way already within NATO. It is within NATO by virtue of the treaty with the United States, and if it is not formally a member, this is due to our domestic political changes. We have, for instance, the Saint-Jean-de-Luz treaty signed by the democratic Spanish forces, the forces whose principles now govern Spain. The signatories of the Saint-Jean-de-Luz treaty included, among others, socialists and monarchists in favor of Spain's entry into NATO. If those forces had exerted their influence at that time by means of the system rightfully theirs in Spain's future, they would have made possible our NATO entry and would have decided on our entry.

Impact on Third World

[Question] Former Prime Minister Suarez has said that our entry into NATO could harm our relations with the Third World. Has your ministry detected any signs that might support that view?

[Answer] That is not exactly what former Prime Minister Suarez said. He raised some questions regarding the worldwide impact of a decision with whose major outlines I know he agrees. I was foreign minister under his premiership and I discussed this topic with him a great deal. He was determined to bring Spain into NATO following 23 February [attempted coup], as former Minister of the Prime Minister's Office Rafael Arias Salgado said on one important occasion.

He did very well to point that out, and I point it out now. What former Prime Minister Suarez, a foreign policy expert, did was ask me certain questions and I would like to take this opportunity to answer them. I believe that Spain's entry into NATO will give us greater solidity in our international position, greater weight as an interlocutor and greater strength in our decisions and stances.

I therefore believe that NATO entry involves no negative elements. In my opinion, it involves none with respect to the socialist Eastern-bloc countries. These countries understand full well the game of political realities. They are adopting a very moderate stance on the issue. In other words, there were many more negative Soviet statements on the subject when the decision had not been taken than after the decision was taken. We recently had a visit from a fairly important Soviet delegation. The NATO issue was not even broached during the political discussions that were held. I, therefore, believe that it will be accepted on the understanding that in NATO Spain will not be pursuing an aggressive, militaristic or warlike policy. It will, of course, pursue a policy of efforts for peace and cooperation with the Eastern bloc countries.

[Question] What about the Arab world's reaction?

[Answer] The Arab countries will understand it too. There might be some reservations in some of the nonmoderate Arab countries. But we have had many contacts with the Arab countries. We have kept them informed of this decision for a long time. Personally, I have found in the Arab countries, with which we maintain manifold relations, an interest in knowing that they have a friend in NATO and a country which has traditionally listened to them sensitively and which maintains good relations with them. Of course, the same applies to the Latin American countries. We have been informing them of this option for some time. This was done, for instance, during the prime minister's recent visit to Mexico in July. The topic was discussed very extensively. When the subject is explained they understand it very well and it will not cause any kind of discontinuity or problems. I believe that Spain must be properly aware of where it stands. And Spain must impart political value to its relations with the West. Because one must be formally admitted to the West with one's due status. And I believe this is the first step. Excellent relations can be maintained with the Third World from within the West and NATO.

Relations With Moscow

[Question] What will be the impact on our relations with the Soviet Union?

[Answer] I am convinced that relations with the Soviet Union, for instance, will be simpler following a clarification. The Soviet Union did not want Spain to join NATO and I believe that at one time it was convinced that it could prevent it. In my opinion, the Soviet Union has now accepted that Spain will join NATO. This provides a clarification. Nevertheless, there will still be something of a propaganda battle. But I believe that the Soviet Union has accepted it. I also believe, of course, that on the whole there are no problems regarding the Third World.

Be that as it may, one cannot rule out the possibility of the propaganda battle being stepped up with sensationalist diplomatic gestures, but of course Spanish foreign policy is formed in Spain through the proper democratic institutions.

[Question] Former Prime Minister Suarez said on one occasion that he had received a letter from Soviet President Brezhnev warning of the negative effects on Europe of NATO entry, including even a recrudescence of terrorism in Spain.

[Answer] Of course, I am not acquainted with this letter, which has already been mentioned to me on occasions. There has also been mention of a letter to Marcelino Oreja, which is nonexistent. I know nothing about the other one. I never discussed the matter with former Prime Minister Suarez or his successor. I repeat that I observed in the Soviet Union and throughout the East European socialist camp a calculation in which they have reached the conclusion that they cannot prevent Spain from joining the Atlantic alliance. And stemming from that a lessening of propaganda. The USSR is accustomed to sending extremely lengthy letters. I want to stress that the subject does not appear in international forums or in the attitude of the press or in communiques. [PCE Secretary General] Carrillo has just been to Yugoslavia. He made some statements on Yugoslav television against Spain's NATO entry. But the Yugoslav press did not report them. The joint communique published at the end of his visit did not mention the subject of Spain's NATO entry either.

Breaking Isolation

[Question] Nevertheless, our future entry into the Atlantic alliance in fact implies the abandonment of our neutralist tradition. Is this aspiration not compatible with steadfast Europeanism?

[Answer] Though it is a very complex issue--I am talking about what is called Spain's neutralist tradition--and though it cannot be simplified completely, it can be compared to a large extent to a policy of isolation on Spain's part. On the one hand, Spain has no role of its own in foreign policy. It is outside the decisionmaking sphere and of course the sphere of war--which is an important aspect. But this does not spare it the phenomenon of war because it experienced it in its colonies and at home. An isolation policy does not rule out conflict. But this is due partly also to a historical phenomenon of decline and political deterioration. On the other hand, it must be stated that the political outlook changed in 1945 with the cold war. It should also be stressed that in 1953 Spain took a very important decision implying a pro-Western stance. NATO membership implies breaking away from the tradition of isolation. And also helping to place the country in a position that will extricate it from its introspection, Spain's obsession with its own problems. In my opinion, NATO entry is a positive factor in placing our country on stable and normal paths. It has also been said that it is a gesture of normalization. It is indeed a normalization, which the country would have carried out before it had not been overrun by the consequences of a civil war and an emergency situation. We want it to be a gesture of normalization and are sure that it will contribute to this normalization. It must also be borne in mind that for the FRG and Italy--European countries which suffered historical traumas comparable to or greater than ours--the taking of this Atlantic option was a decisive element in their political normalization.

Negotiation With Washington

[Question] The PSOE secretary general has said that the decision to join NATO has helped to hold up the negotiations for the renewal of the treaty and that there is reason to fear that in the future Washington will try to channel repayments and the solution of problems into the context of the alliance, while trying to draw maximum advantage from the bases. In this connection, Felipe Gonzalez said that he feared their being used for particular U.S. objectives that do not coincide with those of the alliance.

[Answer] With regard to timing, I insist that in my personal opinion Felipe Gonzalez and his party do not want to face the issue squarely. Nor can it be said the government has used the issue of our membership as a last-minute trick in negotiating the renewal of the treaty with the United States. I completely reject this argument. There are several problems in the negotiations with the United States. The first is the problem of the formal status of our relations, the nature of our relations with the United States.

Is it a matter of granting territorial facilities to be used at will or is there, on the other hand, an alliance treaty between the United States and Spain on an equal footing in defense of certain clearly defined objectives? Is it a matter of leasing bases or of defense cooperation with a view to a planned joint policy? This is the major problem of the negotiations and it will be resolved by Spain's entry into the Atlantic alliance. With our entry into the alliance the United States and the other 14 member countries will become allies.

Bases Statute

[Question] What about the problem of the bases statute?

[Answer] Of course the negotiations with the United States include the subject of the statute covering the bases in Spain; the legal privileges; whether or not they are under the jurisdiction of Spanish courts; whether Spanish or U.S. soldiers are in command, and so forth. This too will be resolved by NATO. Because NATO has model treaties. They will exist with all countries and are practically identical. We will automatically comply with this situation when we enter the Atlantic alliance. There is also another question. What is the purpose of the bases in Spain? Is it, for instance, an exaggerated leasing arrangement, whereby we lease at a price certain facilities with which the United States can do what it wants, on the basis of a particular foreign policy? Can it therefore use them to intervene in the Middle East, Libya, Africa and so forth? If we join the Atlantic alliance, clearly the bases will be placed at the service of a specific objective, which is stated in the treaty. The United States will, therefore, cease to have facilities in Spain for a worldwide policy. From then on it will have bases in Spain specified for a particular geographical area, as laid down in the treaty, moreover. Unless it is for the defense of Europe and North America, as a member of NATO it will have to ask permission it every individual case. Therefore, this problem--a serious one as far as our foreign policy is concerned--will be resolved with our membership.

Tangible Benefits

[Question] How would our entry affect cooperation with the United States?

[Answer] Of course, NATO entry is no magic spell. But of course it is positive [illegible] is a law in the United States which envisages major facilities for granting military aid and cooperation in industrial projects in allied countries. These are the Atlantic alliance countries. Therefore, I believe that there is no better bilateral treaty with the United States than a multilateral treaty. With all due respect, I see a contradiction in Felipe Gonzalez' assertions. Obviously, it would be easier for the Americans to use the bases if protected by a bilateral treaty, purely bilateral relations, in which we are always the weakest. Such a situation would not occur within the Atlantic Council. There we would be in a bloc with other countries and decisions are taken unanimously. Therefore, I believe that the argument embodies a major contradiction.

Southern Flank

[Question] The PSOE also stresses that the military objectives of concern to us are not exactly the same as the alliance's.

[Answer] Yes, they are insisting that NATO entry will not protect us from a conflict on our southern flank. I believe that the important thing for us is to maintain a policy of friendship with the Maghreb. And a policy of cooperation and understanding with Morocco, like the one we have now. The conflict in question is unthinkable in view of this policy of friendship and cooperation with all the countries of the region and especially with our principal southern neighbor. Be that as it may, entry into the alliance will not jeopardize us in any way.

Special Forum

[Question] Nevertheless, we will be entering a forum within which we have very difficult relations with some of its members, in particular a very major bone of contention--Gibraltar--with the United Kingdom.

[Answer] Of course, the alliance is a special forum and helps to resolve problems. It must be borne in mind that the alliance has been joined by countries such as Greece and Turkey which have no political conflicts [as published]. They have waged a savage war historically for centuries. An outright ethnic, cultural and religious confrontation. Since joining NATO they have not resolved all their problems. But through political discussions, relations between Greece and Turkey have improved and are basically normal, though one must remember that it is a historical conflict. We have problems with France and underdeveloped relations with Portugal. But NATO also embraces the FRG, France and Britain, which have waged two world wars. Furthermore, entry into the Atlantic alliance will help to ensure that Spain is not a "special case." Of course, our entry will not resolve all our problems, but it will help to a large and, I believe, decisive, extent. And it will resolve the Gibraltar problem.

Gibraltar, a Military Issue

[Question] In what way will our membership facilitate this process?

[Answer] We will not oversimplify the subject. Gibraltar has not been recovered for a large number of reasons. Spain was a special, isolated country, whereas Britain was a member of the Atlantic alliance. Because we must not forget that the military aspect of Gibraltar was the the root of this dispute. Queen Anne wanted a presence in the Mediterranean because it guaranteed her a base in her big-power game in Europe at that time. Later it was on the way to the Indias and within the Atlantic alliance. Now if we reverse this factor--with all the difficulty that this implies--and achieve military cooperation in terms that make it possible for Spain, we are really laying the cornerstone for resolving the Gibraltar problem. Because from then on we will become masters of Gibraltar. I repeat that nothing miraculous must be expected from our entry into the Atlantic alliance. It is in fact the Atlantic alliance's enemies who are trying to demand this kind of diabolical approval. "Prove to me that it will resolve all our problems," they say. It is no cure-all. But I believe that properly understood, it is clear that NATO entry will help decisively in resolving these problems.

[Question] What is your assessment of the British House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee's recent report on Gibraltar?

[Answer] This document, a lengthy "paper," contains all kinds of things. Therefore, there is no reason to rejoice or to raise hopes that will later be disappointed. But for the first time there is a more multifaceted report from the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee. In some of its points it is clearly positive for Spain. For the first time, an effort is being made on Britain's part to understand the Spanish position. Never before has any British body--let alone one with the importance of the House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee--officially even made an effort to understand the "Spanish case" [in English in original]. Thanks to certain members of Parliament, particularly Professor Hill, this paper has done so. From the outset, it presents the Gibraltarian case and the Spanish viewpoint and this is very important.

New British Activity

[Question] What would you single out from the conclusions of this report?

[Answer] One very important aspect is that for the first time an effort of understanding has been made. This itself reveals a change of attitude. There are two important conclusions, one--the main one--which states that Spanish-British relations are more important than the Gibraltar issue. As far as I am concerned this the the right road. If the British accept this we are on the right road. I do not know when it will happen, because I am not overconfident, but we are on the right road. Second, there is another topic, which will be the subject of greater polemics and more debate in the British Parliament. These are the formal commitments made by successive parliaments not to transfer sovereignty over Gibraltar without the population's consent. Ways can be found without jeopardizing a decision that will respect the principle that friendship with Spain is more important. Of course, I would stress the effort with respect to Spain's position that is being made for the first time. Having said that, the Gibraltar issue is a thorny one. I have some experience of dealings with the British and of course any superficial optimism would be irresponsible.

No Additional Dangers

[Question] The public, who do not regard the topic with much enthusiasm, believe that there could be additional dangers.

[Answer] Except for very rare exceptions, a defense agreement is not, of course, a subject of very great popular interest. There are no additional dangers to the ones that could exist on account of our position and our present relations with the United States. Not only are there no dangers but, on the contrary, there are advantages. As far as the parties are concerned, German Foreign Minister Genscher, for instance, reminded me in Hamburg of certain aspects with which I was already acquainted concerning Bonn's NATO entry. The SPD, the Social Democrats, mounted a major campaign of opposition at the time. The decision was taken by the Bundestag with a one vote majority. At that time there was a campaign very similar to the one being mounted by the Socialists here. They wore stickers which read "Ohne Mich" without me. And the entire Socialist Party, including then Deputy Schmidt, voted against it. I do not want to go into what the Socialists are going to do. But I have the impression that we are in the same situation. Apart from which the PSOE has on previous occasions demonstrated a strong Atlanticist aspiration.

"A La Carte" Entry

[Question] Has the government examined the characteristics of our military cooperation?

[Answer] The options open to us are very extensive. Iceland, for instance, has practically no armed forces. Norway and Denmark are integrated. They have national commands on their own territories and host no foreign forces. France belongs to the Atlantic alliance but at present does not belong to the majority of military defense committees. It does belong to some of them. Germany hosts troops from almost all the countries, and so forth. Spain must therefore select its national interests from the "menu." The Defense Ministry has of course outlined some ideas. For instance, we would like to have some national commands. We know that we will not have command over Portugal because the Portuguese do not want us to. We already know this and it constitutes no problem. I believe that we will have command over Gibraltar. There are no obligatory regulations or permanent obligations. The alliance fully respects U.S. sovereignty. NATO is in fact an example of freedom and it really is possible to belong to it as one likes.

Inserting Bases

[Question] What will Spain's first objective be once we have joined?

[Answer] To insert the presence of bases into the context of the alliance and to provide Atlantic cover for them.

On that basis a process of adaptation will take place. Spain will, furthermore, play a dynamic role. In other words, Spain will join the cooperation committees. And we will express an opinion not only on what concerns Spain, which is a very typical approach to our foreign policy. We must also, for instance, express our opinion on how to organize the line of defense in Bavaria, what is to be done in the Eastern Mediterranean, what is best for the North Sea, and so forth. And I hope that this will prompt interest in Spain. Because it would be a sign that this country has become normalized.

[Question] Does the government have any plans to deploy Spanish troops in Europe?

[Answer] In principle, there are no plans for this. However, we could have troops "assigned" to the FRG. In other words, troops ready for transportation to a theater of operations in Germany or Italy, the equipment and training of whom would be a wonderful task for the army in which we would be assisted by all the Atlantic alliance countries. But there are no plans to deploy troops outside national territory on a permanent basis.

[Question] What about the possible use of the Rota base for nuclear weapons?

[Answer] Rota was built for the Polaris submarines. The present submarines, the Tridents, do not need this installation any longer. I must also say that this subject--the possible storage of nuclear weapons in Spain--was not one of the U.S. requests during the negotiations. There are countries in the alliance that have nuclear weapons on their territory because they want to and other countries that do not. Of course, we will not have them. Moreover, neither the neutron bomb nor the Pershing missile is a problem for Spain. The Pershing missiles are medium-range and it would therefore not make sense to deploy them in Spain. And the neutron bomb is a theater weapon, an anti-tank weapon which it would be pointless to deploy in Spain, where there is no possibility of a direct tank battle.

False Argument

[Question] Last, some sectors believe that our possible membership conceals a lack of international success.

[Answer] This assertion is unfair. The case of Morocco is quite clear. The public are alarmed when a fishing boat is captured, for instance, but it must be stressed that over 1,000 Spanish fishing vessels fish in Moroccan waters every day. Of course, we have good relations with Rabat. There is no concealment with regard to the Common Market issue either. This is a different matter from NATO. We are joining the alliance after serious analysis because it is in our interests and because the right time has arrived to deal with the issue, as far as its defense and military aspects and aspects regarding the United States are concerned, and also because of something that I did not mention earlier. Because if we do not deal with the matter actively rather than as a potential--as is usually the case--we will be abandoning the Atlantic option. The Common Market issue is different and extraordinarily complex. Obviously, there are objective difficulties which stem basically from the fact that we are conducting negotiations at a time of economic crisis. This complicates trading relations. I hope that Spain's progressive investigation of the Atlantic alliance and defense topics will open further doors. I stress that I do not consider it a cure-all. But it is meaningless to say that Spain's entry into the Atlantic alliance will hinder our Common Market entry. There is an erroneous idea in Spain that NATO is bad and the EEC good. Nevertheless, when the time for our membership comes there will be a better debate on the subject than now. If EEC negotiations were to be completed now there would be major polemics and we would undoubtedly be accused of undue haste and of failing to defend Spain's economic interests. The government wishes to enter all the European forums. In fact, our possible membership of the Atlantic alliance implies a step toward a more European position.

MINISTER OLIART OUTLINES DEFENSE CONSIDERATIONS

PM171005 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 4 Sep 81 p 10

[Pablo Sebastian interview with Spanish Defense Minister Alberto Oliart; date and place not given]

[Text] Question: The government is drawing up the national defense plan, the budget for which soon will have to be presented to parliament. Does the plan consider the Atlantic option? When will it be completed?

Answer: The defense plan, which will have a 10-year duration, could be presented to parliament in October, I believe. Of course, if parliament approves the process of Spain's integration into NATO, modifications will have to be introduced and it will have to be adopted, for instance, in connection with the standardization and modernization of our armaments, but always taking into account our own independent defense capability.

Furthermore, it must be pointed out that, while political membership in NATO is one thing, the mode of entry into the allied defense system is another, which will have to be negotiated in the months ahead. In this connection, the government will have to examine whether it wishes to join this or that NATO committee, though it will belong to the major ones. This membership in Atlantic committees always will be the subject of continuous negotiation within NATO, so as to adapt to defense requirements at all times. There are some committees, such as NATO's so-called Eurogroup, in which the allied countries standardize their weapons production, which is of great interest to Spain.

Question: Nevertheless, there seems to be some degree of waste and confusion in the organization of Spain's defense within the Western framework. The renewal of the bilateral treaty with the United States, for instance, has now been subordinated to NATO entry. Why this change?

Answer: In fact, what has happened is that one aspect has evolved faster than the other, the former being the NATO option, announced by Prime Minsiter Calvo-Sotelo in his inaugural speech. Bilateral negotiations were started late, in April, and hitherto there has been insufficient time to complete these talks, which on previous occasions usually lasted a year or 18 months. Within them certain problems have emerged, stemming from the fact that the U.S. budget is now set and that it will be necessary to wait until the next fiscal year to obtain reciprocal technological and military-industrial cooperation for which we are hoping. There is also the matter of the so-called security clause which can be resolved more easily through NATO membership. This all made it advisable to give priority to NATO and to suspend the bilateral treaty for 8 months, with the aim of awiating the new fiscal year, leaving more time for bilateral negotiations and being able to define military cooperation requirements from the viewpoint of the Atlantic option.

Question: But is it not a political error to extend a treaty signed in 1976 outside the existing Spanish democracy, the substance of which does not greatly benefit Spain? Wouldn't it have been better for the government to renegotiate the bilateral treaty with the Carter administration before waiting to see what would happen with Reagan?

Answer: I believe that one should not be too dogmatic with regard to the extension of an "undemocratic" treaty. We have inherited legislation from the previous era but the Cortes has worked continuously to adapt it and still has a great deal of work ahead. As for whether we should have negotiated with Carter, it must be pointed out that it was the United States itself which suggested to us a postponement until after the U.S. election. Since then, many things have happened, such as the February events and the change of government--hence the delay which is causing the extension of the agreement.

Question: In view of the priority which the government has given to the Atlantic option, how does the cabinet interpret the signing of a multilateral defense agreement with countries such as France and the United Kingdom, for instance, with which Spain has major disputes such as the EEC and terrorism with Paris and, above all, the Gibraltar issue?

Answer: The things that unite us with the Atlantic alliance countries are much more important than the bilateral disputes that might divide us. Moreover, I believe that these problems could be resolved much more easily within the alliance framework than outside.

"Spanish Military Command in Gibraltar"

Question: Is it, therefore, possible to envisage Spain within NATO with Gibraltar under British sovereignty?

Answer: It is possible to envisage Spain in NATO with Spanish military command in Gibraltar where, moreover, there are other problems apart from the military one, such as those of the population and the territory. These problems could be promptly resolved.

Question: Does that mean that a Spanish military command in Gibraltar could be the center for a Spanish military command covering the Gibraltar Strait and the Mediterranean region? How would other regions, such as the Bay of Biscay and the Canary Islands, be protected within the NATO framework?

Answer: Spanish command over Gibraltar and the strait would, as has been traditional in the area, be organized from Cadiz, but in general terms what Spain wants within NATO is exclusive Spanish command over all its territory and adjacent waters, control over the Bay of Biscay, the Balearic area, the Strait of Gibraltar and, of course, the Canary Islands, with Spanish bases on the archipelago, naturally.

Question: What about Ceuta and Melilla? Isn't it true that NATO will not defend Ceuta and Melilla in the event of an attack on these Spanish cities? Is there any possibility of this defense guarantee being included in the bilateral agreement with Washington?

Answer: The Washington treaty does not include Ceuta and Melilla in its article concerning the NATO zone of influence but does, however, accept in another article the defense of the territory of allied countries. In the event of a conflict, prior consultations would have to be held and these are also envisaged in the official documents.

This is a complex situation because, for instance, within the NATO context the defense of the cities against a sea attack would be accepted, but not against land attack, in which case the consultations that I mentioned would have to take place. The bilateral treaty cannot provide this defense guarantee because it applies only to a possible Warsaw Pact attack on Spain.

On the other hand, it must be pointed out that the government will try to obtain all possible guarantees within the allied framework, though of course Spain will guarantee the defense of both cities in the event of a conflict, which I do not consider possible, with [word illegible]. Be that as it may, what we must do is to improve and strengthen relations with Morocco. We also should consider whether the situation in the area would improve if we expressly mention Ceuta and Melilla in the NATO negotiations or whether, on the other hand, it would create further tensions.

Question: Another subject in this debate is the deployment of nuclear weapons in NATO countries. What is the government's stance on this?

Answer: Well, the government has made it quite clear that it will not accept the deployment of nuclear weapons on our territory. In any case, there would be no point in deploying tactical weapons on Spanish territory since such weapons could not reach the Warsaw Pact countries from the peninsula in the event of a conflict.

Question: It has even been said in certain official circles as an argument in favor of Spain's joining NATO that membership in the Atlantic alliance also will involve certain army officers with putschist leanings in new national and multilateral defense tasks. What do you think about this?

Answer: I believe that this analysis is better suited to a cartoon strip than anything else. What is true is that the Spanish Armed Forces will have new combined defense responsibilities, such as those that the navy already has in several combined naval exercises. Of course, the navy could become part of the alliance's defense system tomorrow. The army and air force need further, more complex and gradual modifications. Furthermore, the psychological effects of NATO entry on the Spanish Armed Forces is something about which it is very difficult to make any forecasts or analyses.

Question: Some opposition circles have protested high ranking military officers' making statements in favor of Spain's entry into NATO and thus entering the political debate. What is the Defense Ministry's opinion on this subject?

Answer: The top army leaders have made it clear that this is a political issue. Their strategic opinions and military assessments concerning Spain's interests in connection with negotiations with NATO and in accordance with the requests that the government has made to the various military commands for the purposes of its technical reports on the subject are another matter. In this connection, it is natural for important assessments of advantages and disadvantages to be made.

"NATO Completes Our Integration Into the West"

Question: The aspect of assessments embraces the armaments issue. Perhaps, for instance, NATO membership could harm Spanish production because of standardization with Europe, such as in the case of the Cetma rifle. Furthermore, there is the matter of aircraft of which there are plans to buy 142. What is the position on these issues in relation to NATO and the bilateral agreement?

Answer: I believe that many of the Spanish weapons can be brought into line with Europe's while others will have to be modernized. The Cetmo case could be the subject of negotiations within the allied framework. What can be said about the aircraft is that there will not be as many as was first thought. There could be 90-100. A political decision about which aircraft to choose has not yet been made. It could be the F-16 or F-18, but that is a decision that has yet to be made. The French Mirage was ruled out because it is not even listed. In any case, we already have over 60 Mirages in our air force and it is advisable in this situation to diversify one's armaments. We would like easy payment terms for the aircraft as a reciprocation in the bilateral agreement, but this is not so easy because of the problem of U.S. aid. Other kinds of compensation can be obtained such as those concerning the extension or granting of certain licenses for the construction of other less sophisticated weapons. All this is now being negotiated.

Question: Couldn't the government's quick decision to join NATO be interpreted as a political operation designed, among other things, to conceal the difficulties in Spanish foreign policy, for instance, concerning EEC entry, relations with France, Morocco, the crisis in Equatorial Guinea and so forth?

"Relations With EEC Not Frozen"

Answer: I don't regard relations with the EEC as frozen. There are internal problems within the EEC that must be resolved, but I believe that the EEC countries do want Spain to join them. I also do not believe that relations with France are any worse at the moment. I believe that in the past 4 months we have enjoyed a better situation in our dialogue with Paris than we did before. In short, I believe that the NATO issue does not replace other options and that it completes our integration into the West on the defense plane in accordance with the government's program.

I DHILINI SAYS KIPRIANOU VISIT TO MOSCOW CANCELED

NC171902 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 17 Sep 81 p 1

[Text] Kiprianou's visit to Moscow will not take place this autumn, as was officially announced a few months ago. According to authoritative information received by this newspaper, the Soviet leadership does not favor a visit by President Kiprianou to Moscow at this time because efforts are being exerted for a solution of the Cyprus issue. Moscow reportedly does not want to displease the Turks, who may possible consider an official visit as an indication of Soviet support for the Greek Cypriot view.

According to the same information, President Kiprianou's visit to Moscow is not even now being encouraged by AKEL which, as we write in other columns, is preparing ways to separate itself from Mr Kiprianou and his government.

PAPER ENDORSES IDEA OF ALL-PARTY GOVERNMENT

NC172022 Nicosia APOGEVMATINI in Greek 16 Sep 81 pp 1, 8

[Editorial by A. Likavyis: "Yes! A Government of Popular Strength"]

[Text] It is not the first time parties and personalities have raised the idea of forming a strong ecumenical or national unity government. Thus, neither is the position expressed by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou new for the party--which principally supports the current government--nor is the viewpoint expressed by interlocutor G. Ioannidhis accidental. The difference is that Ioannidhis, who was not the first to "cast the stone," has drawn the volleys of criticism and the "insinuations" of men in the government establishment.

But this is not significant. Of significance is the fact that the demand for a representative government of unity with a broad base (in any case broader than 19 percent of the electorate) has been reiterated more strongly because the need for such a lineup currently is more urgent than ever before.

The burden of historical responsibility is too excessive to be borne on the small or large shoulders of a small or large party, and if now--even though late--when the future and the existence of the country and the people is at stake is not the hour for such a strong representative government, then when will it be? If the principal party suggests to the third party, which is in power, this necessity, which is embraced by other groups, then what other message does the president need to proceed with the gesture that will strengthen his position and divide his responsibilities among others?

And when the person most competent to know the consequences of our weaknesses as these appear on the battlefield of the Cyprus issue--which is the table of negotiations--that is, the interlocutor, considers that a strong government of national unity is needed, then the responsible people should ponder the problem and not reject it without consideration and indirectly shoot arrows attributing intentions other than the national interest.

The argument that Makarios did not favor and did not do something of the kind does not stand up. First, because Makarios himself was a president above parties, and by documentation his was an all-party government in the sense that it enjoyed the approval of all political forces.

Second, after the coup, the ethnarch decided upon a government of national unity and actually had made a first selection of party cadres, but some other events--unrelated to the issue under discussion--prevented its formation. Makarios' closest advisers know sufficiently well what we mean.

However, there is a third fact that some people want to forget--the fact that Makarios was unique, his broadness huge, his stature great and his prestige universal. Consequently, in him there was indigenous strength, whereas now there are inherent weaknesses that are enhanced by the exacerbation of party passions and ratified by electoral percentages.

This is the whole truth and only cheap flatterers can convey it altered to places where honest people want to send it undistorted.

We do not intend to criticize the president, not because of fear but because we believe that we should correctly convey the message to him, not our message, but the message of the country and the people and the demand is for a strong government of unity that will reflect popular will and not single-party weaknesses, a strong government that will be able to guide the country's bleeding future intercepting obvious dangers and defusing evident traps.

I DHILINI SAYS AKEL TO STOP SUPPORTING DIKO

NC172034 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 17 Sep 81 p 1

[Excerpt] AKEL is preparing for a new divorce with DIKO [Democratic Party] and to take its support from the Kiprianou government. According to verified information received by this newspaper, this matter was discussed at a recent meeting of the party's Central Committee and pertinent decisions on the way to prepare for the "divorce" were adopted.

The implementation of the plan has already begun, with the first shot being fired against the Kiprianou government in the recent speech by AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou made in Limassol. Papaioannou said that DIKO's one-party government can neither resolve the Cyprus issue nor the people's serious problems.

Following Papaioannou's speech, the newspaper APOYEVMATINI, which leans toward AKEL, took the baton and in its editorial yesterday called on President Kiprianou to accept AKEL's demands for the formation of a political government, and simultaneously reminding him that the third strongest party cannot ignore the recommendations of AKEL, the strongest party.

MESIMVRINI ON DEMONSTRATIONS AT PAPANDREOU HOUSE

[Text] The strong and persistent protests of followers and friends of dropped PASOK deputies continued yesterday. Mr Papandreou's villa "Galini" at Kastri was occupied again for 3 hours with protestors voicing shouts and rhythmic slogans and hoisting placards. The protestors asked to visit the party chairman, which they again did not manage to accomplish.

Yesterday, hundreds of demonstrators--mainly from Piraievs and the surrounding municipalities--were so persistent in their demand for a delegation to be accepted that the gendarmerie had to be called in for protection. The protests concerned the dropping of Mr A. Perdhikouri.

Meanwhile, strong protest cables were sent to press offices protesting the dropping of deputies from Akhaia, Ilia, second Piraievs district, Attiki and other districts. Slogans heard yesterday at Kastri included "Papandreou, you betrayed us" and "The people's party disregards the people."

The protestors remained near "Galini" villa until later at night and demanded a meeting with Papandreou. They ultimately succeeded in handing to the secretary of the PASOK chairman a memorandum with 2,500 signatures.

--A cable was sent by 300 followers of the PASOK struggle committee protesting the dropping of Perdhikouris. Papandreou was warned that if he did not rectify himself he would have to account for his mistake.

--A cable in support of Perdhikouris was also sent by Mr N. Dhafereas (town of Perama) with the note that 19 signatures will follow.

--According to reports from Ilia, the strong protests against the dropping of Mr B. Papadhopoulos will also be continued today.

According to certain information, PASOK circles yesterday expressed "certain faint hopes of Papadhopoulos' restoration. However, other officials considered this unlikely, while they stressed that a possible attempt at restoration would cause new agitation, since this would force another candidate to be dropped and new rage will erupt."

UNITED DEMOCRATIC PARTY LEANING TOWARD PASOK

[Editorial: "EDA Is in Favor of PASOK...."]

[Excerpt] Mr Ilias Iliou and the United Democratic Left [EDA] were particularly favored by the "New Democracy" government and leaders. Mr Iliou was recognized as a political leader and...EDA as a party with full privileges in the Chamber of Deputies.... However, Iliou and EDA proved to be ungrateful to their benefactors... Instead of a countrywide endeavor to concentrate their small number of votes and thus deprive the opponents of their benefactors of them, they decided to support and vote for PASOK with their strength... However, EDA's decision has no qualitative importance; it is only of moral significance. It chases after Papandreou's family... Its identity is:

--For many years--substantively until 1967 and formally until 1974, EDA was the KKE substitute. But when the parties and the press revealed this at the time, EDA and AVYI [its organ] protested. Now EDA confesses that it was an organ of the KKE and the Soviet Union without a will of its own.

RALLIS ACCUSES PASOK LEADER OF BREAKING 'CALM'

NC151150 Paris AFP in English 1129 GMT 15 Sep 81

[Excerpts] Athens, 15 Sep (AFP)--The Greek Government headed since May 1979 by George Rallis resigned just after 1000 GMT today, it was officially announced here. The resignation, accepted by President Konstandinos Karamanlis, has been expected for three months and prepares the way for a general election due to take place on October 18. The outgoing premier was asked to set up a caretaker government, which will be sworn in on Thursday morning.

The present ministers of the interior, justice and northern Greece, too "tainted" by their conservative views, will be replaced, at the request of the socialist opposition, by non-parliamentarians, to ensure smooth carrying out of the elections.

Before seeing the president Mr Rallis presided at a final cabinet meeting, which, according to some political observers, took the form of a council of war by his New Democracy party. He accused Andreas Papandreou, leader of the Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement, of being responsible for breaking up the calm that characterised the election campaign until recently.

In the current parliament, elected in November 1977, 175 of the 300 seats are held by the ruling New Democracy party, and 93 by Andreas Papandreou's Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK). Recent polls indicated the socialists were likely to obtain a majority, though observers said things could change and they expected a tough campaign. The socialist leader will play up what he feels to be the Greek people's desire for change after more than 30 years of conservative government.

PAPANDREOU-AVEROF EXCHANGE ON ECONOMIC REPORT

NC170958 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 16 Sep 81 p 2

[Text] Leader of the official opposition and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou has made the following statement:

"In his letter to the prime minister, Deputy Prime Minister Averof presents a relief picture of the bankruptcy of the economic policy pursued by the 'New Democracy' governments. His conclusions confirm to the letter all that I have stated and continue to state in my contacts with the Greek people, that is:

"1. A deficit in the public sector of 300 billion drachma for 1981. This deficit not only decisively encourages inflation but also deprives the private sector of the credit necessary to stop recession and unemployment.

"2. Credit allocations to businessmen in small- and medium-sized enterprises as well as productive credit allocations to the farmers are unbelievably insufficient. This makes it clear that the country's banking system functions practically exclusively for the interest of the large monopolistic conglomerates of the country. This explains stagnation and the drop of productivity in our country.

"3. For 1981, the balance of foreign payments stands at $3 billion, as I had forecast in my relevant speech in the Chamber of Deputies.

"4. In 1981, the foreign exchange reserve was lowered by $1 billion as I recently emphasized. A great proportion of this lowering is the result of unacceptable administrative errors by the Bank of Greece and the Ministry of Coordination.

"5. The cost of living index is not correct. It does not count the true high prices which, on a day-to-day basis, shrink the workers' incomes.

"We have promised to the people that when we take over the country's administration we will present a full balance sheet of what we take over. The deputy prime minister has already helped us by making preliminary reports. It is clear that PASOK, as we have often emphasized, will take over an economy which is on the verge of bankruptcy. It is worthy of wonder, I would even say it is unbelievable, that the 'New Democracy' government, the appropriate ministers and the prime minister himself, although fully aware of the critical condition of the Greek economy, daily appear in the act of selling off the Greek state. And they do not even have the courage to tell the truth about it to the people of Greece. This is exactly what we describe as the scorched earth policy. It is obvious that their line of thinking is based on the theory: 'If New Democracy is going to sink then why not sink Greece as well?'

"For this very reason they have a heavy responsibility--I would say an historic responsibility--toward the Greek nation and the people of Greece.

"The present prime minister has a heavy responsibility, because he attempted to deceive the Greek people on the state of the Greek economy in his speech at the Thessaloniki international trade fair. The deputy prime minister and minister of national defense also bears a heavy responsibility because for the past 7 years he was a member of the 'New Democracy' governments and because he did not consider it his duty, since he took over responsibility for the economic sector, to inform the prime minister as well as the Greek people at the expense of whose standard of living 'New Democracy' is committing its depravities.

"Naturally on 18 October the Greek people will have the crushing defeat in store for them, a defeat unprecedented for the rightwing. After this defeat 'New Democracy' will be led to decomposition, to fragmentation and to a competition of the old and new dauphines. The 'leaking' of the deputy prime minister's report is obviously a stentorious proof of this."

Answering Papandreou late last night, Averof made the following statement:

"The extent to which the statement of the leader of the opposition distorts my position on economic affairs can be seen by the statement which, by coincidence, I released at approximately the same time, explaining the conditions under which my report to the prime minister was prepared on 8 July. Anyone who takes the trouble to read the texts will be absolutely convinced. I explained that since then [8 July] the situation improved in all sectors and that what I had originally written does not apply to the current situation.

"I will reiterate only one point in order to illustrate: The dollar which at that time was increasing in value in relation to all currencies, had reached 64 drachmas and there were numerous forecasts of further increases. Such an eventuality would have disturbed the cost of living index, the balance of foreign payments as well as other elements of our economy. The dollar, however, started on a downward trend. Today it stands at 58 drachmas and this, combined with a revival of the economy, creates different prospects than those which, logically, existed in early July.

"Why should Papandreou take all this into consideration, however? Faithful to his mentality, Papandreou considers only that which will give him votes which he does not have--a fact which the night of 18 October will reveal to him. Papandreou has lived abroad for most of his years. For this reason he does not know how mentally mature the Greeks are. He will discover this on that night which will be fateful to him."

MITSOTAKIS CITES GOOD RELATIONS WITH YUGOSLAVIA

FOREIGN MINISTER HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE IN LONDON

TA171526 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Report by correspondent Ovul Tezisler from London--recorded]

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who held a meeting with British Foreign Secretary and EEC Ministerial Council President Lord Carrington yesterday, held a news conference at the Turkish Embassy in London today. In his news conference, Turkmen commented on his meeting with Lord Carrington. Pointing out that bilateral relations, Turkish-EEC cooperation, the Cyprus issue, the Middle East and various international problems were discussed during his meeting with Lord Carrington, Turkmen said that he also briefed the British foreign secretary on the efforts to return to democracy in Turkey. Turkmen said: Britain trusts that democracy will be established in Turkey.

[Turkmen] A few months ago, we reached an agreement with the EEC on conducting political consultations on the ministerial level from time to time and when necessitated by international developments. I held my first consultation in The Hague in April with Netherlands Foreign Minister van der Klaauw. The second consultation was held with the current political cooperation president, Lord Carrington. I met with Lord Carrington for some 3 and 1/2 hours. We reviewed various issues; the situation in the Middle East, the Arab-Israel conflict, the Iraq-Iran war, Namibia, Turkish-EEC relations and the Cyprus problem. We also discussed Afghanistan within the framework of [word indistinct].

[Tezisler] In reply to a question on whether there has been a change in the way Western countries view Turkey since 12 September 1980, Turkmen said: Certain circles are from time to time leveling criticisms against Turkey and expressing their doubts because of certain fixed ideas, ideologies or political views. However, all the sensible people in Europe are fully confident that a parliamentary democracy will be established in Turkey. Noting that Britain wants the Cyprus problem to be resolved as soon as possible, Turkmen said that the Turkish Cypriot community took its most important step in this direction by submitting the new proposals to the Greek Cypriot side. Noting that Turkey is exerting efforts to become a full member of the EEC, the foreign minister said that Lord Carrington shares Turkey's views concerning Turkish-EEC cooperation. Turkmen also noted that the two countries' approach to the subjects discussed during the meetings are very similar.

Turkmen will leave for Brussels today and hold a meeting with the Belgian foreign minister. Turkmen will also meet with EEC Commission President Gaston Thorn in Luxembourg and then leave for New York to attend the UN General Assembly meetings.

MINISTER OZAL DISCUSSES ECONOMIC PROBLEMS, GOALS

TA171553 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1515 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] Edirne, 17 Sep (AA)--Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal warned today that there is no possibility for Turkey to obtain foreign credits anymore. We can cope with the problems by working hard, he said.

Speaking to the members of the trade and industrial chambers in Edirne, Ozal said: "The situation we are in today indicates that the problems can be solved. I do not claim that they have been solved. We still need a year or two. If we had not taken austerity measures, Turkey today would be in a very difficult position.

Ozal said that although the basic principle was free market economy, it was difficult to get rid of the implementations of long years. State interference in economic life has been brought down and the high interest policy has helped the accumulation of bank deposits, he added. He said black market has been (?wrapped up) and the rate of inflation will be brought down to less than 35 percent by the end of the year.

He said the inflation rate will still be a problem confronting the economy next year because of psychological effects. He said interest rates may drop next year in accordance with the economic development. He urged banks to open credits to more risky fields.

Ozal drew attention to the fact that agriculture was the basic element of Turkey's economy and warned against inflationary trends of the past. Instead of very high support prices to agricultural products, better credit possibilities should be created he said. On industrial products, he said certain goods should be imported even though they are produced locally, in order to control prices effectively. Otherwise faulty methods will continue he added.

Drawing attention to the serious problem of unemployment, he said it was not possible to solve it in a short period. But he added as the result of the free interest policy, investments are expected to shift to labour-intensive sectors.

GOVERNMENT OBJECTIONS TO EEC DEMARCHE ON AEGEAN

TA171703 Ankara Domesatic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] It has been announced that Turkey is in favor of solving its problems with Greece through bilateral talks and that for this reason the two sides must refrain from making unilateral decisions.

A report drawn up to redetermine the customs borders of the EEC following Greece's full membership in the community contains certain views that run counter to Turkey's regarding the Aegean Sea. The report which was drawn up by French parliamentarian Marie Madelaine (Turcak), who is the reporter for the European Parliament Foreign Relations Committee, says that the question of rights in the Aegean concerns all the members of the EEC and therefore EEC officials must participate in the talks. The report also says that Greece's territorial waters extend to 12 miles and that the Greek islands, together with their continental shelves, territoral waters and economic regions, must be included within the community borders.

Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in London on an official visit, has commented on this report saying that even if it is accepted at the end of the European Parliamentary debate on it today, it will not carry any weight. Replying to a question on the issue, Turkmen said: The right of the islands' sea has not been granted to Greece in international law. As you know, tne Law of the Sea agreement is still being discussed. This agreement which is still under discussion does not grant the right of the islands' sea to Greece. Such a right is granted only when the country in question is made up solely of islands. Greece does not have such a geographical makeup.

Meanwhile, Turkey distributed a letter of protest to the parliamentarians in Strasbourg in connection with the report which they will discuss at the European Parliament today. Our correspondents in Strasbourg report that the letter explains Turkey's views rega ding the rights in the Aegean. The letter also stresses that the problems between Turkey and Greece must be resolved through bilateral negotiations. Recalling that the EEC upholds the principle of keeping away from the political conflicts among its members, the letter urges the community to maintain its constructive and balanced stand regarding the Turkish-Greece dialogue. The letter says that Greece rejects Turkey's continental shelf rights in the Aegean. It stresses that this view will lead to very serious problems. It also states that Turkey will never again agree to the extension of the Greek territorial waters to 12 miles. It points that if that were the case 64 percent of the Aegean Sea would belong to Greece and Turkey would not be able to have access to the Aegean Sea or even to the Mediterranean.

The last part of the letter recalls that according to the legal status of the continental shelf, it is impossible to include the continental shelves of the islands to the community's customs borders.

TCP SECRETARY BILEN'S REPORT TO PARTY PLENUM

Part Three

TA131015 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 13 Sep 81

[Part three of the report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] The economic power of the monopolies and the political power of the state are melting into each other with every passing day; they are combining. The leaders of the monopolies are joining with the administration of the state, and the higher bureaucracy is joining with the administration of the monopolies. Ozal, the representative of the local and foreign monopolies, is the deputy prime minister. The generals of the 12 March 1971 coup and their likes are sitting in armchairs in administrative councils of the banks. Furthermore, the state planning organization is guiding the economy in a way that will benefit the monopolies. The budget's tax policy serves this purpose mostly. A process of the establishment of a monopolist state capitalism is developing in our country based on the exploitation of the public sector.

What are the results of this development in relation to the revolutionary process? First of all, the monopolies are climbing up the steps toward the monopolist state capitalism under conditions of harsh class struggle. The monopolization process is moving in parallel with the quantitative increase and (?socialization) of the proletariat. The proletariat's struggle against the bourgeoisie is becoming more effective. The local and foreign monopolies are spreading their exploitation to all the middle strata. They are extending their hands into agriculture. They are causing the destruction and poverty of millions of small villagers. The nonmonopolist capitalist establishments are either taken under the control of monopolies or they [words indistinct]. The conflicts between the collaborationist monopolies and the nonmonopolist sector are deepening. The exploitation by the foreign and mulinationalist monopolies is growing. The rivalry between the local market and the local monopolies is becoming harsher. Consequently, the monopolization widens the base of the anti-imperialist and democratic struggle. In this way, the anti-imperialist nature and the antimonopolist character of the general democratic struggle become deeper.

Intermingling with the dependence on imperialism and, in agriculture, with the relations of precapitalist feudal systems, this monopolization incites social conflicts and class struggles. The answer of imperialism and its collaborator, the monopolist bourgeois, to this situation is increasing oppression and brute force.

As Lenin said, monopoly means reaction in every field. The same is true in our country. Actually, this is even more valid for our country, because here it is not only a matter of the local monopolies resorting to oppression and brute force for excessive profits, but also of imperialism--to which the local monopolies are tied--resorting to oppression and brute force, undertaking activities to disrupt the inner balance of the country, to provoke terrorism and to undermine the democratization process, all for the purpose of keeping Turkey within the imperialist system.

The economic basis of this is constituted by the sovereignty of the imperialist financial establishments, such as the IMF and the World Bank, and of the multinational imperialist monopolies on the national economy, and also by the interests of the arms monopolies which drown the country, through NATO, by means of heavy military burdens.

At this stage, the local monopolies are especially the source of reaction and chauvinism. No matter how they yearn to export capital to the foriegn markets, these monopolies do not have the [words indistinct] except to step up their merciless exploitation within the national borders and carry it out by means of brute force.

That is why it is the dream of the high-ranking sectors of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie, such as Koc and Sabanci, to become the junior partner of the United States or of the FRG, like Israel or Egypt. Some of them, however, are trying to mount imperialism's war chariot by playing an expansionist role in the region with the slogans of "The Turks of Kirkuk," "The Turkmens of Iran," "The Dodecanese Islands and the sharing of the Aegean Sea."

The role played in our country by imperialism is especially reactionary, because in its effort to keep Turkey within the imperialist system at a time when the general crisis of imperialism is at a new peak, the United States resorts to every kind of pressure or blackmail. Without breaking the anti-imperialist forces, it is impossible for the imperialist forces to use Turkey to fill the vacancy left by Iran, to turn Turkey into a gendarme in the region, to pull it into the Persian Gulf adventures or to turn it into an accomplice to the amphibious forces, to the U.S. gangsters. That was the basic factor which led our country to a deep crisis prior to 12 September 1980. It was the local and foreign monopolies' passion for profits and U.S. imperialism's expansionist goals. In order to place the burden of the crisis onto the workers, the enemies of our people used all their means to incite reaction and terrorism, and supported all the provocations in order to usurp the democratic freedoms and institutions from the hands of our people.

Prior to the 12 September 1980 coup, the imperialist secret services, the reactionary Justice Party government and the National Intelligence Organization increasingly supported the fascist Nationalist Action Party in order to suppress the resistance of the masses in the face of the crisis. They provoked the leftist terrorist organizations. As a result, Turkey was shaken with an unprecedented wave of terrorism. Eventually, security of life became nonexistent.

Prior to 12 September 1980, the fascist movement was in escalation in Turkey. At this point it will be useful to dwell on the fascist movement for a while.

The roots of the fascist movement go back a long time. The fascist movement emerged in Turkey during World War II. After the Hitler fascism was eliminated, it adapted itself to new conditions. In the 1960's it began to get organized legally as well as illegally. It intensified its activities after the 12 March 1971 coup. The Nationalist Action Party [NAP] was part of the government twice. It gained important positions in the army, the police force and other state institutions. It created an extensive paramilitary organization. And unlike similar movements in several other countries, it created a mass following composed of the most reactionary sections of the small bourgeoisie, of the displaced elements and of the lumpen proletariat. It was supported financially by the capitalist establishments for its anticommunist activities. It became very closely connected with the most (?mediating) and striking sections of the capitalist class, with the black marketeers, with smugglers and with big landlords. It gained a big sympathizing force in the Justice Party parliamentary group and grassroots. The NAP was getting ready to be part of the government once again on the eve of the 12 September coup. The parliamentary system was helpless before the economic crisis and the terrorism on the eve of 12 September 1980. The terrorism organized and provoked by imperialist centers, by the NAP and other terror centers had reached dimensions impossible to control. The Justice Party government was following a path which would lead the country to greater dangers and which would further strengthen reaction. However, it could not fully implement its pro-imperialist, promonopolist antipeople policies despite all the methods of brute force. The resistance of the masses, the composition of parliament, the influence of certain constitutional institutions and of democratic elements were placing obstacles before the Demirel government. That is why the Justice Party leaders stepped up their efforts to increase their influence within the army administration. On the other hand, the Justice Party government wanted to hold early elections in order to have a Justice Party majority in parliament, and if that proved impossible, a Justice Party-NAP majority.

As a result of its earlier government policies, the Republican Turkish Party [RPP] had exacerbated the crisis, had begun to lose its mass support and had weakened with internal conflicts. The parliament eventually became completely paralyzed, degenerated further and lost its authority among the masses to a large extent. The efforts for Justice Party-RPP cooperation had failed. The Justice Party's plans for early elections were foiled. Thus, no parliamentary solution remained which would be acceptable to imperialism and to the collaborationist monopolist bourgeoisie.

Before the 12 September coup, the working class, the working masses, the urban middle strata such as the intellecutals, technical elements and teachers, the villagers having small or medium-size lands, women and children staged mass demonstrations under harsh conditions. The working class' strike struggle reached a new and higher level. Besides the strikes staged for economic rights in individual factories or industrial branches, general strikes of an increasingly political nature began to be staged. Just before the 12 September coup and under the conditions of bloody terror, 1 million workers, members of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] and the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is] staged a general strike in protest of the murder of Kemal Turkler, the leader of the Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union. The workers were not only demanding the improvement of living conditions, but making general political demands for democracy. On the eve of the 12 September coup, the working class had revolutionary experiences through May Day parades, general strikes, rallies and resistance against the armed brutality of the police. This was also reflected in the strengthening of the tendency for unity in its syndical movement.

The level of consciousness of the working class was observed in the fact that its most heroic sons joined TCP ranks, and in the fact that the TCP slogans were adopted by a significant section of the politically active workers.

Prior to the 12 September coup, the monopolies and their government made intensive efforts to suppress the struggle of the working class by means of brute force, to limit its syndical rights and to close the class unions.

The characteristic of the villager masses' struggle before 12 September was the spreading throughout the country of a powerful cooperative movement against the banks, the landlords, the mediators [between farmers and buyers] and the usurers. The democratic demands of this cooperative movement which sprang from the rural areas were in conflict with the interests of the local and foreign monopolies who talked about turning Turkey into the West's green grocer, butcher and milkman, but who in reality were getting ready to exploit Turkey's agriculture more efficiently. Akin Ozdemir, one of the leading militants of the cooperative movement, was killed by the fascists. On the eve of the 12 September coup, the monopolies, the landlords and their government stepped up their efforts to undermine the cooperative movement.

The struggle and level of organization of the middle strata rose on the eve of the 12 September coup. The countrywide demonstrations of the teachers and technical elements had turned into actions including civil servants, even policemen and lawyers. Progressive views were spreading among artists and literary persons. These forces which were drawn into a political life by the deep economic crisis began to participate in the struggle of the working class to an increasing degree. The Turkish Teachers Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER], the professional organizations of the technicians, the bar associations, the police associations and artists unions began to move toward a unity of action with DISK and Turk-Is.

Dissatisfaction began to be felt among the shopkeepers as well. The Democratic People's Consumption Cooperatives Union [Halk Koop] movement created by the low-income civil servants and workers against the high cost of living became an increasingly effective support for them against the exploitation by the monopolies in the big cities.

The women's movement became stronger during this period. The communists supported with all their might the struggle of the urban middle strata. A large part of this movement began to adopt the TCP line and slogans before the 12 September coup. The reactionary forces reacted with brute force to this development. Talip Ozturk, one of the leaders of Turkish Teacher's Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER]; Cebat Yurdakul, a leading official of the democratic police movement and Adana security chief; (Zeytun) Can, a militant of the lawyers movement; Meryem Karakiz, a fearless fighter of the women's movement and a textile worker, and Ali Ihsan Ozgul, a brave journalist and a political writer, were all killed by members of the National Intelligence Organization [mit] and fascist, maoist terrorists and anarchists.

The youth played a significant role in the mass movements. The revolutionary awareness among the boy and girl students of universities began to spread among high school and vocational school students as well. The intellectuals and workers of the future began to gradually meet in the ranks of the progressive movement. The activities of the youth began to be effective outside the big urban centers, spreading into the villages of Anatolia.

The struggle for proper education, a profession, a job and for a secure future gained an anti-imperialist, antifascist nature. It resulted in the further strengthening of various progressive youth associations. The youth suffered a great number of victims during its various struggles. Huseyin Guzel, Sevgi Kurucay, Baris Yildirim, all of them leaders of the Progressive Youth Association [IGD] as well as many nameless youths were all treacherously killed, others were subjected to most cruel torture. With their actions, the young (?militants) and workers contributed to the struggle of the working class. The activities of the TCP created deep political and ideologic effects among the ranks of the youth's active masses.

Prior to 12 September 1980, significant steps were taken for the unity of action of the leftwing forces. Trends for the rectification of mutually committed errors gained strength. Various successful mass actions were undertaken by the TCP, the Turkish Labor Party, the Turkish Workers Socialist Party, the RPP members, as well as the Kurdish Revolutionary Democrats, and this contributed to the effectiveness of the revolutionary forces and mass organizations. Nevertheless, all these activities did not lead to the formation of a strong unity of action movement prior to 12 September. Though our party and these parties openly proclaimed the necessity of a unity of action movement, the fact that they were not able to join forces to settle their subjective differences and to act with more farsightedness prevented the channeling of the deep discontent of millions of workers and toilers into actions.

Factionalism in the syndical movement in addition to difficulties among the leftwing forces added to this problem. The struggle against terrorism lost its effectiveness. This situation on the one hand prevented the leftwing forces from taking advantage of the difficulties which affected the ruling bourgeoise, and on the other created the opportunity for others to exploit this factionalism.

The relative weakness of our party's organizational level and of its links with the masses as well as the factionalism among the democratic forces eliminated the possibility of acting for the prevention of the imminent military coup prior to 12 September 1980. In brief, the factionalism among the ranks of the working class, quarrels in a great number of mass associations, [words indistinct] and other similar factors weakened the struggle undertaken for years.

The ruling forces saw the danger that the strong revolutionary potential of the actions of the masses presented to their rule. They supported with all their might the fascist escalation as well as terrorism, trying to suppress in this way the anti-imperialist and democratic struggle of the masses.

[Text] Our People's Struggle Under the Reactionary, Military Dictatorship

Comrades: Since 12 September 1980 Turkey has been ruled by a reactionary, military dictatorship. Due to its fundamental structure and its proimperialist and promonopolist policies, the dictatorship is confronting all progressive forces. The dictatorship opposes the most fanatic reactionary forces, the fascist movement and religious fundamentalism in its domestic policies, but still vacillates between right-wing forces and liberal and reformist circles. In its foreign policies, though it is loyal to NATO and the bilateral agreement with the United States, the dictatorship continuously resorts to conflicting policies in its relationship with the imperialist and socialist countries.

These characteristics of the military junta prove that it is dependent to a great extent on the wishes of the bourgeoisie. Though political activities are actually banned in Turkey, the liberal and reformist circles of the bourgeoisie still have the opportunity to disclose their views in the press. Current developments indicate that pressures on the progressive forces conducted with fascist-like methods are being intensified and that the anticommunist positions of the junta are gaining strength. Pressures are intensifying in a bid to achieve results in its foreign policies in accordance with U.S. imperialism's aggressive aims. This process will sharpen the controversies existing between the most reactionary, most militarist and pro-American elements and the relatively moderate circles within the junta and the armed forces.

On the other hand, the military junta is enhancing its independent political positions regarding various bourgeois and civilian political forces. This has clearly emerged by the stand of the military junta in connection with the officials of the Justice Party and the People's Republican Party on the issue of membership in the constituent assembly and the preparations by the ruling generals for the formation of a fresh right-wing political organization to their own liking.

It is a fact that the law for the formation of a constituent assembly enacted by the military junta has been a step in the transition from a naked military dictatorship to a so-called parliamentary democracy. However, it would still be an oppressive and authoritarian system in which all democratic liberties would be extremely limited. In the event all democratic forces, including the working class and the toiling masses, make the mistake of saying, let the military junta go, it does not matter who will replace them, and then remain inactive in the face of measures being taken in order to enter a transition to a so-called democratic system, then the price will be much greater. This so-called parliamentary system will never turn out to be democratic. Moreover, to keep silent today for the sake of a so-called parliamentary system tomorrow will, on the one hand, lead to the intensifying to the present pressures and exploitations and, on the other, will aggravate the threats facing our country.

The elimination of the democratic liberties and the heavy oppression of the anti-imperialist and democratic forces has created an atmosphere that has objectively served to strengthen the most reactionary and collaborationist elements within and outside the military junta and armed forces. Today, there are already signs that these elements are gradually taking the initiative into their hands.

Such a situation creates a dangerous climate in which our country could be dragged into imperialist adventures in its foreign policy, in which the working class, the toilers and the middle strata would be subjected to a more ruthless oppression, in which our economy would be completely dominated by the imperialist monopolies and in which fascist positions would be further enhanced. These circumstances prove that the fascist threat created within the reactionary and militarist dictatorship framework has not been eliminated.

In favor of Peace, Independence, Democracy and Social Progress Against Reactionary Military Dictatorship

The military coup of 12 September 1980 was the result of the deep crisis that has plagued the Turkish capitalist community dependent on imperialism. Despite the present averse circumstances for the progressive forces in Turkey, the main tendency in the country and the balance of forces has worked to the detriment of the bloc formed by the imperialist, collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie and the landlords.

This crisis is not a temporary illness of Turkish capitalism but a permanent one. This situation limits the ruling forces' ability to maneuver freely. Under the circumstances, the task of saving the Turkish people must be carried out mostly by the working class. In accordance with its historic and special assignment, the working class which has been the most revolutionary [word indistinct] and the main promoter of the revolutionary process and will be able to save all the oppressed while trying to save itself.

It is imperative for all the oppressed classes and strata to unite their fate with the working class if they want to be saved from the present situation. Together with other progressive associations, the communists are now indicating the path of salvation to the working class, the large toiling masses, the middle strata as well as the nonmonopolist bourgeois circles. This path leads first and foremost to the unity of all the anti-imperialist and democratic forces into one front.

Everyone should learn the lessons of the period prior to 12 September 1980. Not one step should be taken based on irresponsible assumptions. Slogans such as "the only way to salvation is revolution," or "the only way is to topple the military junta" should not be the way to present our cause to the people. Everyone is aware that the communists will be in the front ranks of all action to be undertaken by the masses to put an end to the military and reactionary dictatorship. However, the main problem is to prepare the masses for the final struggle. This struggle must be based on the formulation of the urgent task. This task is to unite all the forces opposed to imperialism, monopolies and the rightist military dictatorship for the sake of peace, independence, democracy and social progress.

The reply of the proletariat which is conscious of its tasks to those who followed the adventurists of "the voice of the workers," those who believed in slogans like "the leader should leap forward, the rest will follow" and those who dreamed of toppling the military junta without moving from their place is as follows: Why do you not go ahead? Is anyone preventing you from taking action?

We are appealing to all honest revolutionary persons who have followed leftist radical slogans to unite in revolutionary restraint. The workers have had enough of revolutionary lip service. The time has come to unite forces for struggles that are vital for millions of toilers.

To Prevent Turkey's Involvement in Imperialist Adventures

U.S. imperialism's new policies based on straining international relations and provoking a nuclear war are the source of the great threat facing our people as well as all our country. The most parasitic collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie in our country and the most reactionary political forces are the obvious supporters of these policies.

Realist tendencies can be observed from time to time in the foreign policies being pursued by the military junta. For example, the Turkish Government has declared that it will not undertake any obligations outside the NATO framework, that it will not provide a basis for the U.S. Rapid Deployment Forces [RDF] and that it will not participate in facts to be formed in the Middle East. The Turkish Government has also decided to lower to the lowest level its diplomatic relations with Israel. It was (?supported) the stand of the neighborly Arab countries in our region against the recently intensified barbaric aggressions of Israel against the Palestinian people.

Turkey's conditions which make it dependent on the United States and NATO present the most aggressive circles of imperialism with the possibility of exerting pressures on Turkey. Can the military junta's efforts to create a balanced foreign policy eliminate imperialism's attempts to use Turkey as a tool for its adventurous policies? Undoubtedly Turkey's constructive relationship with the Soviet Union, the promotion of its relations with the regional Arab and Islam countries conflict with the direction that the Pentagon is trying to impose on Turkey's foreign policy.

It is a fact that Turkey's dependence on imperialism and NATO, as well as the deep economic difficulties being experienced by our country, are creating the opportunities for U.S. imperialism's pressure and blackmail. The reactionary newspapers are talking about making a gesture to the United States by permitting the stationing of the RDF on our soil. Their efforts are not purposeless, because they come from the spokesman of the most parasitic monopolies which are to benefit from Turkey's armament. These forces are supported by the most reactionary military circles within the armed forces.

A great number of progressive, democratic and liberal persons are openly opposed to U.S. pressures on Turkey. They are also opposed to the use of Turkish soil as a basis for the RDF and to the use of U.S. and NATO bases in our country for aggressive purposes against the neighboring countries. They are calling for the dismantling of nuclear arsenals on Turkey. They are in favor of peace between Turkey and the Soviet Union based on friendship during the Ataturk-Lenin period.

Possibilities exist for the union of very large circles against the aggressive U.S. policies and pressures for the sake of peace and to prevent Turkey from being dragged into imperialist adventures. The TCP supports the struggle of these forces.

Under these circumstances, it would be erroneous to underestimate the threat facing our country, to claim distorted and unfounded views to the effect that the struggle for peace in a way casts a shadow on the struggle against the junta or ignore the disagreements between the generals in power and the United States. At present, there are circles that, on the one hand, support the junta and, on the other, adopt an attitude in favor of peace in regard to certain concrete issues. These circles must realize that they can attain their goal only if they cooperate with the peaceful (?forces).

We extended our hand to everyone--including these circles--who raises his voice in favor of peace, to diminish the tension and prevent our country from being dragged into imperialist adventures. Communists will impart to the masses the goals of their program, the necessity to abandon NATO and dismantle the U.S. bases and its goal for an independent and peaceful foreign policy within the struggle waged together with the broadest peace forces.

For the Prevention of Economic Ruin and for the Protection of the Living Conditions of the People Against the Policy To Tighten the Belt

The junta is generally implementing the economic policy of the government it toppled. This policy, known as the 24-January decisions, has been imposed by imperialist financial organizations. This policy aims—through colonialist methods--to guarantee the profits of local and foreign monopolies and ensure the continuation of the imperialist system in Turkey.

The implementation of this program is tantamount to laying the burden of the crisis of the toilers. No matter how much the generals talk about the return to democracy, it is impossible to impose this policy on the working class and on the toilers in the city and in the village by any means other than pressure and tyranny. This antipeople policy is being presented as a so-called solution to the economic crisis and a so-called way to save the country from ruin. In reality, this policy caused a drop in the national income, stagnation in production and an increase in foreign debts in 1980. During the same year, according to its own members, the company profits of the Koc group increased by 10 billion Turkish lira. The real wages of the workers, on the other hand, decreased by 41 percent over the past 3 years, according to certain sources.

[Words indistinct] also conflicts with the interests of the toilers, the middle strata and the (?nonmonopolistic bourgeoisie). The consequences of this policy are also causing voices to be raised even among certain monopolistic circles urging to review the 24-January decisions.

The struggle against the deterioration of the living conditions of the working class and for syndical rights is urgent. The TCP supports the workers' struggle for the right to form unions, conduct collective bargaining, hold strikes and regain all the economic benefits. The party defends the opposition of the peasants and the small and medium-sized property owners to the tax burden and the policy to channel the loans to the monopolies and their wishes in this issue.

The TCP is against joining the EEC. It is in solidarity with all the circles that are opposed to this decision, which will cause the destruction of our national economy and the total elimination of our country's economic independence. The masses' struggle potential is increasing against the junta's policy to tighten the belts of the toilers in order to benefit the local and foreign monopolies. Even now, workers in many factories are staging a resistance to dismissals, absence of collective bargaining and the high cost of living through semilegal and illegal organizing. Small shopkeepers are criticizing the policy of the junta by writing letters of protest.

In addition to progressive and democratic circles, some spokesmen of the bourgeoisie are also opposing the 24-January decisions. They comprehend the importance of economic relations based on equal interests with socialist countries for reviving the national economy. It is becoming increasingly more apparent that NATO expenditures constitute the greatest cause of our economic ruin. Even now, contradictions are beginning to emerge among the junta circles regarding the implementation of this policy. The spokesman of certain monopolies are sharply criticizing the junta in the face of the smallest divergence from the line delineated by the imperialists. All these events indicate that it is possible for the masses' struggle for economic demands to be transformed into a political struggle and for this struggle to further sharpen the conflicts within the sovereign forces and the junta.

CHANCELLOR ADDRESSES BUNDESTAG BUDGET DEBATE

DW181253 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0807 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Speech by FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt at Bundestag budget debate in Bonn--live]

[Excerpts] During Secretary Haig's visit, I explicitly thanked him for his confirmation of the American involvement in Berlin and asked him to pass that on to President Reagan. Mr Haig reacted in an exemplary and composed way to the demonstrations directed at him. By the way, he made a significant speech in Berlin. In addition to containing statements worth pondering, it reflected the spirit aiming for new shores and contained, without bragging, definite American optimism.

I am happy to say that a balance of power remains the main point of the U.S. security policy. Mr Haig's visit to Berlin as well as here in Bonn was an impressive confirmation of German-American friendship and of the common Western policy aimed at a balance of power and at holding a dialogue with the East. To this common policy, we owe our security, our freedom, as well as our openness toward the world.

We can rely on our American friends and the American nation can rely on us Germans. [applause] I agree with you that these things are deeply rooted in common convictions and values which we must not forget even if there sometimes naturally are and must be different opinions and opposing interests. Our common values support the alliance protecting us and we will contribute all we can to this alliance. I can say that the basic rights contained in our Constitution stem only in part from German and European traditions, the greater part stems--some people may not know this--from the tradition of liberty the United States established more than 200 years ago. We are aware of this. [applause]

We had intense talks with the U.S. secretary of state on the common Western line regarding arms control negotiations on Eurostrategic arms prior to his important meeting with his Soviet colleague. When the actual negotiations on this special issue begin in November, intense consultations will continue. We will also hold consultations when we enter talks with the Soviet Union.

I would like to tell this house that on this occasion I invited President Reagan to pay an official visit to our country. If he comes, he will experience the correctness of what Mr Kohl has said, of what Mr Genscher has said and of what I say, namely, that Germans and Americans are friends. [applause]

I want to add here that we consider acts of violence against U.S. Armed Forces personnel and installations to be attacks also on our own security and freedom. [applause] We particularly detest the willingness to murder which again is becoming evident. Together with our American and all our European friends, the Federal Government will make every possible effort to successfully continue the fight against terrorism. We know that in doing this we are in accord with the overwhelming majority of all Germans. [applause] Since this is so, terrorism in our country had no chance in the past years and has no chance in the future.

Our partnership ties are close not only with America but also with the other countries of West Europe. Consultations with Italian Prime Minister Spadolini a few days ago disclosed a great deal of mutual confidence as well as agreement on all decisive security and foreign policy interests and on their assessment. I have to thank Italian President Pertini, a European statesman of most outstanding moral authority, for an important talk. [applause]

I also express heartfelt thanks for the meeting with Pope John Paul II to whom I expressed the best wishes of all Germans--Catholics, Protestants and liberal thinkers--for his speedy recuperation and success in continuing his peace mission. [applause]

The recent talks in Norway and Denmark and those to be held in the near future with the Austrian chancellor are other examples of close contacts with our neighbors, other examples of European cohesion even outside the European Community.

Mr Kohl, not only the Social Democrats in Norway but also the Conservatives, who will probably form the government now, trust our foreign and security policies and do not share your pessimism. [applause]

According to a desire by both governments, German-French cooperation naturally is still of greatest importance. I will visit the French president in the near future. The British prime minister is coming to the FRG. All these talks reflect the natural character of close cooperation, permanent consultations and mature agreement in all important issues. We can continue to build on this European foundation, also with regard to difficult discussions on modifications and reforms in the European Community which the Federal Cabinet will discuss this afternoon.

On the basis of these comprehesnive and close relations, and of close consultations and good neighborly relations, we have achieved much in the past 12 years of social-liberal foreign and security policies with regard to safeguarding peace and cooperation in Europe. The narrow path of the 1969 Ostpolitik has since become a broad two-lane street. Behind it stands a common Western policy as described one-and-a-half decades ago in the Harmel report: Military security and the policy of detente are not contradictory, they complement each other. [applause] This was most recently confirmed in the statement of the Ottawa conference of the seven government heads, where emphasis was put on the principle of balance, political moderation and dialogue and cooperation with the East. We will do everything to reduce the threat to central Europe and to achieve a military balance on as low as level as possible. The first necessary step in this direction is the dual decision, Mr Kohl, on the European weapons systems, counterarmament as far as necessary for the establishment of an approximate balance, but also mutually agreed arms limitation as much as possible to establish an approximate balance. We will achieve concrete results at negotiations only if we stick to both parts of this decision and not just one part as Mr Strauss wants to do. [applause, shouts] He said that at his CSU congress. And anybody speaking like that calls into question the agreement existing in the alliance. He should not do that; he should quit doing it. [applause]

Secretary of State Haig said publicly that a mutual zero option could perhaps be a possible, although not very likely, option to be given priority among the aims of the negotiations. [applause]

I must also respond regarding the neutron weapon. The much discussed problem of possible deployment in Europe is not currently topical. We agree on that with our allies in Washington. In this respect, we will also follow the common line of the alliance. Arms control policy is part of our security policy. On 13 April 1978, the Federal Government commented on this in the Bundestag: deployment only after serious arms limitation negotiations. There must be a unanimous decision of the alliance--and only then if we are not the only country in Europe where the weapons are deployed. On this issue, too, I have been misquoted--not by you [Kohl] but by your colleague Strauss in an impermissible way. I want to stress that I have not changed my mind. But I repeat that there is no reason at all to debate this matter today. It is not topical and it will not be topical tomorrow.

On the other hand, I ask the opposition to support the Federal Government when we insist on the fulfillment of a demand which we Germans, together with other nonnuclear states who signed the nonproliferation treaty, have made on the states possessing nuclear arms, namely, the demand that they reduce their nuclear arms. I add: balanced reduction so it will become realistically possible. [applause]

I am convinced that the talks between the big powers must not be disrupted. Dialogue and cooperation are an urgent dictate of the peace watches particularly in difficult times. Every opportunity must be used. The foreign minister and I went, therefore, to the Soviet general secretary and his aides to clarify positions and to find out about the possibility for a beginning. Therefore, we will continue the dialogue with the Soviet side when General Secretary Brezhnev visits here in Bonn in November. I must tell you that I am happy about this visit. [applause]

Before that, we will see the Hungarian premier here, but naturally more significance must be attributed to the Soviet general secretary. I also hope that we can bring about a meeting between the chairman of the GDR Council of State and the federal chancellor. We must do this for two reasons:

First, because no additional irritations to the situation in Europe must emanate from us Germans. On the contrary, if we try together to develop reasonable good-neighborly relations, we can contribute to cooperation and the building of confidence. It is, therefore, important for this meeting to eventually take place -- a meeting that has been postponed for reasons neither we nor they are responsible for, a meeting with no prerequisites. I will accept no one's prescriptions regarding prerequisites which some people already are formulating. Second, it is necessary because examples must be given to show that Germans are talking to Germans and that Germans are listening to Germans. [applause]

This preparedness for talks, the will for peace and the will regarding good-neighborliness toward the East -- these things make us feel most firm and secure due to our ties with the West on the basis of the European Community and the North Atlantic alliance. I ask you very much, Deputy Kohl, I ask you very much in the interest of our people to call in question these things we have in common through polemic distortion. [applause]

I understand your concern and I share it with regard to some aberrations, foreign policy aberrations particularly, which we are experiencing here and there in our country. This involves mostly young people who are more susceptible to unrest and to being led astray than others. You sense this susceptibility also in other European countries and not only West European countries.

German youths are probably in a different situation than the Scandinavian and West European youths for one particular reason. A normal human being grows up in the security of a family and of a homeland. Many of us lost this after the war because of the war directly or because of expulsion or flight. We had to rebuild this security. A human being normally also grows up in the security of his own nation and develops natural ties with his nation. This is difficult for today's youths to experience and develop. I understand that this is missing and I understand why the young people feel the special German responsibility toward peace. But I also want to tell them that they must not allow themselves to believe that the Germans know better than all others what serves peace. I perceive the temptation to revive old and wrong conceptions as though it is the German nature, the German peace nature this time, which will make the world recover. They must not make a virtue out of their own fear of life and they must not try to transfer their own fear of life to others. [applause] There are too many people who depict a future without hope and who slander democracy and there are also some people who one-sidedly see dangers only in the West. Alexander Haig said in this respect: We must be careful not to cross the thin line between freedom and presumptuousness. This is what he said in Berlin -- something worth thinking about. [applause]

In a televised discussion some weeks ago with young people in a church in my native town of Hamburg-Altona, I tried to show how one must listen when young people express, or even shout, their fears about peace. I tried to show how our policy of balance, dialogue and cooperation must be placed against these fears. And I tried to show how one can help remove fears by setting into motion commonsense which God has given to everyone. But please do not simply label anyone a communist or anarchist who screams out his fear. They are your sons and daughters as much as they are ours. [applause] Quite certainly, Deputy Khol, they also include communists and anarchists and I want to tell politicans who speak at such rallies and exercise the basic right of Article 5 of the Constitution that they must always think of the undesired consequences and that they must take sufficient organizational precautions against the misuse of their demonstration so as to be accountable for anything that develops. [applause, shouts]

I agree with you, colleague Wehner, and I profoundly disagree with many of the one-sided views and distortions in such speeches and demonstrations. It must be repeated again and again that the Soviet Union's SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers have been introduced for 4 years now, since 1977, whereas the West's Pershing counterarmament will begin by the end of 1983 at the earliest.

I said that Haig's composure in Berlin was great. It was exemplary, I must add, and it was an example also for one or more of yesterday's opposition speakers. Please refrain from casting suspicion that the Social Democrats will lead Germany into neutralization and please refrain from casting suspicion that we have embarked on a course toward a German-Soviet alliance. [applause]

I will read what yesterday's HERALD TRIBUNE writes of you; one of the most renowned papers of the world begins with a report on the terrorist attack on U.S. General Kroessen near Heidelberg and goes on to say: When politicians such as Christian Democratic leader Helmut Kohl put this attack in the same context as the demonstrations against Secretary of State Alexander Haig in Berlin a few days ago, they help the terrorists achieve what could be one of their primary goals--to drive a wedge between the United States and its European allies. [prolonged applause] And yesterday's editorial of the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE concludes by saying: It is important, therefore, that West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, President Reagan and the other NATO leaders take these attacks for what they are--the work of a tiny band of fanatics--and not be stampeded into needless disputes by falsely aroused public opinion. [applause]

I am telling you this, Dr Kohl, because you have been saying that our credit as an alliance partner has been gambled away. What a distortion! [applause] What a distortion of anti-Americanism you have depicted here and what a wrong picture you have given of the inner attitude of your own party! If there is talk of the peace movement, and not everything that so labels itself deserves this name, I ask you, please, to read the peace appeal of the German Trade Union Federation. For more than three decades now, the German Trade Union Federation. For more than three decades now, the German Trade Union Federation is most closely linked with the AFL, formerly above all with the person of George Meany and today with Lane Kirkland--both of them are men whom I always meet during my visits to Washington. Nobody can doubt the DGB's ties with America and if you read the appeal, you will notice that it is well balanced and you will accept it. I appreciate this appeal and I ask you: How many of the deputies of your faction have in the meantime also signed this appeal of the German unity trade union, the biggest German peace movement. [applause] This is not a one-sided appeal like some others, it is not blinded, it is oriented toward balance and Heinz-Oskar Vetter thereby shows, precisely to the trade union-oriented youth, where the path must go.

It must go in the direction toward achieving a balance of deterrence--a balance of military means, a balanced limitation of these military and deterrence means, a balanced limitation of armaments, a dialogue with the East, for this purpose and for the purpose of further cooperation, security partnership with the East and cooperation. Only this way can peace be strengthened.

It is for this purpose that we will meet Leonid Brezhnev here once again this year. It is for this purpose that we will meet President Ronald Reagan presumably for the third time within a year. I know that Reagan wants to negotiate and that he will negotiate and I likewise know that Brezhnev wants to negotiate and that he will negotiate. Both want negotiations because both are afraid that peace might go to hell and they are right in being afraid and they are right in wanting to negotiate. [prolonged applause] Nonetheless, this remains a difficult negotiating business, not lastly because much trust has been lost.

We Germans can help and we want to help building confidence, not only through confidence-building measures which we discuss in Madrid. We want to create new confidence. We belong to the West but we can contribute to making East and West understand one another. We belong to the West, but for us, Germany does not end along the Elbe River and Europe does not end at the Oder or Vistula Rivers. We are struggling so that Europeans in the West and in the East can meet each other. And in this respect, the FDP and SPD are fully agreed. [prolonged applause]

FRG TO DEMAND REDUCTION IN EC BUDGET CONTRIBUTION

[Excerpts] Bonn, 18 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government once again underlined its great interest in strengthening the European Community. The Federal Cabinet agreed today that the EC must be maintained and strengthened as a factor in the international equilibrium. However, the Federal Government at the same time made plain that in the impending negotiations on EC financing, it is determined to demand a "noticeable and suitable easing" in the Federal Republic's net contribution to the EC budget.

Government Spokesman Kurt Becker said after the cabinet's Europe policy session that the cabinet agreed that only a strong European Community can do justice to its responsibility as the U.S. partner toward the Third World and in East-West relations. Hence, special importance is attached to the coordination of foreign and defense policies among EC member states. However, Bonn continues to consider bilateral relations with the EC partners an essential element of European cohesion. According to Becker, the Federal Government continues to attach (?special) importance to German-French cooperation.

GENSCHER COMMENTS ON TASKS OF EUROPEAN UNION

[Excerpt] Bonn, 19 Sep (DPA)--The European union which the Federal Government is now striving for officially, is, according to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, to strengthen the community's cohesion and ability to act. The minister said in an interview for Suedwest Rundfunk today that Europe needed a new, positive, forward-pointing impulse. Hence, the policy decision taken by the Federal Cabinet, Friday in favor of a European union is "an important contribution toward European identity and the European ability to act."

Important developments of the community, such as working together in the foreign policy sector, summit conferences in the European Council and direct elections to the European Parliament are, as Genscher explained, to be collected in a European act which is to set up the European union. To look after its interests, Europe needs to pool all its possibilities and fields of action open to it. This also would strengthen the Western world in general. The inclusion of security policy as a sphere of the union is a necessary consequence deriving from the objective of asserting European interests.

FDP Secretary General Guenter Verheugen today welcomed the cabinet's decision to empower the foreign minister to negotiate with EC partners on a political policy statement on the European union.

BRANDT URGES AGREEMENT ON THIRD WORLD PROGRAM

LD191740 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] SPD Chairman Brandt hopes that agreement on an immediate program for the Third World will emerge from the summit meeting of leading politicians from industrial states and developing countries.

Brandt said on Bavarian radio today that this must include measures to combat hunger as well as for the solution of Third World financial shortages and energy problems. He suggested a graded price for oil. Developing countries which import oil should be allowed to benefit in this way.

Brandt described as missing the point, the European Community continuing to send its agricultural surpluses to the developing countries at a cheaper rate. Food aid is only useful in famines. It is better in principle to further food production within Third World states.

SPD CHAIRMAN 'SADDENED' BY SOLIDARITY CONGRESS

LD202036 Hamburg DPA in German 1857 GMT 20 Sep 81

[Text] Goettingen, 20 Sep (DPA)--In the opinion of SPD Chairman Willy Brandt, Poland needs in its "present process of renewal," apart from enthusiasm for an idea, work "above all." "I say this with the greatest reservation for it is very difficult to say something about Poland because others who would very much like to interfere are always lying in wait," he told DPA on Sunday in Hannoversch Muenden (Goettingen district). It is not, however being impertinent to say that there is no known social order which accomplishes anything without work.

The Solidarity congress in Gdansk saddened Brandt a little. If the view is that it is a matter of national renewal and if there is, rightly, refusal to accept interference by other states, then one must not wish to reach out beyond one's own country. This includes Solidarity's demand for the introduction of free trade unions in the other East bloc countries.

Brandt said he regrets that the Poles have, on the way to finding an inner balance, "overlooked" the fact that they cannot leap the gulf between the blocs. The Poles cannot agitate their way out of the world political framework they are in.

EPPLER TO SPEAK AT PEACE DEMONSTRATION 10 OCT

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Sep (DPA)--SPD Presidium member Erhard Eppler expressed the fear that there will be new twists to the arms spiral despite the planned East-West negotiations on medium-range missiles in Europe. Eppler said on Deutschlandfunk today, according to the radio station, that he believes that U.S. interests conflict with disarmament talks with the Soviet Union. The Federal Government thus must make the vital German interest in arms control and disarmament plain to the ally in Washington.

Eppler said that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt's support in this matter is the aim of the planned large-sclae peace demonstration in Bonn on 10 October. Eppler, an opponent of the NATO dual decision, is to be one of the speakers at the demonstration. Chancellor Schmidt told the Bundestag on Friday that politicians who speak at such demonstrations should also think about the "undesirable consequences."

DPA RECEIVES LETTERS FROM RED ARMY FACTION

[Text] Frankfurt, 18 Sep (DPA)--DPA's Frankfurt office has received two letters, one from the Red Army Faction (RAF) and the other from a group of RAF sympathizers, claiming responsibility for two attacks on Americans.

In one of the letters which arrived today, an anonymous sender claims responsbility for the firebomb attack on the private residence of the U.S. consul general in Frankfurt during the night of 12-13 September. The letter is marked with the RAF star but does not bear the signature of an organization. It is clear from its contents, however, that the author or authors are close to the RAF. The letter bears a Frankfurt postmark dated 15 September.

The letter refers expressly to the visit to the Federal Republic and to West Berlin of U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig who is described as "coordinator of NATO, Europe and the worldwide aggressive U.S. war policy." The essence of this policy is "the preparation of an atomic war of aggression against the USSR from European soil and the destruction of worldwide revolutionary resistance." The U.S. consul general in Frankfurt represents the United States. The letter ends with the demand for "the grouping together of the RAF prisoners, the release of Verena Becker and Guenter Sonnenberg and the release of all interned militant leftwingers."

DPA's Frankfurt office also received a letter today from the "Gudrun Ensslin Command, claiming responsbility for the attempt on the life of the Commander in Chief of U.S. Forces in Central Europe General Kroesen. The letter bears an Aschaffenburg postmark of 15 September. An identical letter which the authorities regard as genuine was published by FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU on Thursday.

APEL WELCOMES TUNISIAN DEFENSE MINISTER

LD210904 Hamburg DPA in German 0829 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] Bonn, 21 Sep (DPA)--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel welcomed with military honors his Tunisian counterpart, Slaheddine Baly, at the Defense Ministry in Bonn on Monday morning. Baly was invited by Apel who visited Tunis more than a year ago. Immediately after the welcoming ceremony, the Tunisian guest was briefed on the military situation in Europe and on the Bundeswehr. In the further course of his 3-day visit to the Federal Republic, Baly is to inspect troops in Lower Saxony and will then visit Hamburg and Luebeck.

GENERAL POEPPEL ASSESSES 'SHARP BLADE' MANEUVER

[Excerpts] Bonn/Stutgart, 18 Sep (DPA)--Inspector of the Army Gen Hans Poeppel said in Bonn today that, despite its reduced scale for economy reasons, the Bundeswehr "Sharp Blade" maneuver in Baden-Wuerttemberg had totally fulfilled its purpose as a large-scale exercise.

There were more accidents during the exercise, which ended last night, than in previous years. Damage to agricultural land is estimated at DM5 million. According to the Bundeswehr, the maneuver cost altogether over DM10 million. A total of 162 accidents occurred with 16 people seriously injured and 31 people slightly injured. The increase in the accident rate is attributed to fuel economies in the weeks preceding the maneuver. Tank and truck drivers had too little opportunity to practice with their vehicles and to develop the required feel for them.

General Poeppel said that the keenness of the soldiers and especially of the young national servicemen and reservists deserves particular recognition. Despite the heavy demands, the soldiers demonstrated a consistently high degree of devotion to duty and discipline.

MINISTER OUTLINES RELATIONS WITH CHAD, LIBYA

["M.D." report: "The Government Will Do All It Can To Ensure That Chad Can Recover and Regain Its Political Unity"]

[Text] Chad National Unity Transition government President Goukouni Oueddei arrives in Paris this Wednesday, 16 September. He will lunch with President Mitterrand on Thursday.

"We owe a debt to Chad. The government is determined to do all it can to ensure that Chad can recover and regain its political unity, territorial integrity and independence," Jean-Pierre Cot, deputy external relations minister with responsibility for cooperation and development, stated on Tuesday, 15 September, when speaking to the French diplomatic and African press.

Asked whether France is prepared to grant "substantial aid" to Chad and to lift "the precondition of the withdrawal of the Libyan troops," Cot replied: "France has made a number of decisions. The first is to stop playing off one faction against the other in Chad. The second is to give aid to help rebuild Ndjamena, the Chad capital, without any conditions. And finally, the French Government has been engaged in intensive diplomatic activity in the past few weeks to help implement the OAU resolution providing for the installation of an inter-African force. Replacing the Libyan troops by an inter-African force is an urgent matter. It strikes us as being the condition on which Chad can regain effective sovereignty."

"It is in this spirit," the minister continued, "that President Mitterrand is receiving President Goukouni... Chad must become independent if normal relations between sovereign states are to be established with France. We will do all we can to establish as soon as possible the conditions for this independence, in other words, the withdrawal of Libyan troops."

Questioned on the possibility of French military aid, Cot replied: "France certainly does not want to become involved in new military affairs in Chad," but it will help the formation of the inter-African force "financially and possibly logistically."

"Normal" Relations With Libya

With regard to French-Libyan relations, Cot expressed the hope that they might become "normal" and "ordinary." Hitherto he said, "they were rather schizophrenic. On the one hand, President al-Qadhdhafi's regime is regarded as an abomination and, on the other, relations with Libya often are fruitful, especially in the sphere of arms sales...." "We consider it necessary to clarify things and to ask for normal diplomatic relations to be established with Libya." "However," the minister pointed out, "as regards Africa, there is a Libyan problem which our friends tell us is a major worry. We are telling the Libyan Government this and we have decided to stop selling arms to Libya while this situation persists."

With regard to development aid, the minister thinks that France's attitude at the Paris conference on the least developed countries was "decisive" in leading the other powers "including the biggest powers" to abandon their "cool attitude" to development, in overcoming the EEC's "hesitations" and in reviving North-South dialogue.

"The main problem," Cot also said, "is drawing up a development strategy and a united view." He deemed it normal for "French development policy to give priority to Africa," which is "the natural extension of Europe."

Suppression of Concerted Action for Development in Africa [ACDA]

Questioned on the French Government's attitude to ACDA--an agreement among the Western countries which raised great controversy--the minister replied: "The ACDA agreement is not a bad agreement per se.... The idea of coordinating efforts seems a sound one to me. In addition, there was the idea of a wonderful fund which never saw the light.... The bad aspect was the subsequent completely scandalous implementation of this agreement against the wishes of our partners. The idea of instituting 'leaders' in different sectors.... The organization of this cooperation, which had very little contact with the African states made the ACDA an unacceptable operation for a socialist government. Therefore, we have asked our partners--and we will discuss this at a meeting in Ottawa in a few days' time--to review the affair completely, to abolish ACDA, and to replace it with another structure whose main mission would be coordination with the African states...."

Finally, Cot indicated that, during his conversation with the Central African Republic foreign and education ministers on Tuesday, the cooperation plan drafted last June before the change of regime in Bangui was "confirmed" and that "cooperation with the Central African Republic is continuing in a correct manner with the new authorities."

MITTERRAND RECEIVES CAMEROON, TANZANIA PRESIDENTS

Ahidjo: Satisfied With Talks

Nyerere on Angola

PM181139 Paris LE MONDE in French 17 Sep 81 p 4

[J.-C.P. report: "Nyerere Thinks Cuban Troops Will Leave Angola After Settlement in Namibia"]

[Text] After talks lasting 150 minutes at the Elysee on Tuesday, 15 September, the Tanzanian president gave a press conference in which he affirmed his conviction that Cuban troops will withdraw from Angola as soon as Namibia gains independence. "As soon as the latter no longer serves South Africa as a base for acts of aggression against Angola, the Cuban troops will no longer need to remain in Angola," Nyerere explained.

This remark by the chairman of the "frontline" African states, who also said he is "very happy" with the new line which France's African policy has taken, deserves to be given particular emphasis since it was made at a time when the "contact group" states (United States, France, Canada, Britain and FRG) are reviewing the Namibian file with a view to preparing for the meeting of their foreign ministers in New York on 24 September.

It is known that the French oppose the Americans on this question--the Americans "linking" the South African withdrawal from Namibia to the Cuban withdrawal from Angola. But Nyerere's remarks would tend to confirm that differences of opinion on this crucial point may not be so marked. The Tanzanian president also stated that it "is ridiculous to ask the Cubans to leave" Angola while the South Africans continue to attack that country, which they did once again recently. He also advocated the "harmonization" of the positions of the five "contact group" states to which the United Nations has given the job of trying to settle the Namibian conflict.

Nyerere seems to want a revival of the Namibian negotiations and, according to a well-informed source in Paris, he has indicated this to Washington, despite his disapproval of American policy in southern Africa. This question also featured in the "warm" meeting which External Relations Minister Cheysson had at the Quai d'Orsay on Tuesday evening with Angolan Foreign Minister Padlo Jorge, whose stopover in Paris comes 1 month before the visit by Angolan President Dos Santos, who will be received at the Elysee on 15 October.

MICHEL ROCARD EXPLAINS FRENCH-QUEBEC TIES

[B.L.-G. dispatch: "Rocard Proposes That 'Fraternity' With Quebec Should Lead to Practical Achievements"]

[Text] Montreal--After a long period of talking, it is time to move into action and to "lace French-Quebec cooperation in the context of modern economic realities." At the end of a 4-day official visit to Quebec, preceeded by a short stay in Ottawa to placate the federal government, Michel Rocard, minister of state for planning and development, made this statement on 14 September in an attempt to dispel the amibiguities and misunderstandings which have poisoned the three-cornered relations between Paris, Ottawa and Quebec for almost 15 years.

Rocard was clearly anxious not to make statements which might suggest that the new French Government is adopting a pro-Quebec stance in the political and constitutional debate now going on in Canada.

"For France," he said, "Canada is a power in international law, a NATO member and an ally of France." Paris, therefore, wants to maintain relations characterized by "respect and friendship" with Ottawa. To describe relations with Quebec, words like "fraternity" and "soliarity" will henceforth be used because of the "common feelings which move us." On the one hand, there are interstate relations which, it is hoped, can be normalized and possibly even extended and, on the other, a common feeling that, it is hoped, will lead to practical achievements.

ANSA REPORTS ACTIVITIES OF EGYPTIAN MINISTER GHALI

Talks With Colombo

AU172020 Rome ANSA in English 1548 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Report on talks between Italian Foreign Affairs Minister Colombo and Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali in Rome on 17 September]

[Text] Rome, 17 Sep (ANSA)--[Passage indistinct] In their long talk this afternoon, the two diplomatic chiefs also covered issued connected to Libya, the resumption of trilateral negotiations among the United States, Egypt, and Israel on Palestinian autonomy, and the situation on the Horn of Africa. The Egyptian minister of state reported that Cairo is "uneasy" as regards what he described as Libyan "adventurism" in Africa, and referred to his country's concern for Libyan interference in central Africa, in Chad, the Sudan and Niger.

The point of view of the Italian Government, reiterated recently during the European Economic Community foreign ministers' meeting near London and shared by the other nations of the community, is that Libyan threats must be responded to with firmness while keeping open an availability for dialogue aimed at the clarification of Libyan objectives in the Mediterranean. A key feature of this position is the awareness that if the North African state is pushed into a position of total isolation, the likelihood that Libya will align itself with the positions of the Soviet Union will increase.

Colombo and Ghali discussed in some detail the talks slated to resume on September 23 and 24 in Alexandria on Palestinian autonomy.

These tripartite negotiations are, in the eyes of Israel, purely administrative matters, whereas for Egypt, the consultations must become a "transitional system" leading towards a definitive solution to the situation in the Middle East.

Ghali reaffirmed that the Cairo government feels that the Palestinians must take part in comprehensive negotiations for a solution to the Mideast situation.

The Egyptian minister also underscored the point that, for Egypt, the Camp David framework accords are not "exclusive" and that, therefore, other initiatives, including the European plan, are welcome. He said that the Camp David agreements should at least allow the situation to be moved forward to the advantage of the Palestinians.

Colombo and Ghali also exchanged views on the situation on the Horn of Africa. Thus far this year, the Italian foreign minister has visited both Ethiopia and Somalia. Egypt, for its part, is closely following developments in this region in the wake of the Libyan-Ethiopian-Yemeni pact recently signed and because of concern for neighboring Sudan.

LA REPUBBLICA Statement

AU181637 Rome ANSA in English 1523 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--Italy, as a member of the European Economic Community and a country with solid relations with Egypt, is in a position to play an active mediation role in efforts to erect a stable and lasting peace in the Middle East, in the opinion of the Egyptian minister of state for foreign affairs, Butrus Ghali.

The Egyptian diplomatic chief's statement appeared in today's edition of the Rome journal, "LA REPUBBLICA," at the end of his two-day official visit to Rome for consultations with Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and meetings with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and head of state Sandro Pertini.

In connection with an Italian mediation bid in the Middle East, Ghali said, "We must not forget that when Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo was term chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers, the well-known Venice declaration was released." The Egyptian minister's reference was to the European peace initiative made public at the end of the June, 1980, Council of Ministers meeting in Venice.

"Therefore," Ghali said in his interview, "through the European Community, Italy can advance new European initiatives which must be coordinated with American policy and the initiatives of other sides involved."

An alternative, or "third," avenue the Egyptian minister had in mind for Italy to pursue would be "within the framework of the multinational (peacekeeping) force" to supervise the final phase of the Israeli withdrawal from the occupied Sinai territory next April.

The Cairo government diplomatic chief went on to explain that, "we requested Italy to support this force in principle" and, as regards the ways and means, these areas will be worked out "during a second phase."

Touching on other developments in his interview, Ghali referred to the expulsion yesterday from Cairo of the Soviet ambassador, top ranking Soviet diplomats, and technicians, and relations between Egypt and neighboring Libya. The minister explained, "We do not want to break off relations with the Soviet Union, even though the Soviet ambassador was guilty of interference in the internal affairs of my country...we are a non-aligned country and we are perfectly aware of the importance of maintaining balanced relations with the two major powers."

Moving on to dealings with Libya, Butrus Ghali insisted that Egyptian policy is perfectly clear in this area, "the condemnation of Libyan military adventures in Africa and outside Africa viewed as a threat to the stability of African unity."

Speaking about the recent border incident reported between Libya and Sudan, the Egyptian minister said, "Any Libyan aggression against Sudan will be considered an aggressive act against Egypt and, on the basis of the mutual defense treaty, Egypt will come to the aid of Sudan to repel Libyan aggression."

News Conference

AU182119 Rome ANSA in English 1954 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--The Italian reaction to Egypt's call to take part in the multi-national force in the Sinai was "extremely positive," Egyptian state minister for foreign affairs, Butrus Ghali, told a press conference here today at the end of a two-day official visit. He hastened to note that he had not actually received an affirmative response but that he had been assured that the request would receive careful attention.

During his talks in Rome, Ghali formally invited the Rome government to send in a contingent of Italians to take part in the international military force in the Sinai to oversee the peaceful transition of power when Israel completes its pullout in accordance with the 1978 Camp David accords.

The Egyptian diplomat noted that the multinational force will not depend on the United Nations because of Soviet opposition but would be formed of countries which spontaneously offer to implement UN principles. To urge such volunteers, Ghali has contacted numerous countries of Europe, Latin America and Asia. So far, he has received a positive reply from Colombia, Uruguay, the Fiji Islands, Norway and the United States.

He stressed the symbolic nature of the international military presence in the Sinai which is to become a reality as of April 1982.

The foreign military forces will be limited to three contingents of around 2,3000-2,500 (one of which will be American). These contingents will be rotated.

The soldiers will be equipped with light arms and a few launchers, he said. Their chief task will be to make sure that the accords are maintained after the Israeli evacuation of the Sinai. It will not be a rapid intervention force, Ghali took pains to mention. He also said that participation in the multinational force could take extremely diverse forms; such as sending in medical personnel or engineers and men to build infrastructures.

With regard to the Middle East situation in general, the Egyptian minister said that European initiatives could play an important role. The "Ten" could get Israel to understand that true peace is possible only if the Palestinian problem is settled; [and] the "Ten" could push a similar view in the United States, he said. He claimed that action on the part of the European Economic Community could lead to a rapprochement among the Arab states. In any case, he added, Egypt does not have a monopoly on a solution to the Mide t crisis.

Turning to the expulsion from Egypt some days ago of Soviet diplomats and technicians, Ghali said that there had been around 500 Soviet diplomats and a thousand technicians who were ousted because they had not respected Egyptian laws in that they had contacted outlawed parties. "We hope that relations between Egypt and the Soviet Union can be maintained", he explained, "in so far as we desire, as a nonaligned nation, to have relations with everyone," he said.

Questioned about Libya, Butrus Ghali said that Libyan agents, as well, were in contact with and gave funds to outlawed groups. Libya wants to destabilize not only Egypt, but the Sudan, as well, where it wants to see a regime favorable to it in power, the Egyptian official continued.

Iran too, had a role in recent Egyptian events, he claimed. Ghali then spoke of the presence of mercenaries in Libya, of the heavy military spending of the Tripoli government, and of 14 African nations that have broken off relations with Libya because of "subversion attempts fomented by Libyans." He summarized all this as indicative of Libyan adventurism: "Any diplomatic action that strengthens Al-Qadhdhafi's political position would be negative. We are rather more in favor of a cordon sanitaire being created around Libya", he said.

In his lengthy press conference, Butrus Ghali, who yesterday met with Foreign Minister Colombo and was received by Premier Spadolini, said that Italy and Egypt agree on the fact that a peaceful solution to the crises in the Horn of Africa must be found. "We agree that everything that might promote a rapprochement between the sides must be encouraged," he concluded.

ANGOLA'S FOREIGN MINISTER JORGE ARRIVES FOR TALKS

[Excerpts[Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Jorge will be received at the Quirinale Palace here today by head of state Sandro Pertini. He will begin his official talks with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo. This afternoon he will meet with Premier Giovanni Spadolini and later hold a press conference. This evening Jorge will host a reception in Colombo's honor.

The Angolan minister arrived here from Bonn last night for a two-day official visit. He was greeted at the Rome airport by Colombo and other officials, including the Italian ambassador to Luanda, Francesco Corrias, and the Angolan charge de-affaires in Rome, (Telmo de Almeida). The problems of southern Africa will be at the center of Jorge's talks here but he will also discuss the possibility of granting oil prospection rights to Italy's state-held fuels corporation (ENI).

Italy's and Angola's strong economic relations and the prospects for intensifying them still further will be discussed during Jorge's visit as well as ENI's quest to prospect for oil in northern Angola. Jorge was supposed to have come in May but the visit was postponed because of an Italian Government crisis. The Angolan minister is scheduled to leave Rome for New York on Sunday.

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Texeira Jorge met this morning with the Italian head of state, Sandro Pertini, for a discussion of the situation in southern Africa and problems connected to the drive for independence for Namibia (South West Africa). Pertini and the visiting diplomatic chief also reviewed the expansion of relations between Italy and Angola and both men expressed hopes for the continued development of these ties.

After leaving the Quirinale Presidential Palace, the Angolan foreign minister met with the head of Italian diplomacy, Emilio Colombo, and is slated to confer with Premier Giovanni Spadolini later today.

Colombo, Spadolini Meetings

AU182003 Rome ANSA in English 1941 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--The situation in southern Africa after the recent invasion of Angola by South African troops was the chief topic discussed today between Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and his visiting Angolan counterpart Paulo Texeira Jorge. Colombo promised the full support of the Rome government, which from the first roundly condemned the "military aggression", for a negotiated solution of the Namibian question. This was essential, Colombo said, if the region was to be free of tensions and disputes which did not concern it and free of nonAfrican presences.

The two ministers also probed economic cooperation and bilateral industrial prospects. Such cooperation ranges from the field of agriculture all the way to the energy sector, Jorge said. In this latter field, the Italian state fuels agency, ENI, has stipulated an accord with Angolan officials to take part in prospecting and exploitation of oil resources in northern Angola. This has given a decisive impetus to the consolidation of Italo-Angolan relations, Jorge commented. Moreover, Italy has promised Angola special food aid.

Jorge denounced the "arrogance and the scorn" for the most elementary rules of behavior shown by the South African Government. He also decried the "negative stance" taken within the U.N. Security Council, by the United States which, he claimed, constantly sought to destabilize Angola.

As to the presence in Angola of Cuban soldiers, Jorge said his was a proud and independent nation. He also added that when Angola could use funds for development which it is now forced to use for defense, the country will rapidly progress along the development road.

Colombo said he agreed with his Angolan colleague on the need to arrive at a peaceful solution to the problem of Namibia on the basis of U.N. Resolution 435. He voiced the hope that the ministerial meeting of "the contact group", set to take place in New York in a few days, would espouse the reasonable integrations of the Waldheim plan which will allow the Namibian people to take their rightful place on the African Continent and in the community of sovereign and independent states.

In his later meeting today with Italian Premier Giovanni Spadolini, [Jorge] further received ample assurances that Italy will do everything it can to help bring about a negotiated solution to the Namibia crisis. Spadolini and Jorge also reaffirmed the wish on both sides to increase technical and eocnomic cooperation between Italy and Angola.

News Conference

AB191018 Paris AFP in English 0734 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (AFP)--Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Jorge warned here Friday that his country would not hesitate to use its oil wealth as a weapon if the United States threatened Angola's territorial integrity. The U.S. oil company Gulf Petroleum extracts large amount of oil from Angola's Cabinda enclave.

He told a press conference here after meeting earlier with Italian President Sandro Pertini, Premier Giovanni Spadolini, Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and top officials of the state oil company ENI, that Angola was seriously worried about the rapprochement between Washington and Pretoria which he said could lead to a plan to destabilize Angola. If the U.S. wants to go that far, we will do our best to reply appropriately, he said.

Mr Jorge said greater eocnomic and technological aid for Angola, especially in the petroleum and petrochemical fields, had been discussed during his visits to Italy and before that to West Germany. A large contract had been drawn up with the Italian firm ENI.

On U.S. calls for Cuban troops to withdraw from Angola, Mr Jorge said, that if the Americans have nightmares because of the Cubans, its not our fault. The U.S. position did not make sense, he said. According to Washington, the presence of South African troops in Namibia was legal, while the Cuban presence in Angola was illegal.

He reiterated that the Cubans were helping Angola to build a regular army and develop the country's economic, social and health facilities. He denied there were any East German troops in Angola. He added that at the recent meeting in Lagos of the southern African frontline states, military aid to Angola had been discussed.

Mr Jorge said he expected that the meeting of the five nation Western contact group on Namibia scheduled for New York on September 24 would show a divison between the United States and the other [words indistinct] West Germany, Canada and Britain. Washington wanted a solution outside the United Nations and one which strengthened the Pretoria regime, he said.

Mr Jorge conferred here earlier Friday with Egyptian Deputy Foreign Minister Butrus Ghali who is also visiting Italy, and was assured of Egypt's support in [words indistinct] the recent South African invasion of Angola. Mr Jorge will leave for New York tomorrow.

AU191553 Rome ANSA in English 0812 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (ANSA)--The possibilities for cooperation between ENI, the Italian state fuels group, and Angola in the petroleum sector were defined as "excellent" by Angolan Foreign Minister Paulo Jorge in a Friday evening press conference here at the conclusion of two days of official talks with Italian leaders. The prospects for development and collaboration between the two countries were discussed on Friady during a meeting between the Angolan minister and ENI President Alberto Grandi.

Statement released by ENI at the conclusion of the meeting noted that the Italian fuel company's participation in Angolan projects, which began immediately after Angola's independence in 1975, have continued to expand over the years, from hydrocarbon exploration, to oil refining and distribution, to project designs and construction and personnel training.

The statement also mentioned ENI's recent participation in offshore research, and the Italian company, Comerint's, work in setting up numerous schools for technical training, as well as projects by the ENI subsidiaries, AGIP and Snamprogetti, in engineering and agriculture.

During the press conference, the Angolan diplomatic chief underlined that the Italian fuel company has shown "a great willingness" to collaborate with Angola, although he was unable to outline the precise extent of the agreements which have already been reached.

Expressing his satisfaction for the outcome of the talks held with his Italian counterpart, Emilio Colombo and Premier Giovanni Spadolini, which ranged from oil rights agreements to Namibian independence, Jorge said that relations between Angola and Italy are very good "because reciprocal understanding and trust exists (between the two countries)."

On the recent South African invasion of Angola, Jorge reiterated his hope that Italy would participate in Angolan efforts to reconstruct the country after the attack, which he charged had "caused great destruction and the loss of many lives." The Angolan minister added that the Reagan administration's renewed ties with South Africa were a source of great worry, and, in his view, are part of an attempt by the United States to de-stabilize Angola.

The Luanda Government minister, who arrived in Rome from Bonn on Thursday night, hosted a reception in honor of Colombo on Friday and is scheduled to depart for New York on Sunday morning.

Delegations Meet

AU191605 Rome ANSA in English 1541 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (ANSA)—Italian and Angolan delegations continued their study today of aspects of economic and technical cooperation between the two countries. They were meeting after talks yesterday between Italian and Angolan foreign ministers, Emilio Colombo and Paulo Texeira Jorge, respectively, and voiced satisfaction over the progress being made in projects already underway which were financed by the Italian Department for Technical Cooperation. They also analyzed projects to grant 12 million dollars in easy credit to the Luanda government for agricultural and industrial development as well as to improve oil technology.

Prospects to further bolster trade and economic ties between the two countries were discussed, especially with a view to the contribution that could be made by Italian medium and small-sized industries. The next mixed Italian-Angolan commission will take place in Rome in November to put the final touches on these initiatives. The Italian Government has also agreed to donate and send 5,000 tons of rice to Angola and to cover the transport costs as well.

COMMUNIQUE ON TUNISIAN FOREIGN MINISTER'S VISIT

AU181015 Rome ANSA in English 0820 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--A work visit here by Tunisian Foreign Minister Beji Caid es-Sebsi has concluded with the signing of two financial accords which will extend 100 billion lire (around $88 million) in credit to Tunisia. The two sides also drew up a cultural cooperation agreement.

During his Rome stay, Es-Sebsi chalked up around five hours of talks with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo and Thursday was received by head of state Sandro Pertini and Premier Giovanni Spadolini. During the visit an additional 130 billion lire in credit was also agreed upon to help Tunisia carry out projects set forth in its sixth five-year plan (1981-86).

In a joint communique issued Thursday at the end of the two-day visit, the two ministers agreed to intensify the number of high level consultations between the two countries. With regard to fishing, Colombo and Es-Sebsi voiced the conviction that active cooperation would help solve outstanding problems and allow for a rational, joint exploitation of water resources and connected economic sectors. A group of experts is currently at work on the final touches of a study for the creation of mixed Italian-Tunisian companies in this sector. On a political plane, the communique said that with regard to the new status achieved by the Republic of Malta, the Tunisian minister had voiced his appreciation for Italy's diplomatic action in favor of the island's neutrality.

The two ministers also voiced their concern over tensions in the Mediterranean, especially those due to the failure to settle the Mideast situation. As to southern Africa, the two sides reiterated condemnation of any form of colonialism of racism and firmly denounced the repeated raids on Angola. They urged the need to complete negotiations within the framework of the United Nations for the internationally recognized independence of Namibia. The two ministers spoke of encouraging recent signs of detente in the region of northwestern Africa with regard to the former Spanish Sahara. The two men also stressed the important role Tunisia and Italy could play in the resumption of the North-South dialogue.

LIBYAN HEAVY INDUSTRIES MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS

Al-Muntasir arrived here Thursday afternoon from Tripoli for a two-day sojourn and has already met with Foreign Trade Minister Nicola Capria and Posts and Telecommunications Minister Remo Gaspari.

A Libyan economic delegation led by Foreign Trade Undersecretary Fawzi Ash-Shakshuki arrived yesterday on the same plane with Al-Muntasir and today will take part in a mixed Italo-Libyan economic cooperation commission to review accords they stipulated at the end of August in Tripoli.

Communications Project

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (ANSA)--A project for cooperation between Italy and Libyan Jamahiriyah to increase telephone circuits from the present 120 to 1000 between the two countries will be completed by 1983.

The announcement was made in a ministerial bulletin released yesterday after a series of talks between Libyan ministers for commerce and industry, 'Umar al-Muntasir and Fawzi ash-Shakshuki, Italian Government representatives and the presidents of ENI, the Italian energy group, and IRI, the state holding company. Participation by IRI in other development projects in Libya and the eventual possibility of further developing commercial relationships and collaboration were also discussed during the meetings.

In the ministerial bulletin, it was noted that Italian Post and Telecommunications Minister Remo Gaspari committed himself to facilitating transit lines in Italy for a new underwater cable to be installed for the operation of 1000 new telephone circuits. Present telephone connections between Italy and Libya, the bulletin noted, are insufficient to ensure communications and commercial relations with the Italian community in the North African state.

NEWSPAPERS REPORT ON CORTES VOTE ON NATO

PM181337 [Editorial report] Spanish dailies for 16 September differ slightly in their accounts of the 15 September debate in the Madrid Chamber of Deputies on whether the issue of Spain's NATO membership should be processed by the chamber's Foreign Relations Committee.

According to a 600-word Pablo Sebastian report on page 14 of Madrid EL PAIS, "the Socialist, Communist, Andalusian and Basque nationalist groups and the majority of the mixed group declared their opposition to the motion, making a total of 126 votes against."

Barcelona's LA VANGUARDIA states in a 1,500-word unattributed report on page 7: "With votes in favor from the Union of the Democratic Center (UCD), the Democratic coalition and the Catalan minority, the Congress of Deputies yesterday decided that the government's request concerning Spain's NATO membership will be processed by the Foreign Relations Committee. The Spanish Socialist Workers Party (PSOE) voted against, while the PCE, Andalusian Socialist Party (PSA) and Basque Nationalist Party (PNV) were absent during the voting."

Jose-Maria Fernandez-Rua writes in a 600-word report on page 5 of Madrid ABC that of "308 votes cast, 180 were in favor of the notion (UCD, Democratic Coalition and Catalan minority), 126 against (PSOE, PNV, PSA and some mixed group deputies), with two abstentions."

According to a 1,000-word Jose V. Colchero report on page 7 of Madrid YA, "The communists abstained from voting because they believe that before deciding on this issue Spain should be certain that all the alliance member countries are in favor of our membership."

PCE SECRETARY GENERAL COMMENTS ON POLAND

LD191442 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1300 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Madrid, 19 Sep (TANJUG)--Spanish Communist Party Secretary-General Santiago Carrillo has stated that in Poland "a process is underway which enables the democratization of the existing system in the socialist countries." This is why the Spanish Communists uphold "the process of Polish reconstruction," Carrillo stated. Speaking at a meeting of the Spanish Communist Party Central Committee, he also stressed that Spanish Communists "oppose every intervention, particularly a possible military intervention."

The Spanish Communist leader warned, however, that the first part of the Polish Solidarity congress has led to "a hardening of radical stands which can objectively endanger the process of reconstruction in Poland." Carrillo connected these trends in Solidarity with "U.S. pressure and penetration of a section of Solidarity."

"Due to the current situation in Poland, Spain's NATO entry can be an exceptionally negative element, since it would mean the upsetting of the present balance of forces and the strengthening of one of the blocs," Carrillo said. He also pointed out the need for overcoming Europe's bloc division.

LABOR LEADER RETURNS FROM MOSCOW, URGES ARMS TALKS

LD181304 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1110 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Labour leader Mr Michael Foot, flew home from his Moscow talks with President Brezhnev, today and said the Russians had a "great desire" to get disarmament talks under way. "I believe the NATO countries will be very pleased at the outcome of the talks and that the Americans will also regard them as a big step forward," he said at Heathrow Airport. And I hope that the British Government will also realise their importance. If they had taken as much effort as we have, we would be closer to getting negotiations under way." Mr Foot, who was accompanied on the official visit by his deputy Mr Denis Healey, said: "I believe the talks could lead to a position where we have what is called the zero option, where we have none of these weapons in Europe. No-one who attended the talks could have any doubts about the desire of the Soviet leaders to get negotiations under way." Asked the reason for the apparent change in the Soviet attitude, Mr Foot said: "The Russians understand and every sensible person on the face of the planet understands, that this is the most dangerous time we have ever had and it is of the utmost importance to negotiate. "What happens when the negotiations start is another thing, but we must get the talks going."

Today's DAILY TELEGRAPH claimed that Mr Foot had apparently fallen victim to a Soviet propaganda strategem on disarmament. Moscow's offer yesterday to cut its missile force in Europe if NATO put off its decision to deploy Pershing and cruise missiles was a two-year-old proposal newly dressed up, it said. But Mr Foot told reporters: "The DAILY TELEGRAPH isn't interested in the arms issue, it is much more interested in trying to score points off me." Mr Healey, asked if his line in Moscow on disarmament was less forthright than that of Mr Foot, said "not at all. It is only the Conservative press that suggests that."

DAILY TELEGRAPH Editorial

PM181341 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 18 Sep 81 p 16

[Editorial: "Soviet Fox, Two Ducks"]

[Text] If one realises that a prime objective of the Soviet Union is to split off--militarily, in the first instance--Europe from America, it is scarcely surprising that a great deal of effort is being made by Moscow to woo Western figures associated with causes soft on the continuation of NATO, particularly where nuclear devices are involved. After trotting out to see Olaf Palme and Willy Brandt, both associated with "let's be nice to the Russians and not provoke them by matching their arms build up" sort of views, it is the turn of Mr Brezhnev to entertain Mr Foot and Mr Healey, whose string-masters have decided that Labour should opt for unilateral nuclear disarmament. At the age of 76, the Soviet leader yesterday entertained them in the Kremlin as if they were old colleagues and in the full light of the press got down to "the most pressing international problems of the day." No one who knows anything about such matters will be under any illusion that the major problem in international affairs at the moment is the very deployment by Russia of several hundred SS-20 missiles (each with three warheads) aimed at European cities. No need to be a fly on the wall to know that Mr Brezhnev, armed to the teeth, can afford to be polite as a fox courting a pair of ducks with the Labour leaders. Indeed, he will almost certainly be tempted to dash off an invitation to the Liberal-Social Democrat leaders as well, following yesterday's vote at Llandudno to ban the sitting of cruise nuclear missiles in Britain. The more European "leaders" that Mr Brezhnev can embrace and convince of his "niceness" the merrier for Russian interests. So far as the Kremlin is concerned, the obstacles to getting things Russia's way in Europe are now with President Mitterrand and Mrs Thatcher. With labour on the unilateralist path and the Liberals in favour of banning cruise, will anyone in the Social Democrat leadership be brave enough to speak their mind about the truth of dealings with Russia? Or will they play the "party unity" card and keep mum? Only the Tories appear pledged to defend what should be the first priority: The defence of the realm.

NORTH'S DENKTAS MEETS WALDHEIM IN NEW YORK

TA191600 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1455 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] New York, 19 Sep (AA)--President Rauf Denktas of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus declared, after an hour-long cordial meeting with Kurt Waldheim, that the UN secretary general was hopeful that the intercommunal talks would be concluded successfully. Though the Greek Cypriots made no specific proposal concerning the territorial issues, they remained [as received] the door open for further talks, Denktas stressed. Referring to Greek Cypriot reply to recently-presented Turkish Cypriot proposals, President Denktas said: "We have given them the stars and they are still not satisfied. They want the moon now." Denktas agreed with Waldheim that in case both sides fulfilled their share to achieve progress in the talks, positive results could be obtained.

KIPRIANOU SAYS WALDHEIM MAY ACTIVELY INTERVENE

NC191852 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1730 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] President Kiprianou has stated that recently the UN secretary general declared his intention to more actively intervene in the Cyprus issue. However, Kiprianou added, we do not know if ultimately there will be such an intervention or what form it would take. He stressed: We will support every effort that will bring about the implementation of the UN resolutions and the summit agreements.

Speaking at Ephtagonia, where he presided over a meeting on problems of villages in the area, President Kiprianou also stressed that the Greek Cypriot side's proposals to the Turkish Cypriot side will be valid provided that there is a package solution of the Cyprus issue. He also said that it will be a mistake to interrupt the dialogue, as some circles have been suggesting, because the advice of various countries is to continue the dialogue. President Kiprianou said that any interruption of the dialogue would not be our fault but could be proved, beyond any doubt, to be the exclusive responsibility of the Turkish side.

CAGATAY, DELEGATION END TALKS, LEAVE TURKEY

[Text] The Turkish Cypriot prime minister, Mustafa Cagatay, and his delegation left Turkey today. Cagatay was seen off at Ankara Esenboga Airport by Zeyyat Baykara, the state minister, deputy prime minister and chairman of the Cyprus Coordination Council. Baykara said full agreement was reached with the Turkish Cypriot Prime Minister on measures to be taken to raise the level of prosperity of the Turkish Cypriot community. He added that Turkey would continue to extend aid to the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus so that the latter's economy could become self-sufficient.

Cagatay said that at the meetings they determined measures which would encourage investments in Cyprus, increase production and solve the financial problems of the state economic enterprises there. He pointed out that the economic stability program for the Turkish Cypriot economy would be implemented within a certain period. Cagatay explained that due to the composition of the Turkish Cypriot Legislative Assembly the government had to assume the duties of a minority government. He stressed that for this reason the opposition had to approach the problems positively.

MISSING PERSONS GROUP REJECTS TURKISH ALLEGATIONS

NC170002 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1630 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Text] In a statement issued today, the Pan-Cypriot committee of relatives of undeclared and missing persons rejected the allegations of the chairman of the committee of relatives of Turkish Cypriot missing persons that the Greek Cypriot side is exploiting the issue over missing persons for propaganda reasons. The Pan-Cypriot committee statement stresses that without exception all the missing persons for whom information is being asked were captured, on the basis of facts, by the invading Turkish troops and by Turkish Cypriots during or after the invasion. The statement also says that the main difficulty in the investigatory committee for the missing persons is the negative and unacceptable positions of the Turkish side, which are contrary to the terms of mandate of the committee.

WALDHEIM'S NEW IDEAS DESCRIBED AS 'DANGEROUS'

NC181220 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 18 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Foreign diplomats at UN headquarters friendly to Cyprus described UN Secretary General Waldheim's announced intervention (under the form of "new ideas") as at least dangerous to the Cyprus issue. The permanent contributor to TA NEA in New York reports that these diplomats revealed that the United States and the EEC are behind Mr Waldheim, and that they show "particular" interest in the Cyprus issue. Specifically it is said that representatives of these countries also recommend "the need to finalize the basic framework for the solution of the Cyprus issue before the end of the year"....

The same report adds that Mr Waldheim is expected to move toward this direction by utilizing the presence of the representatives of the two sides at the UN General Assembly in New York as well as of the countries that are directly interested in the issue. According to the same sources, the report announcing the UN secretary-general's intention to intervene in the Cyprus issue aims to rule out any other developments as, for example, the debate of the Cyprus issue at the General Assembly. Yesterday, in Nicosia, the government spokesman said in answer to a question regarding the press reports on the existence of a plan by U.S. President Reagan to solve the Cyprus problem, that the Cyprus Government knew nothing about such a plan.

The government spokesman also said that as yet no date had been set for U.S. President Reagan's meeting with President of the Republic of Cyprus Spiros Kiprianou.

GREEK SIDE TO SUBMIT MAP, PROPOSALS TO WALDHEIM

NC210958 Nicosia I DHILINI in Greek 21 Sep 81 pp 1, 8

[Text] The Cyprus Government has decided to submit a map and fresh proposals on the territorial aspect in a new effort to secure continuation of the talks. According to fully established reports, Foreign Minister Rolandhis will convey this decision to Mr Waldheim when they meet next Thursday. The decision to submit a map on the territorial aspect will depend, however, on the assurances to be given by the Turkish Cypriot side, namely that it will positively respond to our proposals and that it will submit fresh constructive and satisfactory counterproposals.

According to the same reports, this will be determined by the consultations which have begun and are expected to be intensified in New York where all the interested parties have already gone. The submission of a map by the Greek Cypriot side is favored by almost all the Western countries which have pointed out that the achievement of progress in the Cyprus problem would be possible only through concessions by both sides. As is well known, the submission of counterproposals on the territorial aspect together with a map, which will indicate the regions to be under Turkish Cypriot control, is favored by AKEL which, however, insists that the four guidelines be accepted. Political observers have voiced reservation as to whether the Cyprus problem will be debated at the UN General Assembly following the government's decision to submit a map--something that would give fresh impetus to the dialogue.

PAPER CRITICIZES ONAN'S 16 SEPTEMBER STATEMENT

NC180927 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 18 Sep 81 p 5

[From the "Positions" column: "Onan's Statement"]

[Text] We believe that the main conclusion derived from talks held the day before yesterday and particularly from Mr Onan's statement made prior to the meeting is that the rift that exists between the views of the two sides on negotiation and a solution of the Cyprus problem continues to be great and very difficult to bridge.

It is unnecessary to stress once again that the stalemate that exists in the Cyprus issue, or, better, the lack of progress therein, is due to the Turkish side's intransigent and negative stand. We would like to stress that a negotiating side can reject the other side's proposals, but for it to maintain that the other side did not submit proposals on a specific issue at the negotiations is unacceptable. Turkish interlocutor Onan said this yesterday [as published]. He maintained that the Greek Cypriot side did not submit proposals on the territorial aspect of the Cyprus issue. Thus he wanted to overlook the fact that for 4 continuous years all were waiting for the Turkish side to submit proposals on the territorial issue, since our side had already done so on time and on the basis of responsibilities undertaken on what had already been agreed upon.

Truly, this is the most fundamental fact of Mr Onan's statement made the day before yesterday, regardless of the fact that when journalists pressed him later, wanting perhaps to explore his position, he said that the Greek Cypriot side had submitted proposals and a map on the territorial issue, but "they were submitted in 1977 and now we are in 1981." He then asked for new proposals on the territorial issue. Moreover, we believe that Mr Onan's position the day before yesterday was provocative. This signifies lack of good will toward the negotiations, unjustified delay and other facts that make, in a certain view, intervention by the UN secretary general imperative. But, as we stressed yesterday, this intervention must be made within the framework defined in the UN resolutions on Cyprus and the summit agreements.

PAPANDREOU 'SHADOW CABINET' LIST CIRCULATES

[Text] Paris, 20 Sep--A foreign news agency reports from Athens a list of members of the "shadow cabinet" which Papandreou has prepared so that he might be able to take over power after the elections. The "shadow cabinet" list has been circulating among Greeks in Paris for a number of days.

However, it seems that this list will have to undergo some changes in case of a PASOK victory, following the PASOK "broadening" with center-rightwing elements. The list is:

1. Prime minister: A. Papandreou, age 64, economist.
2. Deputy prime minister: I. Alevras, age 64, former bank employee.
3. Coordination: K. Lazaris, age 50, professor.
4. Foreign affairs: K. Papoulias, age 52, lawyer, (Until recently, this portfolio was being claimed by I. Kharalambopoulos, age 63, a retired officer who has been bypassed by Marxists on Papendreou's close staff)
5. National defense: D. Khondrokoukis, age 66, retired officer.
6. Industry: Tsakhatzopoulas, age 43, engineer.
7. Justice: M. Koutsoyiorgas, age 60, lawyer.
8. Culture: Melina (Mercouri) Dassin, age 63, actress.
9. Finance: A. Intzes, age 45, lawyer.
10. Public works: Y. Yennimatas, member of the PASOK Executive Committee.
11. Press-information: Y. Kristodhoulidhis.
12. Social services: A. Maraslis, medical practitioner.
13. Education: El Verivakis, lawyer (collaborator of A. Panagoulis during the attempt against Y. Papadhopoulos' life).

Yennimatas, Tsokhatzopoulos, Papoulias and Intzes belong to the "hard core" and they "prohibit" the appointment to ministerial positions of persons whom they do not consider "faithful."

AVEROF URGES ARMED FORCES TO REMAIN ABOVE POLITICS

NC192038 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] It is the duty of the armed forces to again remain above political strife during the election period and to continue demonstrating their high mission, undistracted from political disputes. This was pointed out by Deputy Prime Minister and National Defense Minister Averof in an order of the day which addressed to the country's armed forces on the occasion of his swearing in as minister of national defense.

At the beginning of the order of the day to the armed forces, Averof says that he writes today not to advise them to work hard and to be conscientious or to set new goals for professional achievements. He stresses: All these have been done for 7-and-1/2-years and, thanks to the arms forces' capabilities and morale, they have been excellent. He then points out that since 1974, when he was entrusted with the Ministry of National Defense, the sovereign Greek people were called five times to decide with their vote--twice in parliamentary elections, twice in municipal elections and once in a referendum. In all five cases, the armed forces' attitude was irreproachable.

The deputy prime minister and national defense minister points out that although in the past it was almost a rule, on the day immediately following the elections, for the defeated to blame intervention by the armed forces, from 1974 and until today there has not been a single such complaint or even a single charge about even an isolated local incident. In the order of the day, Averof points out that all political groupings have admitted that the armed forces have stood above political strife.

Finally, Averof expresses the certainty that the armed forces will observe a similar attitude to the good functioning of our really enviable parliamentary republic.

GOVERNMENT REJECTS EUROPEAN DEMARCHE ON AEGEAN

European Parliament Report

TA181452 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Report by correspondent Nusret Ozgur from Strasbourg--recorded]

[Text] The European Parliament voted and approved the report which grants the Greek islands in the Aegean a trade region of 200 nautical miles as well as recognizes the right to a continental shelf and which extends Greek territorial waters to 12 nautical miles. Only 110 parliamentarians out of 434 were present during the discussions which lasted about 1 hour.

Fifteen parliamentarians used their right to comment on the report. Speaking on this subject, the Greek parliamentarians recalled that there were generally no problems between Turkey and Greece and that the problem was created by Turkey. They claimed that the efforts exerted by Turkey in order to influence the European Parliamentarians constituted interference in the affairs of the parliament. Other speakers that spoke on behalf of their political groups said that the European Parliament was not the place to discuss problems connected with the Aegean Sea, and added that this quite difficult and complicated issue should be settled through peaceful negotiations between Turkey and Greece.

The report prepared for the redetermination of EEC custom borders following the full membership of Greece into the EEC asks for equal trade region, territorial water and continental shelf rights to the Greek islands.

No motion was presented in a bid to exclude the pro-Greek proposals from the report which was drawn up by French parliamentarian Marie Madelaine Foucart who retired following this session. (Startzager), who is responsible for agricultural affairs of the EEC commission, opposed the items of the report which include the continental shelves of the Greek islands into the EEC customs border. Recalling that this matter was not settled yet in the international conference on the Law of the Sea, the parliamentarian asked for the amendment of these clauses. However, his proposal was rejected in a vote by the parliament.

The views of the EEC Commission on the Aegean are closer to those held by Turkey and have, legally speaking, more weight than the views of the European Parliament. The report adopted by the European Parliament today together with the report prepared by the EEC commission will be submitted to the EEC Ministerial Council. It is this council which has the last say in the determination of the EEC customs border.

More on Report

TA181602 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1555 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Ankara, 18 Sep (AA)--Diplomatic observers in Ankara said Greek attempts to internationalize the Turkish-Greek differences in the Aegean Sea and to turn them into an issue concerning all EEC members will not bind Turkey at all. A report elaborated by French parliamentarian Marie Madelaine Foucart, rapporteur of the European Parliament's External Relations Commission is being used by the Greek Government to further such attempts.

Madame Foucart shows the Greek islands in the Aegean as an indivisible part of Greece, hence, within the customs border of the EEC. Inclusion into the customs union of archipelagos was not foreseen by the EEC regulations before the full Greek membership in the community, observers point out. She proposes that a midline should be drawn between the Turkish coast and the Greek islands, a proposal Turkey has been opposing. She also wants delineation of customs borders which would include within the borders the continental shelf, another point Turkey opposes.

Turkey has been advocating resolution of questions with Greece through bilateral talks and avoidance of unilateral decisions, observers said, recalling that Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen told a press conference in London Thursday under the international sea law Greece did not enjoy special rights because of her islands in the Aegean.

The report will be discussed by the European Parliament today.

Foreign Ministry Reaction

TA181613 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] A Turkish Radio and Television correspondent has learned from Turkish Foreign Ministry officials that the report approved by the European Parliament concerning the Aegean Sea does not reflect the stand of the EEC countries. The report approved today by the parliament has no binding power on the EEC Ministerial Council, which is the body that will make the final decision on the matter. Officials added that the report approved by the parliament included elements to which Turkey would never agree.

Further Reaction

TA191606 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1450 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Ankara, 19 Sep (AA)--Foreign Ministry Spokesman Nazmi Akiman said the report on EEC customs borders adopted Friday by the European Parliament included certain unacceptable elements contrary to Turkish views.

In reply to questions from the press, Akiman stressed the adoption of such a report did not mean Turkey would forfeit her rights. Neither would it mean that Turkey has to change her position in talks with Greece, he said, adding: "Turkish-Greek differences on the continental shelf can only be resolved through bilateral talks."

General Evren Remarks

TA192056 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that the rule of a country by a military administration for a long time has certain drawbacks and that Turkey's administration will be entrusted once again to a parliament and government elected by the people. General Evren gave a dinner in honor of the visiting NATO joint chiefs of staff as the chief of Turkey's General Staff in Istanbul this evening. In a speech at the dinner, General Evren said that the Turkish Armed Forces had been forced to take over the administration of the country 1 year ago. He added: I am saying they had been forced to because had that intervention not taken place maybe you would not have been able to be here today.

General Evren said: As I pointed out in my speeches on the first day and the following days, the administration of the country will be entrusted once again to a parliament and government elected by the people. The reason is that I and all my commander colleagues know very well, based on our historical experience, that a country cannot be ruled by a military administration for a long time. We also know that some of our friends do not approve of this intervention, that they do not want to believe in our present remarks and that due to the old friendships they established with the former leaders of Turkey they want to punish us through other means. However, we are very pleased to see that the majority of our Western friends received our operation with understanding.

General Evren pointed out that the military was carrying out its program step by step and that they achieved significant success during the past years. He stressed that anarchy and terrorism had been eliminated to a large extent. He said that 20 to 22 persons used to be killed every day before the intervention while the figure had now dropped to one person every 3 days. General Evren stated: As I have always said, I do not think it is possible to completely eliminate anarchy and terror under the present conditions. If all the Western countries refuse to accept the persons who seek political asylum but who are really members of clandestine organizations or criminals, if they cooperate effectively in the struggle against international terrorism, then anarchy and terrorism might be eliminated completely. Let us not forget that this terrorism might spring to those countries in the future. In fact, it already has.

In his speech, General Evren gave detailed examples of Turkey's political and economic conditions prior to the 12 September operation. He said: The parties did all sorts of tricks in order to come to power. Under those conditions, the armed forces carried out this intervention in order to save the country from the threat of a civil war.

Gen Kenan Evren recalled that the NATO Military Committee tour had not been carried out last year due to the opposition of the political authorities of a few countries to the 12 September operation. He added: During the past year our neighbor and friend Greece returned to NATO's military integration. As a result, my colleague, the chief of the Greek General Staff was able to participate in this tour and Greece was thus included in the tour.

In his speech, General Evren stressed that Turkey was improving economically with every passing day. He said: During the short time you will be in Turkey you will see the peace and security which has been ensured in the country in the faces and expressions of our citizens; you will thus believe how right we are in our remarks.

KREISKY URGES SOLIDARITY TO HONOR COAL CONTRACTS

AU180905 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0500 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Excerpt from Kreisky speech at a Linz Austrian Socialist Party rally on 17 September--recorded]

[Text] In the past few years, Austria has granted Poland large loans and we have granted these loans because we expected and continue to expect to get in return increasing coal deliveries from Poland. However, the events in Poland--we certainly welcome the establishment of free trade unions there--have led to constantly declining coal deliveries. And thus, I would like to tell the Polish workers, in my capacity as chairman of a large workers party, that they, of course, also have commitments toward the workers and employees of other countries who in the past were ready to grant them loans and who now expect to be able to do so in the future only if the other side keeps its commitments. A small country which lives on the work of its people will no longer be able to afford such things in the future. All our understanding and all our sympathy, notwithstanding, we have to say that our possibilities are limited and that, while being ready to help wherever we can, we also have to expect Poland to increasingly fulfill the commitments adopted in the past.

CHANCELLOR WARNS AGAINST ANTI-AMERICANISM

[Text] In an interview published on Thursday in Bonn, Chancellor Kreisky warned against insulting or hurting the United States. Anyone wanting Washington and Moscow to come to the conference table must not incessantly abuse the Americans, said Kreisky who next Tuesday will meet with FRG Chancellor Schmidt in Vienna for a political exchange of opinions. It is necessary to hold a quiet and reasonable dialogue with the Americans, he said. Otherwise, nothing will be achieved "except a total destruction of that military equilibrium without which peace in the world cannot be maintained."

WILLOCH SAYS CONSERVATIVES TO FORM GOVERNMENT

NC182215 Paris AFP in English 2205 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Oslo, 18 Sep (AFP)--Negotiations between the three Norwegian non-socialist parties trying to form a centre-right coalition broke down Friday evening, paving the way for a Conservative minority government led by Kaare Willoch.

Following a meeting which lasted for more than two hours the three parties announced that they could not agree on a proposal to tighten the abortion laws. Mr Willoch then said the Conservative Party would form a minority government.

The negotiations between the Conservatives, the Christian People's Party and the Centre Party (agrarian) have been going on since the Labour government was defeated in general elections on Monday.

The Conservative Party won 54 seats in the 155-seat parliament, while the three non-socialist parties together hold 80 seats. The Socialists lost 11 seats but remain the largest group in parliament with 65 seats. The other parties represented in parliament are the Left Socialists with 4 seats, the Liberal Party (2) and the ultra-right Progress Party (4).

The change of government will take place on October 13, the day after the outgoing Labour government presents its state budget for 1982.

The Conservative government has said it will pursue a policy on reducing marginal income taxes and business taxes, slow down public spending, improve Norway's competitive [words indistinct] foreign markets and curb bureaucracy.

Mr Willoch, 53, who is an economist, also wants to reduce state domination in North Sea oil projects.

Rejects 'Separate' Zone Talks

LD191432 Hamburg DPA in German 1344 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Hamburg, 19 Sep (DPA)--The next prime minister of Norway, Kaare Willoch, rejects the idea of starting "separate negotiations" with the Eastern block on a nuclear-free zone in northern Europe. In a prereleased interview with BILD AM SONNTAG, the Conservative politician said this would jeopardize solidarity with the West. The question of a nuclear free zone in northern Europe can be solved only as part of a package in negotiations between NATO and the Warsaw Pact.

Willoch said: The most important part of the disarmament negotiations must be to reduce the number of nuclear arms in Europe. Norway will work, above all, for effective controls if suitable agreements are achieved.

The incoming head of government emphasized that the three nonsocialist coalition partners have committed themselves to the increase of Norway's defense budget by 4 percent in real terms per annum. This was more than the guideline of 3 percent envisaged by NATO.

GENERAL CONFEDERATION OF WORKERS CALLS FOR STRIKES

NC191435 Paris AFP in English 1419 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Lisbon, 19 Sep (AFP)--The powerful Portuguese General Confederation of Workers has called for all unions in the country to form a movement of national strikes against the "anti-worker" policies of the centre-right government of Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao.

The government, whose policies were approved yesterday in parliament, considers Portuguese workers as a "swarm of parasites," the confederation said.

Meanwhile, a series of strikes swept across the country as textile workers continued their four-day walkout for higher salaries and their union announced plans for a national textile workers strike on Wednesday and Thursday. Portugal's international truck drivers walked out for 24-hours yesterday, also in a bid for higher salaries.

GOVERNMENT, BRANDT DIFFER ON 'ZERO OPTION'

LD211548 Hamburg DPA in German 1344 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Sep (DPA)--The Federal Government and SPD Chairman Willy Brandt have made differing statements about the conditions for NATO's renunciation of the deployment of nuclear medium-range missiles--the so-called zero option.

Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told journalists in Bonn today that those weapons which have led to tension in Europe must be "removed completely" if the West renounces its counterarming.

In contrast, Brandt said in Hannoversch-Muenden yesterday that the zero option could mean that the West's counterarming could be made superfluous by the other side "withdrawing somewhat" from its arms buildup.

Becker said, however, that his definition of the government's understanding of a zero option should not be interpreted as a negotiating position since it is not an opportune time to make this known "in its entirety."

BERLIN MAYOR WEIZSAECKER COMMENTS ON U.S. TALKS

LD211630 Hamburg DPA in German 1436 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] Berlin, 21 Sep (DPA)--Governing Mayor of Berlin Richard von Weizsaecker (CDU) has proposed talks between the United States and the Soviet Union on renouncing the siting of U.S. neutron weapons in Europe, together with simultaneous withdrawal of Soviet tank units from the "forward battlefield" in Europe.

This proposal was heard "with interest" during his talks last week at the U.S. State Department and with Senate and Congress members, Weizsaecker told journalists in Berlin today on his return. His personal initiative is aimed at being able to do without siting neutron weapons in Europe but at the same time making it clear that the Soviet tanks basically represent an "attack potential" and are not necessary for defense.

Weizsaecker stressed that people in the United States did not understand right away that the majority of the population supports the Americans and the alliance, while at the same time it is a numerical minority that is demonstrating against the alliance and the United States, some carrying out radical attacks on Americans. During his talks, he repeatedly encountered strong doubts regarding the SPD attitude.

Weizsaecker stressed that he had, however, gained the impression that the Americans' interest in Berlin and their involvement in the city is unbroken. During his discussions, he underlined his view that within the alliance, defense readiness as well as an active policy toward the East are of fundamental importance. It should not be allowed to happen that only one part of the alliance should concern itself with one of these tasks while the rest are concerned with the other. Only if the partners on both sides of the Atlantic are aware of the inseparability of these two tasks, can success be expected in the future.

CHEYSSON VIEWS PALESTINE, MIDDLE EAST PROBLEMS

PM180847 London AL-HAWADITH in Arabic 18 Sep 81 p 25

[Interview granted by French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson to 'Adnan Nasrawin in Paris; date not given]

[Excerpts] French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson admitted to AL-HAWADITH that his first Arab tour (Amman, Damascus and Beirut) cannot provide a miraculous solution. He reaffirmed that France is committed to the principles contained in the Venice declaration and has, therefore, been anxious to consolidate the general international principles that call for nonrecognition of the legitimacy of occupation of the land of others by force, for granting the Palestinian people their right to self-determination and also for safeguarding the security and safety of every country in the area. This was the prelude to the following interview.

AL-HAWADITH: What proposals do you believe are useful to solve the Lebanese crisis?

Claude Cheysson: First, I must say here that it is up to the Lebanese themselves to indicate what sort of aid we can give them as friends in order to help them solve the crisis. The Lebanese Government must assume full responsibility and must speak on behalf of Lebanon. I would say that this is a basic and inevitable condition so that foreign friends can help.

What would happen to the world if a foreign visitor arrived in a certain country and told the officials of that country you must do this or that or a guest came to your house and told you that the way you tie your necktie is unsuitable and you must tie it differently? It is up to the Lebanese Government alone to say what its intentions are and to indicate the type of aid it wants from friends abroad. Of course, we in France are prepared to give any help of whatever type Lebanon needs.

At present in Lebanon, there are efforts which I consider to be of great importance, the efforts which are being exerted by the Arab four-man committee consisting of Syria, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait [and Lebanon], which the Lebanese themselves recognize as having authority and being effective in contributing to finding a solution to the crisis.

AL-HAWADITH: There is a certain state behind the crisis from which Lebanon is suffering, namely, Israel. This is because of its military interference in Lebanon. Will France do something to make Israel stop its attacks on Lebanon?

Claude Cheysson: We tell Israel the same thing we tell the others. Lebanon is a state recognized by the United Nations and its borders are recognized by all the world community. Therefore, these Lebanese borders must be respected by everybody. The presence of foreign forces on Lebanese territories is absolutely unacceptable unless it is at the request of the Lebanese Government. Otherwise, it is contrary to all international laws and custom and constitutes a blatant violation of the principles of the contemporary world community. It must be condemned. This makes me say that, as far as I know, the Lebanese Government never asked Israel to send its military forces to Lebanon. Therefore, as far as we are concerned, any Israeli military operation inside Lebanon is regarded as absolutely unacceptable, just as the entry of any foreign force into any part of the world is unacceptable.

AL-HAWADITH: Is it possible to interpret your meeting with Yasir 'Arafat in Beirut as recognition of the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people?

Claude Cheysson: After having met with Faruq Qaddumi, in charge of the PLO Political Department, in Paris and after having met several times with the PLO representative in Paris, it was natural that I should meet with Chairman 'Arafat during my visit to Beirut and to listen to his views and visualizations regarding a just solution in the Middle East region because the PLO must not be ignored in any peaceful efforts in the area. With regard to the PLO being the sole representative of the Palestinian people, France agrees with the rest of the EEC countries that it is not up to them to decide who represents and who does not represent the Palestinian people.

We recognize the PLO as representative of the Palestinian people which must participate in the peace efforts in the area. But we cannot say that the PLO is the sole representative of the Palestinian people because these people at present and under occupation cannot freely elect their representatives. What we are demanding first is for the Palestinians to be given their Palestinian land and then, within the framework of the right to self-determiniation, for the Palestinians to be allowed to choose who represents them and to decide the legal and political structures of their state.

AL-HAWADITH: What is France's attitude, under its new administration, toward the Camp David accords and what has been achieved within this framework on the road to a peaceful settlement in the area?

Claude Cheysson: With regard to the Camp David accords, our stand differs from the Egyptian-Israeli-U.S. viewpoint and at the same time agrees with the viewpoint of our Arab friends on the subject. We believe that these accords have achieved some progress on the road to peace between Egypt and Israel but are incapable of achieving the just and comprehensive peace the area is seeking through the recognition of the Palestinian people's legitimate rights, because the Palestine problem is the crux of the Arab-Israeli conflict to which a solution must be found if strong bases for peace are, indeed, to be found in that part of the world.

We believe that to achieve any positive progress in the peace process in the Middle East the officials in these countries themselves must participate in the peace process, which must include all the parties concerned in the Arab-Israeli conflict on a sound basis ensuring a just and comprehensive peace that will realize the hopes and aspirations of all these parties.

France is prepared to participate with the rest of the European countries to achieve the requirements of a just and lasting peace in that part of the world.

AL-HAWADITH: Do you support the convening of an international conference on the Middle East in which the United States, the Soviet Union and the European countries would participate?

Claude Cheysson: It is not up to us friends abroad to call for an international conference to discuss the Middle East problems because this is the right of the peoples of the area; it is up to them to call for such an international conference. If we are invited to participate in the peace efforts, we will play our role with full responsibility and seriousness to help the parties concerned to negotiate and to find a peaceful solution to their problems.

With regard to the Soviet Union's role in the Middle East, I believe that no solution can be found to any problems in a part of the world as important as the Middle East area without a superpower like the Soviet Union participating in it. I would say more than that: We the French have time and time again said that the Palestinian people must be given the right to find a home for themselves and a framework for a state. One day this will require the need to recognize the framework of the Palestinian state and its accession to the United Nations. All this naturally requires the participation of the Soviet Union. This is absolutely indisputable; it is clear and certain.

PS EXECUTIVE AGREES ON MOTION FOR CONGRESS

PM211209 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Sep 81 p 8

["J.-M.C" report]

[Text] The PS Executive Committee meeting in Paris on Saturday, 12 September, ended in the different groups uniting behind the text proposed by Lionel Jospin on behalf of his own group. However, the "synthesis" obtained before the congress itself--scheduled to take place in Valence 23-25 October--was only achieved among three of the party's four groups, namely, those of Jospin (Mitterrand), Mauroy and Chevenement. Indeed, Rocard's friends decided to accept Jospin's text as it stood and not to propose their own text. Therefore, they did not, and should not in the future, take part in discussions on the distribution of responsibilities in the national and federal leaderships.

Although they did not take part in drawing up the "synthesis," since they did not present a text, the Rocardians will be part of this synthesis. "We will take account of the situation in the party," Jean Poperen said, before adding, for the benefit of Rocard's friends, "it will be up to us to define your place."

The ineffective nature of proportional representation--this only takes effect when the different groups confront each other before the members--moreover led Pierre Joxe to recall his longstanding opposition to this rule which favors factionalism. Nonetheless, sine the PS leaders' function has changed--their role is now to pass on government action--it is not surprising to see the method of appointing leaders change "de facto."

In the absence of political debate, more important discussions took place within the resolutions committee. In particular this body received the premier (for 45 minutes) and the Elysee secretary general who took part in all the Executive Committee's work. Pierre Beregovoy criticized Rocard's friends for abandoning all "political dignity." The essence of the discussions can be summed up as a dialogue of the deaf. In a way, Mitterrand's supporters were saying to Rocard's supporters: Express your differences! The latter replied: We agree with the government's action, therefore we cannot disagree with the party line.

Since no difference of opinion could be officially recorded, the members will be presented with one motion.

COLOMBO DISCUSSES POLAND WITH GDR'S FISCHER

AU212005 Rome ANSA in English 1952 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] New York, 21 Sep (ANSA)--Poland was the central theme of talks Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo had separately today with his East German counterpart Oscar Fischer and Yugoslav head of diplomacy Josip Vrhovec. Colombo arrived here yesterday for the inauguration of the U.N. assembly.

In his meeting with Fischer, he warned that any violent external intervention in Polish affairs would compromise all prospects for a resumption of East-West ties. He emphasized that it was in the interests of everyone to avert any repressive action that would harm efforts to bolster detente.

POPE ADDRESSES POLISH PILGRIMS ON HOME SITUATION

AU211550 Rome ANSA in English 1535 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] Castel Gandolfo, 21 Sep (ANSA)--The Polish Government should be sure to respect the right of self-determination in Poland as the basis for independence and a true indication of government's desire for peace, according to Polish-born Pope John Paul II. The pope made his remarks on Sunday during his angelus message to a crowd of approximately ten thousand gathered at his summer retreat in this hill town south of Rome.

The three-minute speech, however, was addressed to a small group of Polish pilgrims in their native language and was not translated for other members of the audience. "Too much blood has already been shed in the course of the last war for us to think or speak about a new blood-letting" the pope said, clearly alluding to a Polish party communique released last Wednesday charging that "political opposition...signified the tendency toward confrontation and threatens bloodshed". The pope also underlined Poland's right to solve its problems "alone".

Repeating an appeal made last week by the Polish episcopal conference, the pope said that the "Solidarity" union and the Polish Government must return to the negotiation tables "for the good of all nations". Appealing once again for moderation, the pope added that "last year's experience has shown that the Polish people are capable of solving these difficult problems peacefully, without violence and without bloodshed".

"At the same time," the pope continued, "it should be emphasized that a nation which has paid such a high price for its independence has the right to solve its problems autonomously".

Interrupted by applause from the Polish pilgrims and the singing of their national anthem at this point, the pope concluded his message by warning that "the right to self-determination is a principle of the international order, and should be respected because it represents a true desire for peace".

PCI'S BERLINGUER ASSESSES POLISH SITUATION

LD211534 Belgrade TANJUG in English 1341 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 21 Sep (TANJUG)--Italian Communist Party leader Enrico Berlinguer has stated that the only means for a solution to the crisis in Poland lies in consultations to reach accord between the three main components of Polish society--communists, trade unions and the Catholic Church. Reiterating the Italian Communist Party's stand, Berlinguer said that Poland and Iran, both situated in key world zones, are countries in which the escalation of the situation could ultimately upset the international balance.

In his speech at the close of the traditional festival of the Italian Communist Party press organ UNITA i Turin yesterday evening, Berlinguer set out as well-known the Italian Communists' stand on "the development of a very acute crisis which, it must not be forgotten, has come about as a consequence of a deep gap between the Polish United Workers' Party and a large part of the working class and people." In this context, Berlinguer said that "the developments of the past few weeks and days are very disturbing".

Underlining that "within and without the very process of the indispensable reconstruction initiated by Polish workers there is in evidence disintegrational pressure", the Italian Communist Party secretary-general warned of the "danger of an attempt to reach for unacceptable and catastrophic solutions by means of force".

Referring to the deteriorating international situation with the accent on the problem of peace, Berlinguer mentioned the "grave Soviet intervention in Afghanistan", the dangerous turn taken by Reagan in the U.S. policy and certain Chinese stands calling for "criticism".

Berlinguer told the critics of the Italian Communist Party's international activities, particularly its struggle for peace by means of rallying all peaceful and progressive forces, that the Italian party is a force which is known and carries weight also outside Italy. This is why the Italian Communist Party feels it its duty to commit all its energy to the struggle for peace, together with the powerful pacifist movements of Europe, the non-aligned countries and the forces of the other America, Berlinguer said.

PCI MEETING DISCUSSES NATURE OF POLAND'S PROBLEMS

PM210741 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 12 Sep 81 p 17

[Giovanni Rossi report: "Discussions with our Polish Comrades"]

[Text] Bologna--Today Poland is a laboratory in which a delicate experiment is being carried out and has not yet been completed. Or, to put it in the words of a Polish comrade, the outcome of this experiment "will be a very difficult birth but it may produce a very beautiful baby." This statement was made by Eugeniusz Duraczynski, director of the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] Central Committee Science and Education Department. Comrade Duraczynski took part in a debate at the L'UNITA provincial festival in Milan--which Comrade Claudio Petruccioli attended--and in a similar initiative at our newspaper's festival now going on in Bologna. Both initiatives took place before we knew of the "political manifesto" adopted by Solidarity Thursday, which aggravated polemics and revived anxiety. Accompanied by Comrade Antonio Rubbi, chief of the PCI Directorate's Foreign Section, the Polish leadership member also had meetings at our party's Central Committee offices in Rome yesterday.

The discussions were fairly lively, characterized by a "continuous bombardment" of questions from the audience, who wanted to understand what is happening in Poland and in what direction things are moving. The meetings in the past few days are the ideological continuation of those held 1 year ago with Comrade Ryszaro Woyna, then a PZPR Central Committee member and Sejm deputy, on the occasion of the national communist press festival.

The questions were the same as were asked then, and can be summed up in one: Is it possible to democratize Polish society without any dramatic break while maintaining its socialist character?

In his own speech, Rubbi stated among other things that the PCI feels complete solidarity with the work of renewal carried out by the PZPR (which was solemnly sanctioned by the Polish party's ninth extraordinary congress) and is watching with anxiety and disagreement, on the other hand, the positions--apparently opposed but which converge in the attempt to impede the reform process--of those who want to swallow up the innovations introduced into the country's situation by the reformers and of those who (like the extremist minorities of the independent trade union Solidarity and the so-called confederation for an independent Poland) are aiming at confrontation by forcing the situation to exceed what is compatible with the national situation (the state of the economy) and the international situation (respect for the Polish Republic's alliances).

Comrade Duraczynski illustrated his country's negative economic situation with great clarity and a wealth of facts.

"The State of the Economy--Industrial production has fallen by 18 percent over last year; wages have increased by an average of 26 percent; employment is stable; the debt to the West and East is enormous ($25 billion to the Western countries alone); coal production (one of Poland's main activities) may, according to forecasts, drop from 200 million tons per year to 155 with exports slumping from 26 to only 8 million. To maintain coal production, at at least 175 million tons it is necessary to increase the number of miners by 40,000. The outlook for agriculture is better.

This short description shows the urgent need for far-reaching social reforms. This is the reason for the debate on self-management which divides the party and government from Solidarity and which is causing internal divisions within the independent trade union itself.

"State of Conscience"--Eugeniusz Duraczynski used this expression to describe the difficulty of mobilizing the country morally to tackle the crisis and the failure of the whole of Polish public opinion to fully understand the need for a common effort and common sacrifices to steer the country into calmer waters and lay a strong foundation for future development.

"Party-Trade Union-Church"--These are the three interlocutors of Polish society, the PZPR leadership member said. Today the PZPR can be seen to be greatly reformed. More open to society's requests and committed to the democratization of the institutions, the independent trade union (which is not the only trade union in the country but certainly the strongest and to which some 900,000 communists belong) is deeply divided. The prevalence of those who regard it as a workers' trade union and the defeat of those who want to turn it into a force opposing the system will be a great contribution to the building of the new Poland. Duraczynski repeated the common desire for dialogue in the PZPR and the Catholic Church and stressed the responsible attitude adopted by the latter.

The battle is difficult and complex--the Polish representative concluded--but the PZPR has the possibility and the commitment to achieve the socialist renewal.

DEFENSE MINISTER LAGORIO ON COUNTRY'S PEACE ROLE

PM171355 Rome AVANTI in Italian 13-14 Sep 81 pp 1, 24

[Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio article: "Line Between Politics and Propaganda"]

[Text] There are some bizarre aspects in the present Italian political and press polemics on the problems of foreign and military polity. There is a persistent tendency to divide not the world but the Western alliance into the good and the bad, the United States is very bad--indeed, "diabolized," according to Bernard-Henry Levy's definition. Bad too are the European allies which heed it too much and which think too much about a defense policy. So Italy is bad. France and Germany, however, are good.

This is a purely propagandist outlook. Indeed, looking at the facts of the matter, it becomes apparent that Italy, France and Germany are all pursuing the same policy.

Indeed, on more than one occasion, Italy has spearheaded a movement which has characterized the European allies in recent months and which is designed to guarantee that the entire West will never lose sight of the fact that our supreme asset--and mankind's--is peace. In this connection, I will merely recall the European defense ministers' first meeting with the new U.S. defense secretary, Weinberger. We were in Bonn, last spring. It was a matter of letting the U.S. ally know, a few weeks after Carter handed over to Reagan, that Europe did not want to change its policy from the 1979 deliberations--to adjust the balance of forces somewhat between East and West but at the same time to begin negotiations with Moscow to try to reduce our respective arsenals and avoid an unrestrained arms race. Before meeting with Weinberger, the Europeans held consultations behind closed doors and decided to entrust Italy with presenting the United States with the European platform.

This was possible because Italy is considered a credible interlocutor for a policy of peace. We are not only the ones who spend the least on weapons but we are also the country which, within the area in which it is integrated or toward which it leans (the southern NATO region), performs a calming and stabilizing action through its own initiatives.

As for armaments, Italy's expenditure of $7 billion in 1981 compares with $25 billion on the part of France, Germany and Britain. As a proportion of its GNP Italy spends less than anyone else in the world--even less than Bulgaria. As for its policy of stabilization, Italy is weaving and developing a fabric of increasingly close cooperation (including in the defense field) with strongly neutral countries (such as Yugoslavia, Algeria and Malta) and with countries resistant to destabilization processes (such as Egypt, Somalia and Tunisia).

Italy believes that peace can be organized. It must be pursued with a policy that will make it possible, step by step, by taking every opportunity offered and patiently surmounting all the existing difficulties. Politics, not propaganda. Realistically, therefore, this means a policy that will always keep the following four aspects closely bound: 1--a correct balance of forces; 2--deterrence, which objectively exists when a balance exists; 3--detente, which manages to emerge from the frost of conflicts when deterrence is effective; 4--disarmament, which in the long term is the inevitable result of detente.

France and Germany are in solidarity with Italy on these points. It is therefore surprising when some people try from time to time to set Paris and Bonn against Rome and Mitterrand and Schmidt against Craxi.

Schmidt, who has the most efficient army in Europe, decided on Euromissile bases before we did. The new Pershing-2 will be sited in the very bases which now house the old Pershing-1 (and incidentally Britain decided a year ago to deploy cruise missiles in the London area, halfway between Oxford and Cambridge universities).

Mitterrand--who has no problems concerning Euromissiles, because France has the nuclear weapon, manufactures nuclear bombs, has a submarine fleet equipped with nuclear weapons, has a military modernization program which aims to rapidly increase its share of the GNP from 3 to 4 percent (Italy has maintained a stable figure of 2.3 percent for many years) and has plans to develop an international arms trade, which is already three times the size of Italy's--is in solidarity with NATO's options; to restore the balance and to negotiate.

So Italy is not what some critics claim, the stupid servant of someone or other. In its foreign and defense policy it is in good company, with Mitterrand and Schmidt. Italy does not suffer from a militaristic delirium. It believes that the first thing to be done is to seek the solution of international conflict through patient and tenacious diplomatic action, particularly within the area in which its voice and influence can be best heard and felt.

It is in this context that the latest political innovation in the Mediterranean--President al-Qadhdhafi's outburst--must be viewed. His ambassadors hastened to issue denials, but two facts remain: the forewarning that Libya will seek an agreement with (and within) the Warsaw Pact and the use of military force, which is not exceptional but recurrent in Libyan policy. Italian Communist Mario Albano, speaking critically of the "Al-Qadhdhafi unknown quantity" in Rinascita 11 September, recalled the invasion of Chad, the military assistance to Amin Dada, the paratroopers' raid in Gafsa, the threats to Malta and the Saipem affair [Italian drilling ship buzzed by Libyan aircraft off Malta] and the interception of the vehicle carrying the Sudanese Communist Party leaders (who were subsequently executed in their own country). In fact, Rinascita could have extended this list, but that is not the point. The important thing is to consider what Italy must do when a fiery and unpredictable neighbor shows that he is not afraid of a profound destabilization of the area with which we are concerned.

Of course, there is first a political action to be carried out. We are acquainted with history and acknowledge our past responsibilities in Africa and believe that it is right to have good relations with everyone in the Mediterranean, and that the Soviet leadership group must be encouraged in the correct manner to realize that it is in nobody's interest to create further causes for concern and friction on the European chessboard (and therefore in the Mediterranean, too).

But those responsible for defense policy in Italy cannot evade their duty, which partly consists of forming defense forecasts; without alarm or alarmism, but with the aim of guaranteeing the country the maximum possible security.

In this connection, faster progress is being made with a number of programs already known to Parliament and on which there was no disagreement--for instance, with the construction of a continuous southern radar network for the prompt monitoring of all low-flying aircraft, and a gradual and limited "dilution" of our forces toward the south and the islands to ensure better protection of our national territory and better deployment in the event of natural disasters.

Concerning these initiatives--and others, such as the so-called "Rapid Intervention Force" about which there is a great hullabaloo but which is basically simply the implementation of a decision by Parliament to entrust the army with the task of providing more rapid assistance to entrust the army with the task of providing more rapid assistance in the event of disasters and which therefore implies no new marine regiment but simply an improved and select organization of existing contingents, which are given special training and equipment for civil assistance--concerning all these initiatives some people are making a great outcry and talking again in terms of militaristic (or even warlike) outlooks allegedly prevailing in national defense policy. Of course, the cruise missiles are lumped together with this.

This entire polemic is too exaggerated not to have some less immediate motives. It seems that the political debate has been given an unexpected boost. Perhaps one should accept the fact that the notion that the Atlantic alliance is an acceptable idea is losing some of its supporters. Years ago, in the midst of detente, while Italy was taking its first steps in the policy of "major understandings," the theory was formulated that the Atlantic pact was an umbrella beneath the shelter of which the legitimization of the left (but primarily of the PCI) for the shared government of the country could grow. It was an unusual time; the West was cutting its military spending everywhere and the treaty of hope was being signed in Helsinki. But in the Eastern bloc things were different; the military building programs continued and in both conventional and theater nuclear fields the Eastern bloc achieved an irremediable superiority. Nobody said anything; there were no marches, no signatures. The West gave no signs of reacting and the Atlantic pact continued to be an umbrella.

Later the growing imbalance between East and West posed the problem of safeguarding peace through a policy in which the restoration of the balance is the first step in an action of deterrence and thus detente. It was then that some people on the left, in Italy, decided to emerge from under the umbrella. There is therefore enough food for considerable thought, enough for one to recognize the line between politics and propaganda and to understand the broader implications of the current debate on our country's defense policy.

IRANIAN STUDENTS BEGIN HUNGER STRIKE IN PERUGIA

AU211600 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] Perugia, 21 Sep (ANSA)--Five jailed Iranian students began a hunger strike today in this central Italian city where they are being held after their arrest during recent scuffles. The students, followers of religious leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeyni, told prison officials they were fasting in protest over Italian press reports.

The students claim that newspaper coverage here favors the cause of those who oppose the Khomeyni-inspired government. Fighting erupted recently between the numerous students, committed to different sides in the present Iranian crisis, at the university for foreigners here.

FIRM AGREES TO RESUME PORT CONSTRUCTION IN IRAN

AU191741 Rome ANSA in English 0800 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (ANSA)--A project for the construction of a port in Bandar Abbas in Iran, interrupted after the Iranian revolution in 1978 will get under way again, it was learned here today as sources here announced the signing of a new contract between the Condotte company of the Italstat group and the Iranian Government.

The project, scheduled to be completed by 1984, is valued at 450 million dollars plus 212 million dollars worth of credit for work already completed. The contract was signed in late August, but the announcement was postponed while waiting for the final approval of both governments.

Additional work for completion of the entire port complex will bring the value of contract up to 950 million dollars, even though there has been a reduction of 25 percent in the work outlined in the original contract signed in 1975. Construction is scheduled to begin in October and will employ 200 Italian and 2000 Iranian technicians.

FOREIGN TRADE MINISTER ON SOVIET GAS PIPELINE

AU191742 Rome ANSA in English 0832 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 19 Sep (ANSA)--Information on developments in negotiations between Italy and the Soviet Union for Italian participation in a projected 4000 kilometers gas pipeline carrying methane gas from Siberia to Western Europe continent were contained in a report delivered to the cabinet by Foreign Trade Minister Nicola Capria.

A statement released Friday by the Foreign Trade Ministry noted that the cabinet had approved Capria's suggestion for the institution of a "center of coordination" for both the negotiations relative to credit lines and construction contracts requested by the Soviet Union for the pipeline, and agreements on the price of the gas furnished to Italy.

Capria also advised the cabinet of the necessity for a unified position of all the European partners involved in the construction and utilization of the pipeline.

GUNMEN SHOOT PRISON GUARD TO DEATH IN MILAN

AU181708 Rome ANSA in English 1543 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 18 Sep (ANSA)--A 25-year-old guard at Milan's San Vittore prison was shot to death early this morning while driving to the prison when five gunmen following him in another car opened fire on him after he was forced to stop his own vehicle. The ambush apparently began when a car drew up alongside the one the prison guard was driving and forced him over.

The victim, Francesco Rucci, attempted to get out of his car and flee but was brought down by continuous gunfire.

Later in the morning, an anonymous telephone caller told a private radio station here that a so-called "communist nuclear" was responsible for the killing. Police investigators, however, have said that Rucci's death can probably be attributed to a personal vendetta rather than to the beginning of the "autumn campaign" announced earlier by Italy's Red Brigades terrorists and other terrorist organizations.

The guard served in the San Vittore wing turned over to prisoners convicted for terrorist-connected crimes before his transfer to the Bergamo prison, some forty kilometers from Milan. He recently returned to duties in San Vittore on his own request, and was sent to the female inmates wing.

PCI'S NAPOLITANO ON PARTY UNITY, PSI 'AMBIGUITY'

PM181503 Milan L'UNITA in Italian 7 Sep 81 pp 1, 2

[Report: "Our Only Concern Is To Find Answers to the Crisis"]

[Excerpts] Parma--Speaking at L'UNITA'S provincial festival, party Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano stated: In the past few weeks, the press and the various party spokesmen have paid a great deal of attention to the PCI. But although more careful and objective comments have been made, the tone has once again been set by the scandalous exaggerations and distorted interpretations aimed at portraying the PCI--or a PCI leadership group--as deeply divided or torn by dark internal struggles. It is not difficult to see what they are trying to do, to overshadow and push into second place the real and serious crisis affecting the DC and the difficulties and conflicts facing other parties. This attempt does not seem to us to have succeeded, and, moreover, the facts are plainer than any propaganda maneuver. This is especially true of the serious and dramatic elements of the international crisis and the Italian crisis; and it is on these crises that the discussion and arguments at top level in the DC seem so confused and inadequate that the limits and ambiguity of the PSI's line stand out, and people are trying in vain to conceal this with a deluge of speculation on the debate and the policy to which the PCI and its leadership group are committed.

It ought to be easy for serious observers--they should not pretend that it is so difficult--to understand the terms of our search, although it is right that we should try to achieve greater clarity. For instance, you just have to look back at the discussion which took place--with the party secretary's participation--at the last Central Committee meeting, to the report which was submitted by Comrade Natta and to the unitary conclusions which were reached. The analyses of the serious nature of the Italian crisis, of the depth of the damage and risks threatening democracy, the weight of the moral question and of its decisive implications; the assessment of the results of our opposition and our battle in the country; the need to work for a real democratic alternative, whose foundation is cooperation among the leftwing forces, and the resulting criticism which we level at the PSI for following a policy which goes in an entirely different direction; was all fully agreed at the July Central Committee meeting.

There was and still is discussion on points which require more detailed examination, difficult syntheses and practical verification, in a situation full of desperate urgency and frequently conflicting requirements; how to improve and reform the democratic political system, the "party system"--exploiting and asserting the PCI's "originality," the theme of January's Central Committee meeting--how to enrich the content of the battle for a democratic alternative; how to combine the frank and open affirmation of our substantial differences of opinion with the PSI; the realistic acknowledgement of the prevalent trends in the PSI and of the difficulty of a united future; the necessarily energetic defense of our identity and our positions with the exploitation of the many experiments in cooperation; the search for every possible area of agreement, and the determined effort to attain a new agreement on the left.

The fact that we are comparing different opinions and concerns on these points can be no surprise, nor can it conceal the extent of the unity which was confirmed at the July Central Committee meeting.

PARTY LEADERS REACT TO POPE'S THIRD ENCYCLICAL

AU170920 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Text] Rome, 17 Sep (ANSA)--"Laborem Exercens" ("On Human Work"), Pope John Paul II's third encyclical of his pontificate released Tuesday, has come up for considerable comment by Italian political figures.

The deputy secretary of the Catholic-inspired Christian Democrat Party, Vittorino Colombo, appropriated the contents of the pontiff's open letter to Roman Catholic bishops for his party. In a piece appearing in today's edition of the Christian Democrat daily, IL POPOLO, Colombo said, "Now it is the duty of Christian Democrats to broaden and assimilate this new message to become the propagators and testimony of it in a society tormented and shaken by contradictions generated by the neo-capitalistic social system".

The secretary of the neo-fascist MSI, Giorgio Almirante, issued a statement in the evening in which he said that he was "moved and proud to see such authoritative support for the principles and values of a battle of modern and traditional civility which the Italian right has always fought, often in isolation".

The head of the tiny right-of-center Liberal Party, Valerio Zanone, in his comment on the 30,000-word text of the encyclical, was critical of the pontiff's references to economic liberalism.

"Liberalism is not a form of economics but of humanism", Zanone challenged. "Liberalism is not an ideology of capitalism. Liberalism is a policy of human liberty and property rights, and the organization of the market is only an instrument for a freer human condition", the Liberal Party secretary said.

Lucio Toth, the national chairman of the Christian Workers Movement, said that he was convinced that, "when the encyclical condemns political strikes there is no intention of referring exclusively to the situation in Poland.

"The pope is speaking to the world and in indicating the social terrain as the area for the primary labor union commitment, he wants to totally affirm the autonomy of the labor movement and get away from all claims of political representation of parties which are based on classist ideologies".

FOOT CONFRONTS CARRINGTON ON MOSCOW TALKS

PM211609 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 21 Sep 81 p 28

[Nicholas Comfort report: "Foot Challenges Tories' View of Soviet Offer"]

[Excerpt] Mr Foot yesterday challenged Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, to substantiate the government's declared view that there is nothing new in nuclear disarmament proposals put by President Brezhnev to the Labour leader last week.

Peeved by a claim from Mr Douglas Hurd, minister of state at the Foreign Office, that in the talks in the Kremlin he had "fallen victim to an old propaganda offer of two years ago," Mr Foot responded: "If they say this proposal was made prior to December 1979 I would like to know the date, the proposition itself and, even more, what was the answer of the British Government."

Mr Foot said on BBC radio's "The World This Weekend" that "even before I get back to the country almost, the Foreign Office put up one of their ministers to denounce me and attack me and say it was all a trick. I have got some questions for the Foreign Office and I would much rather it was dealt with by Lord Carrington than by some maybe over-ambitious under-secretary."

Despite the official view that Mr Brezhnev gave little or nothing away in offering to withdraw some of Russia's SS-20 missiles if NATO's cruise and Pershing missiles were not deployed, Mr Foot remains convinced that the proposal is an advance.

The Labour leader's anger at Mr Hurd's statement that he had simply been the latest in a line of Western socialist leaders "who have trooped to Moscow to have the wool pulled over their eyes" stems from a belief that the reverse is true.

He and Mr Denis Healey emerged convinced that they had done far better than Herr Willy Brandt, the German socialist, to whom Mr Brezhnev made an offer of a "moratorium" on SS-20 deployment, enshrining Russian nuclear superiority in Europe.

However, when pressed on how the new offer appeared, Mr Foot conceded to a questioner that he saw it as a "breakthrough," and the criticism began.

Despite considerable scepticism in official circles, Mr Healey is expected to report to the government on the talks. The likelihood is that he will ask for and be given an appointment with Lord Carrington to convey not only the substance of the Brezhnev offer but the atmosphere of last Thursday's meeting.

Mr Foot and Mr Healey will also be reporting on the Moscow talks to Labour's National Executive when it meets on Wednesday, and Mr Foot is also expected to dwell on them in his report next week to the party conference in Brighton.

MORNING STAR: POLAND CAN SOLVE OWN PROBLEMS

PM211611 London MORNING STAR in English 21 Sep 81 p 1

[Editorial: "No Easy Answers for Poland"]

[Text] Eight years ago this month, the U.S.-backed fascist generals smashed the democratically-elected Government of Chile.

Today in El Salvador, the U.S.-backed puppets are hanging on to power by violent military repression.

And in southern Africa, it is the U.S. which backs the apartheid regime in its aggression against Angola and its illegal occupation of Namibia.

Nor are these recent events isolated falls from grace. They are of a piece with the whole history of U.S. imperialism. Remember Cuba, Vietnam, and a host of other places throughout the world.

Viewed in that light, State Department spokesman Alan Romberg's pronouncement accusing the Soviet Union of interfering in Poland is sheer hypocrisy. Interference in other countries' affairs has always been the way of life for imperialism.

That is why international meetings of the world's communist parties have repeatedly stated that respect for the equality, national sovereignty and independence of other countries, and strict adherence to the principle of non-interference, must form the basis of relations between states whatever their social system. Those meetings laid such stress on these principles because they constitute the only possible way in which the world's progressive forces can be united and mobilised in the struggle to defeat imperialism, and therefore must be regarded as inviolable principles governing the class struggle on a world scale.

This is why the MORNING STAR has always maintained that only the Polish people can solve the problems they face, difficult as they may be. And in that respect, the prime responsibility for mobilising all the forces in Polish society rests with the communist party and the working class.

This is why it is crucial that everything possible should be done to avoid open confrontation between the working class organised in Solidarity, the government, and the communist party.

The problems in Poland arise primarily from past mistakes and the totally inadequate involvement of the people in the decision-making process. It is not going to be easy to work out effective means of greater direct participation. Conservative tendencies will have to be overcome, and so will those which arise from impatience and lead to the embracing of hasty, ill-considered alternatives.

Such tendencies apart, the questions in dispute are themselves highly complicated. For example, no one can say that it is easy to decide who should appoint managers to publicly-owned enterprises, when there has got to be the greatest possible direct involvement of the workers in the management process itself.

All these various issues can only be solved in an atmosphere of discussion and negotiation, in short, via political means.

Repressive measures against those with contrary views, who nevertheless operate within the constitutional framework, will solve nothing. Neither will extremist actions by sections of Solidarity; nor pressure from outside the country, however well-intentioned it may be.

Clearly there are anti-socialist forces active in Solidarity and elsewhere who would like to turn the clock back in Poland. And true to type, some of them will undoubtedly be active in trying to stir up anti-Soviet feeling.

It is understandable that the Soviet Union should be concerned about this, and it is obvious that such anti-Soviet elements have to be combatted as part of the political struggle. But, at all times, it is very important to distinguish between those who criticise existing structures in order to improve them, and those who criticise in order to destroy socialism altogether.

Despite present difficulties, it is a historical fact that socialism has brought with it big improvements in Poland. The task which the Polish people now face is to open up the full potential for democratic decision-making in all spheres of life which socialism makes possible. Success in this endeavour will make a big contribution to the struggle for socialism not only in Poland but everywhere in the world.

DENKTAS EXPLAINS TURKISH CYPRIOT POSITION

London Press Conference

NC220848 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 17 Sep 81 p 8

[Text] London, special dispatch—TFSC President Denktas held a press conference the other night at the Topkapi restaurant which is known to be a center for the London Turks. At the conference, which was attended by about 30 foreign journalists, Denktas said: "The chances for a conciliation in Cyprus are 50-50. I hope that we will arrive at a settlement through intercommunal talks."

Stating that "the thing that Cyprus lacks most is that there is no regional agreement satisfying both sides," Denktas added: "If the Greek Cypriot side acts honestly, I hope that we will reach an agreement by the end of this year."

Denktas then said that the Turkish Cypriot side brought its territorial proposals to the negotiating table and urged the Greek Cypriot side to do the same. Denktas also called upon UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to persuade the Greek Cypriots to submit their own counterproposals.

Finally, Denktas stressed that the first step to be taken should be to accept the principle of equality between the two communities and added that a few years after the agreement has been signed, mutual confidence will be restored.

[Abdullah Azizoglu report]

[Excerpt] Lefkosa (AKAJANS)--It has been reported that UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim will ask Denktas and Kiprianou to a summit meeting. HALKIN SESI, which is published in Lefkosa, reported in banner headlines that the intercommunal talks have entered a new phase and that they are being driven into an impasse. The paper added: "The idea of a new summit meeting has been gaining group recently at the UN headquarters. The paper stated that a summit meeting may be held between TFSC President Rauf Denktas and Greek Cypriot leader Spiros Kiprianou under the control of the UN secretary general. HURRIYET REPORTS ON EC CONCILIATORY PLAN

NC151202 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 8 Sep 81 p 13

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Lefkosa (HURRIYET)--At the meeting held during the past weekend in London by the EC foreign ministers, it was decided "to prepare conciliatory proposals" and also to take effective steps on the Cyprus question.

According to information received from Greek Cypriot circles, Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis briefed the foreign ministers' conference on the proposals and maps submitted by the Turkish Cypriot side, stating that these proposals could not constitute a basis for the continuation of the negotiations and for the settlement of the Cyprus issue.

It is being argued that the EC foreign ministers have asked FRG Foreign Minister Genscher, British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and French External Relations Foreign Minister Cheysson, who is currently engaged in mediation work in the Middle East, to draft a conciliatory plan for Cyprus and to make contacts with the countries concerned.

The Greek Cypriot radio carried a report in its morning program yesterday that the EC foreign ministers met to discuss proposals submitted by Greece and Italy and that they adopted important decisions on the Cyprus issue. Greek Cypriot sources say that important contacts also will be made during the talks concerning the renewal of the Cyprus-EC relations due to be held on 14 September in light of the decisions made by the foreign ministers.

MINISTRY DENIES REPORT ON EXPULSION OF ALIENS

NC211932 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1900 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Text] An Interior Ministry statement, replying to a press report that all foreign subjects are being expelled from Cyprus, mentions that Interior Minister Veniamin never gave instructions, as mentioned by the press report, to the aliens department to send warnings to all foreign subjects to leave Cyprus, to limit the activities of agents of foreign countries or to enable unemployed Cypriots to be appointed to positions they may hold.

The statement adds that the aliens department, when sending warnings to foreign citizens, is simply applying the relevant law and regulations. It is further explained that the Interior Ministry periodically--usually every 6 months--reviews the various requests by aliens for residence and work permits for the purpose of establishing whether any further extension of these permits serves the island's economy and is in the public interest.

AKEL REPORTEDLY BACKS IOANNIDHIS FOR PRESIDENT

NC200753 Nicosia TO VIMA in Greek 20 Sep 81 pp 1, 12

[Excerpt] In all certainty, President Kiprianou will not emerge as the new president of Cyprus in the elections in 1983--given the fact that AKEL, on which Kiprianou pins all his hopes, is moving its support to another politician, more specifically, Interlocutor Ioannidhis.

The first typical volleys already have been fired against the president by Papaioannou who, in a speech at Limassol, accused the government of limiting itself to words and not proceeding to deeds, asked for the formation of an ecumenical government, blamed the government for the condition of the government machine (called the public service "dilapidated") and spoke about the need for an earthquake in the government machine to purify the situation.

At the same time, according to authoritative reports by TO VIMA, AKEL is especially annoyed by the fact that its suggestion on the submission of territorial counterproposals was not supported by the government. In this instance, President Kiprianou avoided supporting the AKEL proposal on the submission of territorial proposals, which envisaged ceding 22 percent [of Cyprus land] to the Turks, because he had perceived that by supporting such a proposal he would have irreparably damaged his prestige among the refugees (especially among Kyrenia people) and would ahve endangered his prospects for victory in the 1983 elections.

According to the same reports, AKEL's nascent campaign against President Kiprianou will continue and, eventually, become more intense.

RALLIS DELIVERS CAMPAIGN SPEECH IN THESSALONIKI

NC202124 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1830 GMT 20 Sep 81

[Text] We are now broadcasting a summary of the speech delivered this evening by Mr Rallis, prime minister and New Democracy leader, at Aristotelis Square in Thessaloniki:

At the beginning of his speech, Mr Rallis stressed that he chose Thessaloniki as the starting point for the election battle for the victory of democracy--Thessaloniki, which is the most dynamic national bastion--because the battles of the nation, the battles of progress, the battles of New Democracy which have begun from this city have all been won. He added: Therefore, all of us together, starting off today, will win the 18 October battle. I call you, he said, neither a sea of people, nor flood of people nor a torrent--you are the energetic, the decisive, the indisputable majority of the people.

Further on Mr Rallis stressed that the entire spectrum of the opponents of New Democracy, from the extreme leftwing to PASOK, have been shouting for months only one slogan: Change.. He said: It appears that they attach to it magic qualities, because it covers with mystic fog the most different and most dangerous subversive efforts. This general and vague slogan conceals the multifaceted effort to overthrow everything in the name of all the undemocratic doctrines. Thus, the slogan for change is being gaily announced with similar mystic persistence by both PASOK and the KKE. Each one of their frenzied supporters shouting for change does not know and does not want to think where this change would lead, a change that includes everything that the zealots of subversion have been dreaming of--from the strangulation of private initiative through socializations and nationalizations, up to the introduction of a socialist constitution which would solely allow the functioning of socialist and Marxist parties; from the introduction of partisanship in trade unionism and local self-government to the abolition of democratic procedures and the dictatorship of the proletariat which the communist party has been seeking. And yet, PASOK describes this party as democratic despite the fact that its first goal is the abolition of democracy.

Mr Rallis added: We are heralding continuity, unceasing creation, and continuous progress because we, our own, the great and healthy camp of the Greek people have made Greece a state thanks to sense of responsibility and hard work and above all thanks to national inspiration; we have made Greece a modern and strong state, a state of progress and prosperity, equal with the most advanced countries of Europe. Mr Rallis said: It is a fable, it is a rotten fabrication that PASOK cherishes progressive ideas. It is our duty to proceed one day with the necessary overthrow of this fable. If you compare today's declarations of PASOK's mystic socialism to the totalitarian theories that prevailed 50 years ago, you will be horrified by the similarities. It is the same populist spirit, the same fanatical intolerance, the same contempt for parliamentary democracy, the same worship for partisan despotism, the same frenzied adventurism in foreign policy.

They call us the rightwing, the sinful rightwing, and this includes all of us, all of you, this impressive rallying together of peasants, workers, artisans, merchants, scientists, technicians, craftsmen, private and public servants and pensioners; they call us the sinful rightwingers and slander us of being attached to the road of dependence and submission to foreigners. Thus, all of us here tonight are slaves to the great capital and the foreign powers. And our opponents are the only ones who follow a genuine and independence political line, and together with them the KKE which, being "free" from any dependence, has been striving so that Greece may belong to the Greeks.

If with the term rightwing they mean that we have not cooperated in the past nor we will cooperate in the future with those who believe in communist ideology, they are perfectly right to call us rightwingers. But if with this term they want to challange our democratic beliefs, they are wrong. We are the true democrats, we who have opposed the dictatorship of any color.

Then Mr Rallis referred to the so-called dictatorship that was guided by foreigners, as he said, which abolished democracy in our country and stressed that we, some more and some less, are responsible for creating the climate which allowed the coupists to predominate. No foreigner is responsible for this. It is useful to recall this so as not to make the same mistakes and not to try even now, after 14 years, to blame others for our mistakes. Resistance, at least passive resistance, has been waged by all the Greeks. And 99 percent of all the politicians have actively struggled and have personally made statements condemning dictatorship, because we believe, and we continue to believe, that dictatorship of any color is catastrophic for the country. Of course, there have been some people who condoned, and still fewer, who cooperated with dictatorship. They have been punished, but they cannot be branded forever. The payment of debt entails settlement of the account; the contrary would have been inhuman and antisocial.

We, the sinful rightwing, have taken over the country defensively unprepared and diplomatically isolated on the verge of war. We have managed to avert the danger of a war adventure without diminishing our national prestige. We have followed a multifaceted foreign policy which took us out of international isolation. Never before has our homeland enjoyed higher prestige and radiance in the whole world. We are following a European policy because we are Europeans. Our opponents, as a group, are against this policy. They are fanatically against our integration into the EEC and they want to take us out of NATO so that they may turn Turkey into its proxy in the Aegean. However, where does PASOK want to lead us? Without the consciousness of international reality, it wants to radically change our international place. It wants to lead us out of the European Community--the sole solid union of true, multipartisan parliamentary democracies. PASOK wants to take us out of NATO, but it does not tell us from where it would receive defense aid and the spare parts necessary to our army. PASOK does not realize that, if we leave NATO, Turkey will remain the sole prop of Western alliance in the eastern Mediterranean at a time when Mitterrand's new Socialist France courageously and with determination declares its adherence to NATO and the need to maintain the balance between the East and West.

We respect the Third World government and their philosophy, but our paths do not coincide either geopolitically or in world theory. Therefore, Mr Rallis stressed, our foreign policy is the policy of wisdom, honesty and how to constantly serve the firm national interests.

Mr Rallis further referred to the advantages from our country's integration into the EEC and, particularly, to the significance of this integration. He stressed that for this year, the first year of our integration, a net benefit of 39 billion drachmas is gained by our country; we will be collecting this amount in stages and the majority of this amount will be enjoyed by the farmers. Despite the fact the PASOK leader is aware of the tremendous advantages from our European policy within the EEC, he pretends ignorance solely because the historic agreement for the integration was signed by the New Democracy government. I ask all the misled followers of PASOK: When before in the history of modern Greece were we in a position to determine the contents of international decisions within the ranks of EEC which affect our country as well as the prosperity of other people? Why are governments of countries such as Spain and Portugal today appealing to Greece and asking us to support their application for accession into the community? What are the aims of PASOK's policy outside the EEC? Does it aim at strengthening or weakening of democratic institutions which it pretends to defend.

Mr Rallis concluded: Our opponents are leading us toward isolation. They want us to be alone without friends, allies or orientation. They want to lead us toward Marxist socialism, an obsolete state of affairs that has failed in practice and its tragic example today is the case of Poland. The time has come to make your choice, neither the green substance [PASOK's colors] nor the red flags have dazzled your judgment. On 18 October, you will give the overwhelming victory to prosperity and progress, to New Democracy, to Greece.

Papandreou Response

NC211742 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 21 Sep 81 pp 1, 15

[By special correspondent Yeoryios Votsis]

[Excerpts] Larissa, 21 Sep--In Larissa yesterday, Mr Andreas Papandreou described Mr Y. Rallis' speech in Thessaloniki as a message to split the people into nationalists and corrupt elements and unite the fascists with the parliamentary rightwing. Mr Papandreou also expressed his regret over the absolution which the prime minister granted to the coupists, as well as to CIA and the U.S. Pentagon, in a manifestation of an unprecedented national sellout. Against this message of discord, Mr Papandreou had earlier posed a declaration of patriotic and democratic reconciliation.

Mr Papandreou said the following about yesterday's largest gathering in the history of Larissa:

--From the balcony: "Tonight, the change has triumphed. With this grandeur, unique and unbelievable gathering, Larissa has voted for: People-PASOK in power; "Yes" to the change. This is not a political gathering, it is a catalytic plebiscite which clearly shows that the time has come for the national, social, economic and cultural liberation of the Greek.

--As soon as he came down from the platform, he told newsmen:

"It really was a thrilling gathering. Not only was the square full--which, according to Yeoryios Papandreou, when it becomes full it elects a prime minister--but also the streets and balconies beyond the square were packed with people."

After he had watched the New Democracy gathering in Thessaloniki on the television, the PASOK chairman commented on Mr Rallis' speech as follows:

"For the Greek people, it [the speech] is a message of discord. It continues the policy of nationalists and corrupt elements with a different phraseology but the same content. At the same time, it is a message of unity between the juntist-royalist rightwing and the parliamentary rightwing.

"The absolution of the 21 April [1967] coupists is the basic concept of Mr Rallis' speech which is camouflaged with a lot of stands against PASOK and inadmissible terminology. Finally, it is the vindication and legalization of the juntist-royalist rightwing. And what strikes me is the fact that, although the Greek prime minister is well aware of what happened on 21 April, he granted absolution to the CIA and the U.S. Pentagon and put the entire blame for the dictatorship on the Greeks."

Mr Papandreou spoke from the platform for 1 hour during which he was interrupted continuously by the slogans of the crowd. His impromptu speech, among other things:

--Spoke about the meaning of the 18 October election showdown between the change and conservatism, moral independence against foreign dependency and subjugation, economic development against decline and bankruptcy.

--Referring to the relations with Turkey, Mr Papandreou denounced the continuing dialogue the exclusive content of which is what Greece would cede from its sovereign rights. He also condemned the government's good will gestures which downgrade national defense and declared: We have nothing to share with the Turkish people who are being oppressed and are waging the same struggle as we are to rid themselves of foreign dependency. However, we would like to make it clear that, with the PASOK in power, Greece does not claim anything nor would it cede an inch of its territory or seas.

We want good neighborly relations with Turkey. However, Turkey must take it for granted that Greece has absolute control in the Aegean Sea and islands.

--Mr Papandreou reiterated the well-known PASOK positions on the EEC and NATO in order to declare: The allies understand only one language--strength and determination. As of 18 October, they will be obliged to respect our people's strength and determination.

--Referring to Mr Rallis' preelection assurances that our economy is doing well, he recalled Mr Averof's known statement to stress: Mr Rallis must decide whether he is mocking the people or his minister is mocking him. In no case, however, can Mr Rallis be a prime minister, nor can he ask for the people's vote and confidence.

--Mr Papandreou also referred to the scandal of the 150 billion drachmas tax evasion and stressed that in Greece only the working people are paying taxes, whereas the economic oligarchy do not pay a plugged dime.

PAPER REPORTS MAVROS DECISION TO JOIN PASOK

NC181548 Athens NEWS in English 18 Sep 81 pp 1, 12

[Text] Veteran politician Yeoryios Mavros announced Thursday he is joining the major opposition party, the Panhellenic Socialist Movement of Andreas Papandreou, to fight the Oct 18 general elections.

Mavros, 72, a former foreign minister, headed the Union of Democratic Center in the 1977 elections, when the party was pushed into third place by Papandreou's party.

Following the elections, the center faction split into several smaller groups, one of which, the Center Party, was headed by Mavros.

The announcement of Mavros' joining PASOK was accompanied with the release to the press of letters exchanged in recent days between Mavros and Papandreou.

"The battle to drive the rightwing from power and ensure change," Papandreou said in his letter, "requires the participation of the steadily anti-rightist centrist forces."

Describing Mr Mavros as the most respected politician expressing these forces, Papandreou invited him to join PASOK, saying that joining the efforts for attaining and consolidating change would be the logical continuation of Mavros' struggles to this day.

"I was moved by your letter," Mavros replied. "For me, participating in the struggle to put an end to the rightwing's grip of power is a self-evident course of action."

Mavros said he gladly accepted Mr Papandreou's invitation to "participate in the great fight that awaits us."

In statements to reporters after the announcement, Mr Mavros thanked Mr Papandreou for his invitation, which he described as a "significant political step towards the forces of the center and myself personally."

Mavros referred to his efforts to achieve unity of the centrist forces, efforts which, he said, despite their good reception by the people, were frustrated by the factionalism among center politicians. The crucial situation we are presently in, he said, makes the unity of all democratic forces essential. "I consider it my duty to take part with all my strength in the struggle, and I call upon all centrist forces to do the same," Mavros concluded.

On his part, Mr Papandreou said it was with special joy that he welcomed Mr Mavros as a "fellow fighter in the victorious struggle for change."

Yesterday's decision, he said, was for Mavros a continuation of a political career characterized by steadiness, honesty, fighting spirit and integrity.

The two leaders' elation was evidently not shared by other centrist political forces. The Democratic Socialist Party (KODISO) described as a "provocation" Mr Mavros' call to all centrists to vote for PASOK.

Mr Mavros' participation in the PASOK ticket, a KODISO statement said last evening, proves that he was negotiating his entry into another party even as he was presenting himself as the leader of the center.

Although there was no official announcement as to which PASOK ticket Mr Mavros will join, political sources said last night he would, in all probability, head the 12-person nationwide (Epikratias) ticket, whose members are elected in the order they appear on the ballot. The 12 nationwide seats are distributed in proportion to each party's nationwide performance.

Mavros' participation, according to political observers, will further strengthen PASOK's position. It is expected to attract a large percentage of EDIK's former constituency, which was 12 percent of the total vote in 1977. It may also provide an added impetus for conservative or centrist former New Democracy voters, dissatisfied with the government's performance, to vote for Mr Papandreou's party.

Late last night, it was announced that Mr Manolis Glezos, a national resistence hero and up to now a leading member of the United Democratic Left (EDA), was also joining the PASOK ticket. Letters between Messrs Glezos and Papandreou, similar to those between Papandreou and Mavros, were made public simultaneously with the announcement.

[Text] Brussels (HURRIYET)--Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who had a 50-minute conversation with EEC Vice President Haferkamp said the following in connection with the approval of the Foucart report in the European Parliament: "The European Parliament is not an organization which can introduce new rules to international law."

It has no such powers."

On the other hand, Wilhem Haferkamp stated that he was gratified with the information given by Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen regarding Turkey's effort to return to democracy. He said that the progress made toward a new return to democracy in Turkey was quite satisfactory and added: "We believe that this era will achieve a happy ending."

ARAYIS EDITORIAL DESCRIBES RELATIONS WITH LIBYA

NC211100 Ankara ARAYIS in Turkish 12 Sep 81 p 4

[From the editorial desk]

[Text] A voice from Africa: Dear readers, we have told you before that there are for Turkish journalists in Libya. One of them is Mehmet Erdul who has been invited to Libya to represent ARAYIS.

Just as we were going to press, a report reached us from Libya regarding the behind-the-scenes development of an event. Our friend Erdul reported that the Turkish press reaction to Al-Qadhdhafi's words has reached Libya. Erdul adds: "Al-Qadhdhafi's words, which have led to discussions in Turkey, were carefully taken out of a 48-page text which took 3 hours to read. The part concerning Turkey covered only three paragraphs. There is no doubt that even if Turkey had not been mentioned at all in the text, it would not have altered the meaning of the speech.

"It should not be forgotten that Al-Qadhdhafi had made this speech only a short time after U.S. planes had shot down 2 Libyan planes over territorial waters over which he claims sovereignty. Moreover, Turkey was not the only country to which Al-Qadhdhafi had addressed himself. Three days earlier, Al-Qadhdhafi had made another speech in which he had stressed that 'all imperialist fleets in the Mediterranean' should leave. The Soviet Union was one of the countries to which Al-Qadhdhafi referred.

"This speech, which was made under the psychological tension of the Sidra Gulf incident, may have caused some regret, but it ought not to have been exaggerated to such an extent. Relations between Turkey and Libya continue to preserve their spirit of mutual understanding and intensity. Certain Western countries seem disturbed over the development in the economic relations Turkey maintains with Libya, in addition to those with Iraq.

"According to a mutual cooperation and exchange agreement, signed between Turkey and Libya last June, the total value of exports Turkey can make to Libya has been raised to $1 billion. Soon after the agreement was signed, the U.S. news agency ASSOCIATED PRESS issued a special bulletin in which it communicated this development to its subscribers. Some U.S. and European newspapers lost no time in loudly expressing their worries about this progress in Turkish-Libyan relations. We deplore having to say that similar assessments had been made about the economic cooperation agreement Turkey signed with Iraq last month.

"It is quite clear that deducing meanings from a speech made in a moment of psychological tension may adversely affect relations between the two countreis. Whereas in evaluating Turkish-Libyan relations, it is not what Al-Qadhdhafi said but the way he behaved in the past and the way he is behaving now that should be taken into consideration.

"Today, 100,000 Turkish workers are employed in Libya. There are over 70 Turkish firms functioning there. The value of investments undertaken by Turkish firms in Libya is about $6 billion. It is, therefore, in the interests of both countries, that they refrain from acting impulsively but adopt a coolheaded approach."

TCP SECRETARY BILEN'S REPORT TO PARTY PLENUM

Part Five

TA161529 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 16 Sep 81

[Part five of report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] Democratic Freedoms Against the Revolt of the Reactionaries and the Profascists and Pressures of the Junta Directed Against the Progressive Forces

We do not forget that prior to 12 September, Turkey was shaken by an unprecedented wave of terrorism, the people no longer enjoyed security of life and the fascist threat was escalating. However, there is another fact that must not be forgotten. The fascist party, which is currently being tried for its bloody actions, was supported by certain sectors of the monopolistic bourgeoisie. This party relied on the powers of the most reactionary circles of the U.S. and FRG intelligence organizations and monopolies. Now this party is being defended by the reactionary bourgeois press. The most reactionary sectors of the junta and the army are provoking barbaric attacks against progressives and communists in a bid to avenge this party. The TCP is supporting the struggle of the progressive forces in order to ensure that fascist terrorism is crushed in such a way that it will never be able to raise its head again. The TCP warns our people against those who defend the fascist terrorists and calls on the people to oppose the attacks against the progressive forces. It is necessary to unite against the most reactionary elements within the junta and obstruct all the junta's attacks against the people in order to prevent the reactionary regime from becoming permanent and the fascists from regaining strength.

It is true that at present terrorist actions have been averted to a large extent. However, the state is terrorizing the forces who are in no way connected with terrorism. Relentless pressure, investigations and almost barbaric measures are continuing. The junta is applying methods that are characteristic of fascism. The military prosecutors who demand death sentences for the leaders of the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK] are actually the protectors of the archenemies of the working class. All forces in favor of democracy must unite in order to foil this murder plot against the DISK leaders. The extreme reactionaries were forced to recede in the face of national and international solidarity. It was exposed that the indictment of the DISK case--the existence of which was claimed by the military prosecution--does not exist. This event shows that if a struggle is waged, it is possible to succeed even under the difficult current conditions. The TCP wants all the DISK leaders and union militants to be released. All detainees who are not linked with terrorism must be released.

The struggle against torture--which is not denied by the junta--and all types of pressure and tyranny is urgent. The communists will not refrain from organizing the struggle to expose the torturers; they will enhance the solidarity with all the detainees in the dungeons of the junta who are subjected to torture. We will support with all our might the demands of wide circles for the abolition of the 90-day torture period law and the immediate appearance of all detainees before a judge.

Chauvinism is being stimulated in Turkish Kurdestan under the military dictatorship conditions. The TCP defends the demand for termination of the pressure against the Kurdish nation. Those who attack as enemies the Kurdish nation and the Kurdish revolutionary democrats under the guise of investigating secessionist terrorists are also the enemies of their own nation.

The TCP supports all the democratic forces that adopt an opposing stand to the junta regarding the constituent assembly issue even if they are not decisive. The consultative assembly of the junta is entirely for show. It is a disguise for dictatorship.

Current Struggle and Revolutionary Goal

Communists support and will continue to support all the actions undertaken by the masses to defeat all the means of pressure by the junta on the progressive forces and to obtain the smallest economic, social and freedom gains under the conditions of the junta. The struggle of the masses for these gains mean that they are on the road to revolutionary struggle. We do not subscribe to the approach of disregarding the masses on the grounds that it is impossible to make demands of the junta. The communists' approach does not consist of belittling the protest actions that start for the smallest democratic rights and thus push the masses toward (?apathy); it consists of encouraging these actions, spreading them and knowing how to adhere to the revolutionary goals of the party. Possibilities will arise within the masses' struggle process--even if it is for the sake of the smallest democratic and economic demands--to save our country from its current situation laden with threats and crises. The national democratic forces' front will emerge within the struggle process for all these demands. If an alliance can be established between a strong anti-imperialist and democratic people's movement and the patriotic sectors of the armed forces, this could begin to defeat the most reactionary and pro-American forces within the army and the junta. The unity of these forces may terminate the junta regime.

The temporary revolutionary government of the national democratic forces can be established. Initially, this government must ensure democratic freedoms, democratize the state, start deep anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic and agricultural reversals and hold elections for a democratic constituent assembly.

The Struggle of the Masses Will Determine the Outcome

Comrades: Under the reactionary dictatorship conditions, a new approach is necessary for the daily work of communists among the masses. There are two reasons for this. First, the situation prior to 12 September of relative democratic freedoms was replaced by a situation where all types of legal opportunities are very limited. At present, mass organizations that can openly declare their revolutionary democratic goals are, to a large extent dissolved. There are only mass organizations that are controlled by the junta, whose tendencies are restricted and mostly governed by reactionary administrations. The problem is to learn, on the one hand, to work within such organizations, and on the other hand, to find ways to organize the masses, who are left without organization, under the new conditions. Although these tasks are not totally different from the viewpoint of our tactics and although we were working in mass organizations with reactionary administrations prior to 12 September, these tasks are much more urgent. They must be the main focus of our work with the masses.

Second, it is necessary to analyse the experience of our work among the masses and eliminate the largely [word indistinct] mistakes that have arisen in the past. If our work among the masses is evaluated in a critical manner, the following result will emerge: During their work among the masses, our party organizations accrued rich experiences.

They fulfilled their duties with creativity and with a self-sacrificing attitude. That is a source of pride for our party. It is this sound amassing of experience that is currently the biggest factor in eliminating the main weaknesses arising in our work and [word indistinct] mistakes. On the basis of the past experience and achievements, it is necessary to better comprehend the dialectic tie between the role of the masses and the role of the party and erase all the traces of the error of replacing the masses with the party.

Is it right to particularly emphasize the issue of working among the masses at a time when legal opportunities are so limited, when there is no visible increase in the revolutionary activeness of the masses and when the party is faced with severe attacks? The emergence of a broad-based mass movement under military dictatorship conditions is not an illusion. Our experience prior to 12 September proves this argument although it has special aspects. May Day rallies and general strikes prove this. Does the unity and solidarity movement not show that despite its present deficiencies the anticommunist ban can be broken and that through their active struggle, the masses can impose such a movement on the sovereign classes.

Naturally, there is no question of repeating this experience now. However, there are also new experiences. The detailed analysis of the experiences gained by a series of illegal or semilegal worker committees in factories since 12 September will shed light on our future tactics. Experience shows that a correct approach to the work among the masses is very important especially in such a situation. If this problem cannot be solved correctly, in theory leftist [word indistinct] would emerge and in practice, the party would be isolated from the masses and adventurism would emerge. In turn, this would create a recession from illegal work, class collaboration under the guise of [word indistinct] and rightist opportunism. The current right attitude consists of organizing the work of a firmly disciplined party among the masses in deep secrecy, despite all the hardships. This daily work is the fulfillment of a historic task like enhancing the confidence of the masses in the party, unifying the broad alliances under the leadership of the working class, and establishing the (?subjective) effectiveness of the revolution in the end solution. The fact that the TCP can place such a task before itself under harsh conditions is the proof that it can [word indistinct] a historical optimism in every situation.

If we further ripen our work style among the masses and learn to work more efficiently even in mass organizations with reactionary leaderships, then we can prevent the military dictatorship from attaining its reactionary goals. The struggle of the masses will determine the outcome. The duty that befalls us is to assist the masses' daily struggle, learn from the masses within these struggles and show them the correct way at every step and phase of the struggle.

Comrades, the mistake we make at times during our activities among the masses is that we forget to see the masses as the subject, the real creator of the revolution. As a result of this mistake, in our daily propaganda, we give priority to explaining the struggle of the party and to prove to the masses that the communists do, indeed, struggle. The truth is that the masses, the working class and the toiler struggle. And the communists, unlike all the other political trends, participate in the foremost ranks of the masses' struggle. It works with all its might for the organization of that struggle and points to the right path.

Let us take another example: In the past, whenever the communists assumed administrative posts in this or that mass organization, the bourgeois and opportunist press used to scream: "The communists are taking over the mass organizations!" The point it, however, that even our press and propaganda at times used similar terms. However, the communists do not have special aims to take over the mass organizations. The fact that communists were appointed to top posts in many mass organizations in the past shows only one thing--the communists are gaining the trust of the masses.

Why? Because the communists who participate in the mass organizations do not run after private interests. Their only interests are the basic interests of the working class and of the toilers. The most basic characteristic which distinguishes the communists from the other trends is the fact that they express the masses' interests most (?fully) and that they are able to posit how they can achieve these interests in the most correct way. It is the fact that they know how to learn from the masses while teaching them.

One of the most important aspects of our work among the masses is to make the toiling classes and strata which are not proletarian realize the necessity of an alliance with the working class. This calls for continuous work among the classes and strata just mentioned. In the past, our activities especially among the villagers, small shopkeepers and artisans remained weak and ineffective. It is essential to know these classes and strata well and to appeal to them in a special way. The role of the working class is not always correctly explained to these classes and strata. In our propaganda, the necessity of an alliance is explained with the argument that the working class cannot carry out the revolution on its own. In fact, we must explain to the masses why they will not be able to achieve their aims if they do not unite with the working class. This is the issue of making the masses adopt our basic tenet that the working class will save all the exploited while saving itself.

The main (?link) which we must hold onto while improving our party's work with the masses is to fully grasp the role of the party's basic organizations. The basic organizations which are set up in factories, in (?residential) areas, in schools are the points of contact between our party and the masses. The party learns of the masses' sociopsychological conditions through this channel. And it conveys its views to the masses through this channel. It participates in their struggle through this channel. The more the party cells improve the effectiveness of their work style among the masses, the more the masses will have confidence in the party. Every basic organization can solve the most difficult problems on the condition that it knows closely and correctly the condition of the masses. The answers to be given to questions on all subjects, from the question of protecting secrecy to the question of organizing a strike, must be on the basis of the concrete solution of the situation of the masses we are working in. If these principles and positions regarding work among the masses are enhanced, then we can easily eliminate the mistakes that are made in practice, the ignoring of the social psychology of the masses, the confusion of the mass organizations with the party, the remaining stuck in the easy fields instead of working among all the exploited classes and strata and the unnecessary conflicts within the allied forces and the mass organizations.

KURIER REPORTS PALESTINIAN LEADER'S 'NEW THREATS'

AU211040 Vienna KURIER in German 21 Sep 81 p 1

[Special KURIER report from Damascus by "W.P.": "Terrorist Chief Abu Nidal Threatens New Attacks in Austria"]

[Summary] "Palestinian terrorist chief Abu Nidal has made grave new threats against Austria. In his sounding board, FILASTIN ATH-THAWRA, which was unrestrictedly on sale at newstands in the Syrian capital, Damascus, new terrorist actions are openly announced." In the latest issue of this periodical, Abu Nidal's organization again claims credit for the "execution of the Zionist criminal Heinz Nitte." "It even asserts that 'Austrian Interior Minister Erwin Lanc allowed himself to be bribed by the PLO leadership' to falsify the facts."

The Abu Nidal periodical, dated 1 September, expressly warns Austrian authorities against continuing their cooperation with reactionary (PLO) and Zionist (Israeli) secret services and threatens the use of arms on Austrian territory. "This development will now probably lead to the long-expected diplomatic reaction. A member of the Austrian Government told KURIER in this context: 'There is no excuse for a country which otherwise exercises strict control of its press to permit on its territory the dissemination of a newspaper which openly calls for murdering Austrians. This is something that the Republic of Austria cannot put up with. It is bound sooner or later to lead to a very serious situation with Syria and that is exceedingly difficult to understand in view of the good relations we have had.'"

GOVERNMENT RESIGNS; PRIME MINISTER COMMENTS

LD212106 Brussels Domestic Service in French 2000 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Excerpts] In Belgium this evening, the government crisis is in the open. The Council of Ministers--completely unexpectedly--met at 2000. Approximately half-an-hour later, Prime Minister Marc Eyskens left for the Chateau (Du Lac) to meet the king. Shortly after 2100, the communique came from the palace: Mr Eyskens has presented the government's resignation. The king accepted the resignation and asked the government to carry on with day-to-day business.

Eyskens then spoke to the press. It is the first day of autumn, he said, the leaves are falling and so is the government. Here is his statement [words indistinct].

[Begin recording] [Martine van Breuzeggen] Mr Eyskens, you have just presented your government's resignation to the king and the king has accepted it. In a long statement to the press, you say you hope this country will still be able to find enough responsible men to manage this country. What does this mean?

[Eyskens] It means our problems are extremely serious and require, I think, a more coherent policy--one that is followed through, more energetic, pointing out priorities more clearly, and also a policy which is applied with [words indistinct] and rather less polluted by politicization, by pressure from political parties. [passage indistinct] [end recording]

KREISKY, SCHMIDT VIEW EAST EUROPEAN DEVELOPMENT

[Text] Vienna, 22 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt arrived in Vienna this afternoon for a short visit with Austrian Federal Chancellor Bruno Kreisky. Schmidt said on his arrival at Schwechat Airport that he will discuss with Kreisky developments in East Europe and East-West relations. He said another topic to be discussed is North-South problems in connection with the summit scheduled for October in Mexico. Kreisky is one of the initiators of this conference of 20 industrial and developing countries.

Schmidt described bilateral relations with Austria as "completely satisfactory" and harmonious. No problems at all exist in this respect. The federal chancellor, who plans to fly back to Bonn late this evening, first after his arrival had a private meeting with the Viennese Archbishop Cardinal Franz Koenig. Cardinal Koenig was in Erfurt in the GDR over the weekend for the 700th anniversary celebrations of Saint Elizabeth.

News Conference Comments

LD222114 Hamburg DPA in German 1907 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] Vienna, 22 Sep (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky both believe that in the present precarious situation a sense of proportion and prudence are necessary. In Vienna today, the two politicians exchanged views on current political issues for several hours. They also discussed the situation in Poland.

In a news conference in Vienna, Schmidt said this evening that he is watching developments in Poland with great symapthy and great interest: "I can only hope that all Poles are aware that prudence and a sense of proportion are necessary for a good outcome of the present experiment being carried out in the People's Republic of Poland."

Kreisky expressed himself in a similar vein and added that chaos and freedom are irreconcilable. Freedom can not result from chaos. If people in Poland expect considerable assistance from the West in the future, then the Polish workers must realize that they must fulfill at least part of the obligations to which they have committed themselves. Schmidt said that he has no objections to this way of expressing it.

Kreisky warned the Polish workers a few days ago that they should see to it that Austria receives the supplies of coal promised. Kreisky said that there also are people in the West for whom no risk at Poland's expense was too great and who would gladly see Poland get into a conflict situation even more quickly. He said that such a conflict situation can be avoided if the measure of freedom already won in Poland is expanded step by step and the supply situation does not repeatedly lead to outbreaks of desperation. There must also be a minimum of economic cooperation between Poland and its creditors.

The list of topics discussed by Schmidt and Kreisky included, in additon to Poland, East-West relations, international economic questions such as the high interest rates policy and the North-South dialogue in the light of the summit meeting of some 20 industrialized and developing countreis in Mexico in October.

Schmidt also met the archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Koenig, for a private talk, which also included peace questions.

TRADE MINISTER 'OPTIMISTIC' ABOUT USSR TRADE

AU221410 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 22 Sep 81 pp 1-2

[Summary] Vienna--Trade Minister Staribacher yesterday described as the most important result of his recent visit to Moscow the adoption of a catalogue of measures containing detailed agreements on forthcoming Austrian-Soviet cooperation projects and a list of bilateral trade commodities.

"Among other things, the catalogue already contains specific joint projects in third countries, such as railroad installations in Syria and Colombia. Moreover, an electrical power exchange between Austria and the USSR was negotiated with an envisaged exchange quota of 500 megawatts, the trade minister reported."

Staribacher expressed optimism regarding future coal deliveries from the USSR although the USSR declared that at the expiration of the 25-year coal agreement with the Voest Corporation it would not supply any more coal to Austria. "If it is possible within CEMA to make up for the decline in Polish coal deliveries, Staribacher hopes for new coal supplies from the USSR."

The USSR last year supplied over 3 billion cubic meters of natural gas to Austria. "Staribacher stressed that the USSR's gas deliveries to Austria this year will be considerably larger." The trade minister expects Austrian imports from the Soviet Union to total nearly 20 billion schillings this year, as compared with 1[illegible] 3 billion schillings in 1980, while exports to the USSR are expected to total about 9 billion schillings this year compared to 6.2 billion schillings in 1980. According to Staribacher, the Soviet Union so far has used 40 percent of the 10-billion-schillings-loan it was granted by Austria under an agreement signed 3 years ago.

CHANCELLOR COMMENTS ON DISARMAMENT, DEFENSE

AU221336 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1612 GMT 21 Sep 81

[Paul Schulmeister interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt on 21 September in Bonn--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] Mr Chancellor, being situated at the borderline of a divided Europe, Austrians naturally worry more about the future of this continent than may be usual in other continents. Up to now, Europe has been spared a new confrontation and the two big powers now want to negotiate again with one another. Nevertheless, distrust on both sides is extraordinarily great. How do you assess the current East-West situation against the background of the very serious and scarcely calculable situation in Poland?

[Answer] You are right. In the past few years, trust has not grown either in Washington or in Moscow and, consequently, the Europeans' trust has not grown either. My country, my government belong to those world factors which very much urge both sides to have talks. We belong to the West, through the common Atlantic alliance, through the European Community. We want to belong to the West. We do not want to give up these ties. But relying on this firm anchorage, we certainly do also talk with the Soviet Union. We explain to the Soviet Union that it is also in its own long term interests for East and West to talk with one another, to listen to one another, to negotiate with one another and, through a joint decision, to reduce armaments. It is nonsense that in the Soviet Union, in America, everywhere in the world such large parts of the social product are used for armaments and for maintaining highly expensive armed forces. Military equilibrium can also be maintained at a lower level if one agrees on that and if the sides mutually control each other.

[Question] In Austria, too, there is strong interest in the sometimes heated discussion about the so-called NATO complementary armament, which the West is willing to renounce if the Soviet Union restores an approximate equilibrium by correcting its lead in armaments. That is the so-called zero option that is so much talked about at present--how likely is it? Can one hope for it?

[Answer] It is not the most likely thing to happen but for God's sake it must not be precluded--it would be ideal if the Soviet Union were to scrap all its SS-20 missiles and Backfire bombers aimed at Europe. Then there would be no need for counterbalancing measures in the West. Incidentally, I should like to tone down a little your somewhat overdramatized description of the debate in the West: There are some who clamor and shout very loudly but there are others who know very well what they are doing and who confine themselves to staying calm and reasonable, thus contributing toward preserving calmness and composure not only among the Germans but all Europeans. There is absolutely no reason to get excited.

As far as Poland is concerned, we are observing the development there with extraordinary interest. We have been trying to help through very large loans for more than 12 months and through guarantees. I see that the Soviet Union also is trying to help through loans and economic aid--God grant it that all this is enough and that the Polish experiment ends well.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, you warned against dramatizing things--but nevertheless I should like to ask you why, then, U.S. Secretary of State Haig in West Berlin--addressing himself to all Europeans--spoke recently of the danger that the Western democracies might weaken in their convictions and--I am summarizing--that one has to defend the values with one's life, if necessary, because only then would defense be credible. Was there any cause for these words?

[Answer] You should ask Alexander Haig this question. To me, it is a matter of course that a country's defense becomes credible only if people are actually ready to do what they were trained for as young soldiers. To put it another way, one has to ensure one's ability to defend oneself. If everyone is convinced that an effective defense is possible, the situation will not arise where one actually has to defend oneself.

I have just attempted to formulate the idea of mutual deterrence in a way that is different from the usual pattern. Smaller neutral countries such as Austria, for example, or Switzerland profit from the readiness of other countries to maintain the balance of deterrence. And from time to time it is necessary, even in a democracy, to publicly repeat the idea I have just outlined and, the way I see it, that is precisely what Haig has done. He is fully entitled to do so. In this context he drew attention to common values and that is something I do quite frequently myself when pointing out to my German compatriots that the basic rights laid down in our Constitution were much more strongly influenced by the American revolution 205 years ago than by European, let alone German, traditions.

As far as the freedom of the individual, the freedom of conscience of the individual, must not be suppressed, the freedom of religion, the freedom of opinion--as far as all that is concerned, we are indeed in the same boat with the Americans, with the French, with the British, with many others in Europe including the Austrians and the Swiss. And it is good to recall that from time to time.

[Question] Mr Chancellor, only a few days ago in the Bundestag, you yourself warned against the spreading or rather possibility of the development of a mentality under the banner of German pacifism, which could resemble what once was known by the slogan "German ways will cure the world." Do you see--not in the everyday political life in the FRG, but in the intellectual discussion--any indications of a new nationalism, this time from the left?

[Answer] There are always such dangers. In Germany, there have always been dangers, intellectual dangers from the left and from the right, that can be traced back through generations and over decades. I should like to reject the term "nationalism." The Germans are in a difficult position. They are the only nation in Europe divided as a result of World War II. The altogether 75 million Germans, who live in the GDR, in Berlin and in the FRG, lack the normal feeling of security of an Austrian or an Italian, of a Frenchman or Swede, the normal feeling of being safe within one's own nation. And that is what makes the Germans particularly sensitive, quite apart from the fact that the anomaly of Germany's division and the anomaly of Berlin's peculiar situation is a constant irritation, an open wound that cannot heal. One must have a little understanding for the Germans in this situation. On the other hand, the Germans must be admonished again and again to show understanding for their neighbors, be they the Poles or the Austrians, or the Swiss, the French, Netherlanders, the Belgians, the Scandinavians in the north. The Germans must know--and that, despite all fundamental differences, is a common link, for example, between Mr Honecker and myself--the Germans must know that the neighbors must be able to feel secure, to rely on the fact that no tensions will emanate from German soil that will affect all of Europe. We are committed to contributing more to peace than others because of our central position. But we must take care not to be bombastic about that and pose as teachers preaching peace to the whole world. German history in the past century has not been so very peaceful that we can afford such an attitude.

PRESS REACTS TO SECRETARY HAIG'S UN ADDRESS

DW220917 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany
0505 GMT 22 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Excerpts] AGUSBURGER ALLGEMEINE writes: Breath taking dialogue started in New York yesterday. There can hardly be a less dramatic description for the attempt to resume normal relations between the two superpowers--the United States and the Soviet Union. Secretary of State Haig opened the dialogue with an amazingly reserved speech before the UN General Assembly. It was interesting to note how gently the secretary drew a connecting line between the arms control negotiations, which for the time being will concentrate on medium-range weapons in Europe, and the deportment of the other power in areas where there are regional conflicts. It seems clear now that the followup agreement to SALT I need not fail because of conditions concerning Soviet good behavior in the rest of the world. After all, as early as 1972 the Soviets declared to Nixon their readiness to exercise restraint in world politics and not just in armament. The fact that they ultimately failed to keep their promise does not mean that no attempt should be made to seek agreement once again.

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG observes: Just 2 days prior to his talks with Andrey Gromyko, Alexander Haig outlined with remarkable clarity the U.S. position on the East-West dialogue and on development policy. Addressing the United Nations, the U.S. secretary of state expressed a de facto linkage between arms limitation and Soviet renunciation of expansion. Though not tending to facilitate the forthcoming negotiations, it is in keeping with the interests of the Western world. Arms reduction requires not only verifiability but also a minimum of mutual trust. Viewed from this angle, it is consistent and logical for Haig to term the violation of Afghanistan's and Kampuchea's integrity as harmful to world security and stability. The U.S. secretary of state views arms, economic development and foreign policy as an inseparable entity. In other words, as far as he is concerned, East-West policy is indivisible.

KONSTANZ SUEDKURIER notes: The realization by the United States that it paid too much attention to strategic arms limitation in the past and underrated the dangers of minor conflicts comes rather late. The United States had to learn things the hard way in Asia, Africa and the Middle East. Haig's remarks probably establish the framework within which his talks with Gromyko will take place tomorrow. The references to the U.S. stance testify to a sober assessment of the existing circumstances. At the same time, the multitude of problems Haig mentioned in his speech on principles made it clear, however, how desolate the condition is in which the world finds itself. Danger threatens everywhere. There is economic misery and, at least, an ideological struggle between the two large groups of powers prevails. Haig identified the shortcomings and these shortcomings should be remedied now. The chances for a worldwide agreement are slight; meanwhile, time is pressing.

CHEYSSON EXPLAINS FOREIGN POLICY 'THEMES'

PM211431 Paris L'UNITE in French 12 Sep 81 pp 2-3

[Unattributed interview with Claude Cheysson, French minister of external relations; date and place not given]

[Text] L'UNITE: The numerous trips you made in August have frequently been portrayed as a succession of isolated initiatives without any precise interconnection. However, it does seem that these trips, on the contrary, fit in with the definition of a new line of action by France in the world. Is this indeed so?

Claude Cheysson: The line was set forth by the president right from the beginning. In fact, it was announced during the election campaign in the various speeches made by Francois Mitterrand. Let me mention the main themes of our foreign policy which is, in fact, merely a projection of our policy as a whole. First, we have a certain concept of society. We Socialists represent those who have been left on the fringe. The left means the underprivileged--people who have been left out for years. Abroad, all this has been reflected in the two main themes of our foreign policy--a certain concept of man which makes us oppose any kind of totalitarianism and also, since we are unfortunately on the path where the two superpowers confront each other, we are members of the Atlantic alliance. Our attitude toward the totalitarian regimes on the other side is perfectly clear. However, because we represent the underprivileged in our society and because we are anxious to safeguard France's independence just as much as were our predecessors, we have an instinctive commitment to the problems of Southern countries. My August visits were relevant to the second theme whereas our position with respect to the Atlantic alliance has been reaffirmed--and how vividly!--by the president, especially during the summit meeting in Ottawa.

As far as the second theme is concerned, we want to be present and seek opportunities for indicating our policy. We are neither a Third World country nor a nonaligned country. And we believe that elementary respect for any specific region when you do not belong to it requires that we line up with those countries and support them, instead of expressing views on their behalf. What right have we to admonish the Central Americans, the Africans or the Asians?

This is why I thought it opportune in August to pay three very short visits to Mexico, Algeria and India, that is, three countries which exert real influence in their regions. And, above all, three countries, which in view of their geographical position, understand their regions' problems better than we do--three countries which both in their own regions and even in the world want to remain nonaligned. Two of them have a common border with one of the superpowers--Mexico with the United States and India with the Soviet Union. [as published] It was, therefore, interesting to have talks with them and tell them: We are at your disposal if you think that we could play a useful role in your part of the world and express principles to which we are committed. As it happened, we were put to the test by the Mexicans for the first time. They understood perfectly well what we wanted to convey to them, namely, that we believe that it would be dangerous to introduce the East-West conflict into disputes among neighboring countries. In Central America, some marked differences exist among neighboring countries for cultural, historical reasons and so forth. We believe that turning these disputes into an East-West conflict would jeopardize peace in the region and the independence of the countries concerned because, if a sophisticated arms race were launched, those countries would very soon become unable to make the necessary effort. They would, therefore, have to surrender to the superpower which would supply to them, either directly or indirectly, the means they need.

President Lopez Portillo completely agrees with this thesis and has frequently expressed it. Therefore, when the Mexicans asked us to join them in a statement that peace must be restored in El Salvador not through military confrontation but as a result of a political process involving all the forces on both sides, we were very pleased to do this and thus issued a warning against any stockpiling of superpowerful military equipment which would, in the end, make people completely forget that there are people in El Salvador who have the right to exist, the right to cease to suffer and the right to express their views in various ways. There is opposition to the junta. This has been demonstrated by facts. The junta has been unable to crush it despite the considerable supplies of arms which it has been receiving from abroad. Therefore, a democratic process in which all political forces would participate should be initiated. This is what we said and nothing else.

L'UNITE: Nonetheless that joint statement represents a great innovation.

Claude Cheysson: We could have made a similar statement on our own. But we would not have done so for the fundamental reason which I have just explained, namely, that we have no right to admonish any region to which we do not belong. Having said this, it is quite true that we have in that case introduced an innovation in international relations. It was not a traditional statement but what of it? In any case, the intensity of certain reactions has confirmed our and the Mexican's' impression that we hit the mark. And I would like to add that something else has conformed this impression, namely, the fact that during my visit to the Near East, which has nothing to do with El Salvador, the subject of the French-Mexican statement, which the countries which I visited deemed a proof of France's ability to express independent views, was frequently brought up.

This, therefore, was the meaning of these visits which were not at all unconnected but consistent with a certain orientation with respect to the great theme of our relations with the South which is a theme complementary to our East-West relationship which was defined earlier and of which the Atlantic alliance is an essential element.

L'UNITE: So it is quite clear what concrete result your visit to Mexico has achieved. Were similar results achieved in Algeria and India?

Claude Cheysson: Our task was even easier in Algeria and India because those two countries claim to be socialist countries. The Algerians have long been proclaiming this and Indira Gandhi gradually has come to support socialist theses or at least theses leading to social justice which she sees as an essential factor in her country's development. This means that we have a common language with Algeria and some common principles with respect to domestic policy with India.

In India, I explained the principles which I have recalled with reference to Mexico and I said that we would like to have regular consultations with that country not only on specific subjects but also on world problems as a whole. This does not mean that we should necessarily subscribe to the same theses. There are differences resulting from size, proximity to the Soviet Union, level of development and so forth--and also as a result of the fact that we are members of an alliance whereas India is not. But we would like to compare our analyses and understand why there are certain divergences between us. I believe anyway that in most cases our analyses will be identical even though we will not necessarily draw similar conclusions from them. During that first exercise in Delhi, I was much impressed by the fact that our analyses with respect to all current major problems are identical, even though our conclusions are different.

Let us consider Afghanistan, for instance. The analyses of the motivations of all concerned with respect to Afghanistan are similar in Delhi and Paris. But the Indians take the view that it is much too early to put forward any proposals at all and believe that the proposal put forward by the ten should not have been presented now and, in any case, not in the way in which it was. Our analyses of another problem--that of Southeast Asia in general and former Indochina in particular--are also similar, even though not always exactly the same aspects of it are emphasized. And for us this is a very interesting subject to think about.

L'UNITE: As for your visit to Algeria, it seems that it was especially successful. "Ardent love" was even mentioned and Francois Mitterrand has now been invited to visit Algeria in November.

Claude Cheysson: As far as Algeria is concerned, there was first of all, obviously, the fact that our countries have been closely connected through history--through conflict at a certain time but also because of the convergence of our views. Algeria claims to be a socialist country and has long been interested in what French Socialists say and do. It was a very great reunion. I used the expression "ardent love" but this is a true description of what happened. And I would like to add that I subsequently found signs of this. For instance, during my talks in the Near East, I realized that this sudden French-Algerian rapprochement has had important consequences.

As for the posposed meeting between the two presidents, it was discussed during my visit. I was instructed by President Mitterrand to confirm, when talking with President Chadli Bendjedid, that a meeting in November would be welcom. But the French president left it to his Algerian counterpart to choose between Algiers and Paris. Francois Mitterrand will be very pleased to go to Algiers. However, he has given President Bendjedid an opportunity to visit Paris which would be a "first." Such a visit undoubtedly will take place some other time. It has now been confirmed that Francois Mitterrand will go to Algiers in November. It will be a very important event.

L'UNITE: During the same period, you also visited Tunisia and Morocco. Those visits were probably less significant?

Claude Cheysson: I went to Tunisia first. Most of all because it is a country very close to us but also for a reason which I can now reveal--At the time when my visit to Morocco was agreed upon, a major difficulty still existed between Algiers and Morocco, namely, the problem of Spanish Sahara. But we already had some inkling that the king of Morocco was going to propose a referendum on self-determination. I did not want to find myself in that region knowing about it but being completely unable to say anything on the subject and running the risk of being asked about it since this would have obliged me to state that we favor self-determination in Sahara just as we favor self-determination in Namibia, the Near East or Central America. But it would have been embarrassing for me to say this at a time when the matter was being thought out and before it was announced. This is why I began my tour with Tunisia. Later, I visited Algeria and, naturally, Morocco because we want to be on equally friendly terms with those two countries even though one of them is closer to us because of its regime and the way in which it builds society. Therefore, I went to Rabat immediately after visiting Algiers and I was very pleased to be able to do so because we are determined to make it clear that we will not take sides with respect to the essence of the Saharan problem which remains tricky even though it is beginning to evlove. We simply want to see it dealt with in a way which would respect self-determination and be acceptable to all countries in the region.

L'UNITE: There is, finally, that Near East trip which caused much ink to flow and which has also been presented as a series of improvisations while, of course, emphasis has been placed almost exclusively on the meeting with Yasir 'Arafat.

Claude Cheysson: It is always difficult for journalists, who have to take a cross section of the day, to set it against the entirety of what has been presented over a long period. When one takes a section, one has the impression of making too much of that section. My Near East trip must be seen in the context of the president's policy since coming to power. He has received a great number of Arab officials in Paris. In turn, I have made this, my first, trip to the Near East. The president is going to the Gulf. I myself will be making other trips, particularly to Israel, of course, and also to Egypt. I hope very much that we will receive the Israelis. The president already announced that one day, relatively soon, he will be going to Israel. This is the entirety that must be viewed. Cutting out one section gives an impression of imbalance whereas one of the fundamental preoccupations of the president and the government is, on the contrary, that of maintaining a very balanced position.

Yes, we have friends in Israel. Yes, we are very committed to the Israeli people and we will accept no threat to the Israeli state. None of us can forget what the Jewish people have suffered during their existence. But we also want to see peace return to the Near East and to see the region's countries and peoples reach this peace among themselves without it being a peace dictated by the great powers in terms of their own interests. The logic that I applied to Central America applies in an even more brutal and bloody way to the Near East. Peace cannot be established there without respect for the great principles: the security of states, the guarantee of their existence, not just of Israel but also of Lebanon, Syria and the future Palestinian state, whatever the outlines drawn for it by the international community and the right of the peoples--the Palestinian people have the right, like the Israeli people, the Lebanese people, the French people, to a future, a hope, a guarantee, a life in peace and security. All this belongs to fundamental rights and there has been no example in history of a peoples having been ignored or crushed without this leading one day to a grave conflict.

This entirety is to be handled, I repeat, by negotiation and with a respect for the great principles of international law, particularly the fact that violence and force do not produce laws. The latter can only result from negotiations and decisions by the international community. Insofar as these decisions have not been altered, the law results from what has previously been determined. It cannot be forced by violence. This is what we constantly say.

It seems to us that we have an interesting opportunity deriving from our friendships on both sides. And we value all our friendships. Among the industrialized countries, we are, at present, the only one with the opportunity for dialogue of a comparable standard on both sides. This fact must be respected at all costs. Hence, this desire for balance. For the moment, I freely admit that this balance is not completely assured. The Israeli election campaign has rendered impossible contacts between ministers which would have been established naturally. It must also be said--and in an interview with L'UNITE I do not want to hide anything--that certain Israeli operations outside Israeli territory have shocked us, be it the operation against Tammuz or the bombing of Beirut. They did not create favorable conditions for meetings between Israelis and Frenchmen. There is thus an imbalance in that direction. The fact that we have been unable to say to the Israelis what we are saying to the Arabs--because, of course, we say exactly the same thing to one side and the other--may have caused a misunderstanding. I am very concerned, for example, by the fact that some of my statements have been reported in an absurd way.

How could I have compared the Israeli occupation to the Nazi occupation? Israel is not a totalitarian country and I have quite clearly taken a stance against all totalitarianism so that there can be no doubt about my thinking. We must simply resume contacts as quickly as possible. This will be done. I myself received the Israeli ambassador to Paris last week. Dialogue has been resumed.

L'UNITE: Was this French desire for a balanced dialogue with Israel and the Arabs brought up during the meeting with Yasir 'Arafat?

Claude Cheysson: On this meeting with Yasir 'Arafat, I would like to say that being in Beirut, which was the center of my trip and is the seat of the PLO which we consider a representative organization of the Palestinian struggle, it was normal for it to take place as soon as it could be held under acceptable conditions, which was the case. But I would say straight away that this meeting was brief since it only lasted 30 minutes and it brought nothing new. At best, Yasir 'Arafat seemed to me sensitive to the fact that the present French Government has the capacity for dialogue with all parties.

L'UNITE: This perhaps doesn't please everyone, that is, if one accepts this interpretation of the assassination of French Ambassador Louis Delamare in Beirut. [sentence as published]

Claude Cheysson: In the absence of definite conclusions on the origins of that assassination, I ought to be extremely cautious. I must however reiterate the tribute that I paid immediately to Louis Delamare who had been a friend for 20 years and who was by my side throughout my stay in Beirut. He had, incidentally, a high idea of the role that France can play in unfortunate Lebanon and in the entire region. And he was held in esteem for that by all the parties in question. He was in a certain way a symbol and that is perhaps what some people wanted to destroy. But this will not change our policy one iota.

JOSPIN ON PS FACTIONALISM, COMMUNIST MINISTERS

PM221209 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Sep 81 p 8

[Text] [PS First Secretary] Lionel Jospin, the guest on the Europe 1 "Press Club" on 13 September, discussed the PS Executive Committee meeting. He stated: "It is important not to confuse a government with a party....There is no PS state....If you were to pursue the argument (that the Socialists who are united in the government must be united within the party--LE MONDE editor's note), it would mean that as long as a government is united--and the Socialists are, indeed, united in the government--there could be no factions or discussions within the PS, or that you would have to provoke divisions within the government before you could win back the right to discuss. It is obvious that it is not the same thing: The government is the institutions. The PS is a voluntary group of men and women who joined it to apply ideas and to uphold a doctrine.

"If there is no debate in the party (at the congress--LE MONDE editor's note), we will have our comrades to thank for it. We have resigned outselves to it and are going to learn a more complete kind of unity....

"It was difficult to know what those who did not present texts were thinking. Sometimes you have to step back to see things clearly. On Saturday, those comrades were so close to me that I was unable to see them."

Asked "Do you want the disappearance (of the Rocardians--LE MONDE editor's note) as an organized group?" Jospin replied: "No, of course they will exist but they have now vanished as a faction. That is obvious. Moreover, there is now only one major group within the PS--this is what has emerged from the Executive Committee meeting which has just taken place."

With regard to the method of appointing party leaders, the first secretary stated: "We will elect the leaders according to the existing rules. They (the Rocardians--LE MONDE editor's note) will be involved and the congress will decide, but it is quite clear that any member, any official who has devotion, energy and proposals with which to serve the PS will be recognized and will be able to use his energy and proposals to serve the PS. Don't worry about that."

The PS first secretary discussed the Communists' participation in government: "I think that the Communist ministers are presently implementing the government's collective decisions and are respecting government solidarity. Moreover, the statements by Georges Marchais which I read in L'HUMANITE, stating essentially that what we had done was fine but making a number of criticisms on different points, struck me as rather satisfactory."

Questioned on the Socialist deputies' tendency to "go further" than Mitterrand's program at times, Jospin replied: "This is an unimpeachable right. It cannot be called into question in the sphere of principles. This is an absolute right. If it were not, it would amount to saying that I, PS first secretary and deputy--of recent date, moreover--must ask the government to limit the rights of parliamentarians. The reply is categorical in this sphere.... We have already discussed a number of documents. It is true that on the question of nationalizations, for instance, the Socialist deputies may go further."

MONORY SCORES SILENCE ON IRAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

NC221050 Paris AFP in English 1022 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 22 Sep (AFP)--Former French Cabinet Minister Rene Monory today attacked the French Government for its silence on what he called continued human rights violations in Iran. Mr Monory said the Socialist government had made no public reaction to the statement by Iranian leaders which said wounded demonstrators and even children should be finished off with gunfire. "In other circumstances and concerning other regimes we have heard our leaders denouncing human rights violations," Mr Monory said. Mr Monory was finance minister in the government of Valery Giscard d'Estaing before the May elections which brought Socialist President Francois Mitterrand to power.

CORSICA'S NATIONALISTS VOW NOT TO LAY DOWN ARMS

NC191406 Paris AFP in English 1339 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Text] Bastia, 19 Sep (AFP)--Masked gunmen of Corsica's National Liberation Front vowed not to lay down their arms during a late night news conference at a secret meeting place near here. Fifteen armed Corsican separatist militants issued a press statement in which they disassociated themselves from moves to align the front with the officially recognised autonomy group--the Corsican People's Union (UPC)--which is seeking a peaceful settlement to the autonomy dispute with France. The statement said some front leaders had been influenced by economic and political pressure to soften their stand and the militants could not tolerate any deviation from the struggle for total independence from France. [Words indistinct] has said the recognition of autonomous powers in Corsica must be preceded by an end to separatist violence. Last night's statement described the prospect of links with the UPC as a "strategic error" by the front and said the willingness of France's five month old socialist [government] to tackle the autonomy issue was aimed to make separatists lay down their arms. It said armed struggle was "vital" to ensure the total rights of Corsicans. Despite its demonstrative terms the statement made no mention of the unofficial truce observed by front militants since the eve of the French elections which brought President Francois Mitterrand's socialist government to power in May. It did not say whether the truce was now over.

Meanwhile, a bomb destroyed a biscuit and confectionary bakery at Furiani, 6 km (3.7 miles) south of here, last night. No one was injured in the blast which police blamed on commercial rivalry rather than political motives.

SOCIALIST SPOKESMAN RULES OUT ACCORD WITH PCP

PM211529 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 12 Sep 81 p 3

[Text] An agreement between the Socialist Party [PS] and the PCP with a view to the formation of a government "is impossible under Portugal's specific circumstances," a spokesman for Mario Soares' office told DIARIO DE NOTICIAS, thus denying the disseminated account of the Socialist leader's statements in Porto Alegre, Brazil, in which Mario Soares allegedly "accepted the Communists in the government," albeit "under certain conditions," if the PS wins the 1984 election.

Restoring "the exactitude and true purport" of Mario Soares' statements, the same spokesman stated that such an agreement is not possible since the PCP "maintains a stance remote from its counterparts in West Europe, specifically on the EEC, the Euro-missiles problem, the invasion of Afghanistan and the situation in Poland."

In fact, telex messages reaching newspaper offices stated that the former Portuguese prime minister, who is taking part in Porto Alegre in a symposium on forms of government and electoral systems organized by the local parliament, allegedly asserted that if he achieves leadership of the country, he will "follow the example of Francois Mitterrand in France," provided that the PCP "follows the PCF's example, condemning the invasion of Afghanistan, appraises the importance of the events in Poland and discusses the deployment of nuclear missiles in Europe."

The PS spokesman, who contacted Mario Soares by telephone, told DIARIO DE NOTICIAS that the Socialist secretary general's opinion is that "the PCP maintains a rigid pro-Soviet stance and continues to show itself to be maladjusted to pluralist democracy, maintaining with democrats and the Portuguese people a dispute resulting from its extremist stances in 1975."

Moreover, the same spokesman stated, Francois Mitterrand's decision to include Communists in the French Socialist Government, "although fully understood by Mario Soares in the light of France's circumstances and the changes which have occurred in the PCF cannot be applied to Portugal."

The PS and Mario Soares' stance, he added, "is, moreover, fully justified in the light of Alvaro Cunhal's latest statements."

In the Socialists' opinion, Alvaro Cunhal is continuing to single out the PS and its secretary general as targets for systematic attacks, with the clear aim "of preventing the strengthening of what is known to constitute the only democratic alternative to the Democratic Alliance and its government."

"In combating the left instead of the right, Alvaro Cunhal is becoming an objective ally of the latter," the same spokesman emphasized.

PCP'S PATO DISCUSSES DOMESTIC ISSUES, ANGOLA TIES

PM211437 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Sep 81 pp 13-14

[Maria Guiomar Lima interview with PCP Political Commission member Octavio Pato; date and place not given]

[Excerpts] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you define the new Democratic Alliance government?

Octavio Pato: The government is the personification of the Democratic Alliance and represents a complete factionalization, not merely because the three principal figures of the majority belong to it but because of the great mixture of tendencies which is represented in it.

Clearly, people were brought into the government, who have no reputation or qualifications for government activity but are entering the government because of the promise they have already shown in political trickery or because it was necessary to silence protesting voices. It is a government in which there is everything--political intriguers and swindlers; conspirators and elephant eaters--but it is above all a government which will seek to implement the Democratic Alliance's subversive plan--a plan which the Portuguese people defeated on 7 December and which has been condemned by means of the most diverse mass actions. It is a government which is already condemned before taking office.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: During this political crisis the PCP has again asserted the need for an early election. Don't the Communists remember that they were the first to propose the 1979 interim election, with the known results?

Octavio Pato: As far as we are concerned, only one issue exists: if it is possible to find any other alternative, we are prepared to consider it and to discuss it with the other political forces. The PCP Political Commission and Central Committee have more than once shown themselves to be fully prepared to discuss the possibility of an alternative to the Democratic Alliance government with the other democratic forces. But so far our invitation certainly has not been accepted.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: To whom specifically are you referring when you say "democratic forces?" To the Socialist Party [PS]?

Octavio Pato: Not exclusively to the PS, but, clearly, to the PS, bearing in mind that of the democratic parties it has the largest parliamentary representation, together with the PCP. But we include all the forces comprising the republican and socialist front, and even many others which are not represented in political parties. I am referring to a broader sector of Portuguese society. For instance, not the convergence of democratic forces and sectors which guaranteed General Ramalho Eanes' victory in the 7 December election: it went beyond the political parties which supported the candidacy; it included thousands of unaffiliated people and comprised many, many voters who voted for the Democratic Alliance in October. It is to that broad convergence of democratic forces and currents to which we are referring.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But what power to act has that force given you, if, as you say, much of it is not represented in parliament where there is still a Democratic Alliance majority?

Octavio Pato: Note that the hypothesis of the formation of a government which could have the support of very significant sectors of the assembly, going beyond the democratic parties, is not ruled out. But over and above that and taking into account other political forces' reactions to our proposals, we believe that the alternative to the present situation is the holding of new legislative elections.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Last week, a weekly newspaper reported "centers of disturbance" within the Communist Party and apparently a Central Committee member regarded this demoralization as a new phenomenon, indicative of the need for the PCP to renew its cadres.

Octavio Pato: (laughs) In the first place, I would like to know who the Central Committee member was. If somebody made those remarks, do not take offense. But I greatly doubt whether it was a Central Committee member. For one simple reason: I belong to the Central Committee and I have never heard any assertion of that kind. And if any of my comrades had that idea, he was quite free to say so. Because, contrary to what is said, there are no closed mouths in the PCP. Anybody can express his concerns clearly without fear or retaliation or without having his head cut off, as happens in other Portuguese parties.

There are no factors of demoralization although there could be factors which contribute to a lesser availability of people for specific tasks. The party spirit is one thing; people's ability to lose 2 or 3 days' work without great financial sacrifice is another. A few years ago, this was not so apparent, but at present it could be an onerous sacrifice since economic conditions have deteriorated.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Let us turn to another issue: Did Lucio Lara's visit to Lisbon demonstrate that the PCP has again become a privileged interlocutor with Angola?

Octavio Pato: Relations between the PCP and the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola [MPLA] are fraternal relations which were formed during the many difficult years of struggle against colonialism and continue to be increasingly consolidated. In fact, we could say that the PCP has contributed to the good relations between the Portuguese and Angolan people.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But don't you believe that the good relations between the two countries depend on the relations between the two governments? Couldn't the joint communique signed following Lara's visit be regarded, let us say, as a diplomatic gaffe?

Octavio Pato: We don't confuse or mix up relations between parties and between states. We maintain that the PCP's good relations with the MPLA-Labor Party are a positive contribution to friendship between the two peoples and cooperation between the two states. The joint communique contained nothing which could be regarded as a diplomatic gaffe or which justified the speculation which has been made. It reported the assessments legitimately expressed by each of the parties in the course of the talks and basically stated the joint stances. Thus, the PCP delegation expressly condemned the subordination of the Democratic Alliance government's foreign policy to imperialism as far as Angola is concerned. There would have been a gaffe if, for instance, the Democratic Alliance government had heeded or sought to exploit the speculation made, without any foundation, by certain news media.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Just one final question about foreign policy: Would the Communists accept a government agreement with the Socialists similar to that existing in France?

Octavio Pato: It is difficult to answer this question clearly at a distance and in the abstract. Obviously, we believe that the situation in France indicates a path which the PS and Mario Soares do not wish to perceive. Both the French presidential and legislative elections demonstrate one thing: the Socialists and the Communists voted convergently to defeat the right. And they succeeded. That is our aim in Portugal. We also wish to establish in the assembly a democratic majority capable of giving rise to a government representative of the democratic forces. It is for that very reason that we advocate an early election, with the foresight, the awareness--almost the certainty--that the Democratic Alliance would be left in a minority and there would be a majority formed by the forces comprising the united people alliance and the republican and socialist front. Only in that way is a democratic alternative possible. There is no force which can govern alone, on its own. Even reaction realized this; this was clear even to it.

GOVERNMENT: NO PLAN FOR KIPRIANOU-DENKTAS MEETING

NC221100 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1030 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] Answering a pertinent question, the government spokesman said that no meeting--either of a Camp David type or any other kind--between President Kiprianou and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas has been planned. The spokesman also stressed that the withdrawal of [Turkish mainland] settlers constitutes one of the necessary prerequisites for the solution of the Cyprus problem. He added that this question is heavily stressed in all contacts made by the Cyprus Government.

GREECE'S MITSOTAKIS QUOTED ON CYPRUS ISSUES

News Conference

NC221841 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 0330 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis, referring to Cypriot developments, said the distance between the two sides continues to remain great and prospects for the immediate future do not appear positive, unless the UN organization undertakes some form of more active initiative.

Addressing foreign press correspondents last night at the Athens Foreign Press Center, Mitsotakis said the Turkish proposals recently submitted were disappointing, particularly on the territorial issue, and they did not meet the expectations created. Yet, he added, the Greek Cypriot side continued the dialogue and, in its own turn, submitted counterproposals on the constitutional issue.

The Greek foreign minister emphasized that Greece has placed the Cyprus issue in a first priority position in its foreign policy. We have stood by the efforts of the Cyprus Republic and for a solution to the Cyprus issue within the framework of UN resolutions, with faith, firmness and consequence. Mitsotakis said that nothing will alter current Greek policy on the Cyprus issue. Cyprus, he added, is an integral, independent, and sovereign state, a great percentage of which is, in violation to every principle of international law, under a Turkish occupation. Any solution, he emphasized, must be based upon withdrawal of the occupation forces and upon an agreement between the two communities. The UN resolutions and international law, he stressed, must be the basis for such an agreement. Our basic position, he concluded, is and remains that Greece must provide full and unreserved assistance to Cyprus, particularly today when there are prospects for progress and a final solution to the Cyprus question.

Referring to the differences with Turkey, Mitsotakis said Greece will continue to seek solutions through peaceful means and on the basis of international law. This policy, however, he added, presupposes preservation of the balance of power in the area, and, for this reason, Greece will take all necessary measures to prevent any disturbance of this balance.

He also said Greece does not reject financial aid to Turkey within the framework of the European Community, but, so long as one-sided military aid does threaten to disturb the balance and thus create a danger in the area, all necessary measures must be taken to protect Greek positions and interests and to protect peace in the area.

O AGON Report

[Report by correspondent Mimis Konstandinidhis]

[Text] Athens, 22 Sep--"The new initiative by UN Secretary General Waldheim on the Cyprus problem constitutes a very serious effort which is appreciated and supported both by the EEC member states and by the majority of the UN members." This statement was made to me by Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis during a meeting I had with him.

Mr Mitsotakis added that he believes that this effort will produce positive results. He added: "I do not know the concrete form of the Waldheim initiative but I am sure that this is a very serious effort which characterizes the good will to promote the Cyprus problem."

The Greek foreign minister also said that the Waldheim initiative creates certain possibilities and also raises hopes for the promotion of the dialogue which would otherwise be in danger of becoming interminable. Mr Mitsotakis disclosed that: Mr Waldheim will not submit proposals but only some of his own "ideas" that could help speed up the promotion of the dialogue.

Answering a question in connection with the contacts he will have in New York, Mr Mitsotakis said that: Among others, he will meet with his Soviet counterpart, Mr Gromyko, with whom he will discuss the latest Cyprus developments since the submission of the Turkish proposals which have been found unacceptable both in Athens and Nicosia.

TURKEY'S CUMHURIYET ON GREEK CYPRIOT PROPOSALS

NC191215 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 16 Sep 81 pp 1, 9

[Izzet Riza Yalin report]

[Excerpts] Lefkosa [Nicosia]--The series of documents submitted by the Greek Cypriot side on 9 September at the Ledra Palace consist of 4 parts and contain 11 new proposals. This follows the "Views With Objects and Reasons" it had submitted on 26 August in reply to the comprehensive Turkish Cypriot proposals which were submitted to the Greek Cypriot side on 5 August. However, it is observed that these new proposals do not usher in any new developments.

The TFSC authorities have described these proposals as "methods which are designed to pretend that concessions were made but which, far from introducing any changes, appear to be working in favor of the Greek Cypriots." It has therefore been learned that Turkish interlocutor Umit Onan will give "an oral but not a written" reply to his counterpart Ioannidhis today.

Eleven new proposals: While the Turkish Cypriot side insists on the "existence of two federated states forming a federal state," the Greek Cypriot proposals describe the federated states as "provinces," thereby reducing the TFSC to the status of "a province."

Following the "introductory statement," the second document, which introduces new proposals, is headlined: "Further Proposals of the Greek Cypriot Side for the Solution of the Cyprus Problem." The document in question consists of two main parts: A) "General" and B) "Detailed Proposals."

In the first part under the heading "General," it is stated that all the proposals submitted by the Greek Cypriot side are based on the unalterable provisions ensuring human rights, fundamental liberties, the freedom of movement and of settlement in particular, and respect for the "right of ownership."

In the "Detailed Proposals" section of the same document, there appear 2 main headlines: A) "The Constitutional Aspects" and B) "The Territorial Aspects." Federal parliament, federal executive powers, federal judiciary, and economic development all come under the heading "Constitutional Aspects." Eleven proposals in all have been submitted; 2 on the parliament, 5 on federal executive power, 1 on federal judiciary, 2 on economic development and 1 on territorial issues.

The seventh proposal, which deals with "federal executive powers," is divided in two parts: A) president and vice president, and B) elections. The territorial question: although the Greek Cypriot side thinks that the terrirorial proposals it submitted on 8 October 1980 constitute a basis for conciliation, it nevertheless adds that there is some margin in the Greek Cypriot proposals for discussing the territorial issue. It is, however, stipulated that any arrangements to be made should not exclude from the Greek Cypriot province centers densely populated by an important section of the Greek Cypriot administration.

The new Greek Cypriot proposals submitted on 9 September 81, in which it is stated that the territorial issue could be discussed under certain conditions, refers to a "map" presented on 8 October 1980 on which the entire regions of Lefke [Lefka]--and Guzelyurt [Morphou], and a section of Gazi Magusa [Famagusta] are claimed by the Greek Cypriot side. This takes 81 villages out of the Turkish Cypriot sector. The demarkation line shown on this map crosses below Akdeniz [Ayia Irini] inlet, excluding the Lefke and Guzelyurt regions and the Nicosia airport from the TFSC and giving it to the Greek Cypriots.

The whole of the Degirmenlik [Kythrea] area, which possesses vital water resources, is ceded to the Greek Cypriot sector, while Meric [Mora], Ercan [Tymbou] and the Ercan airport are left to the Turkish cypriot side, but these areas are in the form of an indefensible cul-de-sac.

The whole of Pasakoy [Asha] Vadili [Vatili] and Akdogan [Lysi] are taken away from the TFSC, while a section of Gazi Magusa [Famagusta] is added to the Greek Cypriot side, depriving the Famagusta harbor and the area within the walls of any security whatsoever. The cession of the Karpas area to the Greek Cypriot side creates a similar situation for the Turkish Cypriot villages in Famagusta.

Although in their new proposals the Greek Cypriots show the federal republic--which they too accept as having a bicommunal character--as consisting of two "provinces," this map divides the island into five regions as follows: 1. "North," 2. "South," 3. "The old Famagusta town and its surroundings," 4. "The Iskele [Trikomo] area" opposite Famagusta Bay, and 5. North-west Karpas area, which is linked with a coastal road.

According to this map, the ratio of land to be ceded to the Turkish Cypriot side is 20 percent. This area whose economic viability and productivity is disputable, is, in fact, confined to the mountainous region of Girne [Kyrenia] and to the land in the north of a line running in the direction of Akdeniz [Ayia Irini]-Lefkosa [Nicosia] Inonu [Sinda]-Gecitkale [Lefkoni]

RALLIS ARTA SPEECH REFUTES PAPANDREOU ARGUMENTS

[Text] The prime minister continued his preelection campaign (yesterday at Arta) with PASOK as the main target, releasing against it the second great attack at one more gathering which was impressive in both mass attendance and enthusiasm.

With special satisfaction, Rallis stated after the Arta gathering that the first two gatherings, at Thessaloniki and Arta, make it certain that on 18 October New Democracy will increase the percentage which it received in the 1977 election. Referring to the Arta gathering, New Democracy personalities stated it was the largest political gathering ever to be held in this city while opponents admitted that "it was truly very great."

The prime minister's attack primarily concentrated on the following:

--Statements about the expansion of democracy which PASOK advocates;

--Pronouncements about a nonaligned and independent foreign policy;

--Papandreou's assurances about a proagrarian policy.

They are narcissistic, he said, when they allege that they strive for democracy, that they will bring democracy, that they will expand democracy. This is a huge lie. This is because we are the ones who have laid the foundations for democracy and gave it a West European context.

He then underlined: Our opponents are also opponents of democracy, yet, with their unfathomable audacity, they dare describe their aspirations to impose a one-party state as a "change for democracy." He then mentioned that proof of these aspirations exists in A. Papandreou's book TRANSITION TO SOCIALISM, in which he states that the first critical task for PASOK will be to enforce a socialist constitution and that parties which will be permitted to function must accept this constitution.

They allege, he added, that (if they come to authority) they will pursue an independent, nonaligned foreign policy. However, it is we, New Democracy, which pursues an independent and nonaligned foreign policy which truly serves our long-term as well as our short-term national interests. This is the very same policy which is pursued by Mitterrand and Schmidt, by the Belgian, Italian, Danish and Netherlands socialists.

Since Papandreou pompously declares that "PASOK fights on the same bastions as the French Socialist Party," how can he reconcile his wrathful attack specifically against our own policy which is parallel to that of Mitterrand whose policy is in support of the EEC, NATO and the United States?

They allege they will implement a proagrarian policy, that they are interested in the farmer, yet exactly the opposite happens. His [Papandreou's] policy is against the farmer and is destructive. Fifty percent and in some cases 70 percent, of our agricultural products are exported to the EC, this rich market of 270 million consumers.

As an example, I will mention that this year peach production amounted to 420 thousand tons. Of this amount, 50 percent was absorbed by the EC, 7.5 thousand tons was absorbed by the Arab countries and 27 thousand tons by the Eastern countries. In other words, 200 thousand tons went to the EC and 35 thousand to all the other countries. However, without EC subsidies for our exports, they could not have been made, particularly in the direction of the Eastern countries because they purchase at below-cost prices. Specifically, these countries purchased our peaches at eight drachma per kilo and the EC subsidized with an additional six drachma per kilo.

The surplus which could not be absorbed by the local market was buried, but, the EC paid 9.40 drachma per kilo, in other words, more than the price offered by the Eastern countries.

The prime minister then spoke about PASOK's policy toward the EC subsidy cheques, stressing that this was a victory for the inhabitants of the problem mountain areas (and not a demeaning handout as they try to present it) and he gave some pertinent figures to demonstrate the rise in the standard of living (bank savings, ownership of automobiles, telephones, etc.)

The 18 October election, he underlined, will determine whether our fatherland will continue to have democracy, independence, dignity and smooth progress toward security and prosperity. The people, he stressed, have already decided. The battle was decided at Thessaloniki.

MITSOTAKIS CRITICIZES PASOK ON FOREIGN POLICY

NC221717 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 22 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Text] Foreign Minister Kon. Mitsotakis yesterday mainly criticized PASOK, saying that it will dispute everything in the foreign policy sector but will not change anything, and invited PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou to a public dialogue. Answering a question during a press conference he gave yesterday at the Foreign Press Center, the foreign minister stated that: In the event that PASOK formed a government, it would dispute everything without changing anything. If this happens, I am afraid it will be the worst position for foreign policy, because it would create chaos. For this reason, we strongly insist on the dialogue. Since PASOK has not clarified its positions, a public dialogue must be held so that PASOK will be obliged to make its positions clear.

After making a general analysis of the government policy, Mr Mitsotakis answered the following questions:

Question: Of what importance is foreign policy to the voters in formulating their choice?

Answer: I cannot say that foreign policy will determine the result of elections. What I can say is that the Greek people are strongly interested in foreign policy, because it is lined with the country's security. Greece's geographical position, as well as its old and recent adventures, create a particular sensitivity about foreign policy matters, and, in this context, foreign policy will play a role in the election results.

Question: How would you consider a possible withdrawal of Greece from NATO and the EEC?

Answer: Withdrawal would have disasterous consequences for Greece. The Greece-NATO alliance constitutes a prerequisite for the country's security. It is also a necessary prerequisite for the balance of powers in the Aegean to which we attach paramount significance as long as the Greek-Turkish dialogue, now being conducted, does not attain any result. Besides, in the present international situation, all the small states feel more secure within an alliance. Concerning the EEC, our integration therein has been a big step ahead. It has strengthened the country's international position and increased its potentials. We are equal partners in the third big power. Withdrawal from the EEC, at the present state of economy, would compel us to greatly reduce the development tempos.

Question: Prime Minister Rallis recently said that if New Democracy did not win a self-supporting majority, this would have unfavorable repercusions on foreign policy. Do you share this view, and, if you do, on what matters would there be unfavorable repercussions?

Answer: I agree with the prime minister's assessment. To see what Greece's foreign policy would be if New Democracy did not win the majority, you should look for the positions of PASOK. We are not concerned about what will PASOK do. We do not know what it would do because PASOK does not say what it would do. For instance, PASOK has not clarified what positions it has taken about the EEC. I can enumerate four or five positions that Mr Papandreou has taken: First, he stood against, later he said he will try to renegotiate the integration, the fourth position [as received] that we will find life unbearable as long as we are in the community, and now that none of all this will happen.

We know nothing about [PASOK positions on] NATO and even less about the bases. About the bases, of course, Mr Papandreou has said that he respects reality. And he was the one who recalled that, even today, there are U.S. bases in Castro's Cuba. He has also said that he will accept the present status with a transitional period which, however, he has not determined. Thus, he has given guarantees for the bases to remain within their present status during the period that he would be the government.

Question: Have you raised the issue of balance of forces in the Aegean during the negotiations for the bases? And have you asked for guarantees? What was the U.S. stand?

Answer: We attach very great significance to the balance of forces. The issue has really been raised. I cannot disclose the contents of the negotiations which have not resulted in a general agreement. In any case, as a general assessment, it can be said that there has not been a negation of the issue of balance of forces by the United States. Greece has not asked for a U.S. guarantee of its borders. Not because Greece would not want it, but because this is impossible according to the U.S. Constitution. However, Greece has asked that the well-known Kissinger letter (about avoiding the use of force or the threat to use force in the Greek-Turkish disputes) be repeated. And we have not met any refusal.

--The following question was also put to Mr Mitsotakis: If an intervention in Yugoslavia was manifested by the Warsaw Pact, would the Greek Government be prepared to facilitate the advancement of military material to Yugoslavia?

Mr Mitsotakis replied: "I do not consider the supposition possible at all. However, if we were in a hot crisis, then the Greek Government would act within the framework of its alliances and in consultation with its allies."

Additional Comments

NC221723 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 22 Sep 81 p 10

[Excerpts] "Nobody knows what PASOK will do on critical questions of foreign policy," Foreign Minister Mitsotakis emphasized yesterday in an address to Greek and foreign press correspondents. He added, "New Democracy insists on the conduct of dialogue with PASOK during the preelection period. We must all clarify our positions. We do not know what PASOK wants. Dialogue must be conducted. This will force Papandreou to clarify his position."

Referring to Greek-Turkish relations, Mitsotakis also stressed they are "very good" and that "there is nothing which could cause them to deteriorate."

He added that during his forthcoming visit to New York, he will also meet his Russian counterpart, Gromyko, "with whom he will conduct a review of our bipartite relations which," he reiterated, "are extremely good." He also explained that he briefed Soviet Ambassador Kaboshkin on the Greek Government's views on the great international issues during their two recent meetings.

Answering other questions, Mitsotakis stated:

--Greece supports Spain's entry to NATO.

--The Cypriot and Greek Governments have been informed on the new Waldheim "idea," proposals on the Cyprus issue.

--Foreign policy will play a certain part in the forthcoming election. The Greek people are seriously interested in foreign policy, because they know it is related to the country's security.

--In case of a crisis between Yugoslavia and the Warsaw Pact, "Greece will act within the framework of its alliances and after consultation with its allies."

--The Europarliament has expressed its position on the customs zone which, naturally, also incorporates the question of the continental shelf and territorial waters. He also explained this does not only affect the Aegean Sea. He added, "This is a noteworthy position which, however, does not directly and immediately affect the Greek-Turkish dialogue."

--Colonal al-Qadhdhafi received a reply from us on his statement (that he will destroy U.S. bases in Greece.) "I want to hope," Mitsotakis added, "that his statements will not destroy good relations between the two countries."

PAPANDREOU SPEAKS AT PASOK CANDIDATES MEETING

NC221843 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1800 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] At 1930 today, PASOK Chairman Papandreou addressed a gathering of his party candidates from throughout Greece held at the King George [hotel in Athens].

At the beginning, Mr Papandreou made an analysis of the election tactics in the forthcoming parliamentary elections and asked the candidates to work with all their strength. He further stressed that the election struggle will constitute the mirror for the quality of the change with PASOK is promising, and called on all of them to demonstrate during the preelection period new political ethics that would be based on good faith, dialogue and argumentation.

KKE CRITICIZES 'ANTICOMMUNISM' IN RALLIS' SPEECH

[Excerpts] A wave of strong reaction has been caused by Mr Rallis' announcement of the New Democracy intention to give amnesty to the junta coupist leaders as well as by the unlimited dangermongering and coarse anticommunism to which the leader of the rightwing party has resorted to justify the official merger of his faction with the juntist rightwing.

As is pointed out in a relevant statement of the KKE Central Committee's press bureau, in his Thessaloniki speech last Sunday, Mr Rallis "used the favorite and in other times effective weapon of the rightwing--anticommunism." The KKE statement also stressed that the New Democracy leader confirmed that "the rightwing is afraid of the cooperation among the forces of change."

The KKE Central Committee press bureau's statement reads as follows:

"In his Thessaloniki speech, Mr Rallis:

"First, used the favorite and in other times effective weapon of the rightwing, anticommunism;

"Second, he remembered all the people in the world--French, Polish, Afghans, Lebanese, Portuguese, and so forth--but he forgot one, the Greek people and their burning problems. We understand his lack of memory, because New Democracy has nothing positive to offer our people.

"Third, he declared that he was proud of the New Democracy policy and would like to continue it. However, the people have been well aware of this policy and will not give him the opportunity to continue it. Of course, he promised that all problems will be solved by the EEC, but our people have also been having a hard taste of the EEC for a whole year.

"Fourth, the only thing that Mr Rallis did not forget to confirm was that the rightwing is afraid of the cooperation among the forces of change."

I KATHIMERINI COMMENTS ON TURKEY'S NATIONAL GOALS

NC170935 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 16 Sep 81 p 5

[Editorial: "Only Their Own Interest..."]

[Text] In statements published Sunday, the head of the Turkish State, General Evren, referred to his country's relations with Greece and to the Cyprus problem. Although the Turkish leader confined himself to generalities, we still have certain observations to make on what he said.

Before, however, we deal with the essence and context of his statements, we must stress his relative mild tone and manner. The outward look, the method of expression and the tone do not lack significance. No matter to what degree they avoid touching upon fundamental positions, intentions and goals, they still contribute toward preventing tension over differences (which could, in the end, develop into a confrontation) and toward maintaining both tension and the dispute between the two countries "this side" of the point of "detonation." In any event, this is also the only--for the time being--reason for continuing the Greek-Turkish dialogue, conducted at official level, until such time as the development or change of conditions and circumstances permit some progress on the essence of the problems.

Let us now deal with this essence. General Evren said that "Turkey will work toward a solution to the problems and toward restoration of confidence between the two countries through peaceful means and with a sense of responsibility."

We note this with satisfaction, but we have to observe that no progress toward the essence of these problems has been made thus far, nor is there such a prospect visible in the future. This is because Turkey has not abandoned the claims which it suddenly raised, since 1974, on Helladic territory--on the sea, the seabed and in the air. Greece has not raised any such claims nor aspirations against Turkey. Greece has not questioned the legal status, based on treaties which cover the entire Aegean region and which also bear the signature of Turkey which did not question this status until 1974. As a result, Greece has absolutely nothing to "give" or to "give up" in order to resolve the difference between the two countries. The only way to resolve this difference is for Turkey to abandon its expansionist and hegemonistic views on Helladic territory, both Greek and Cypriot.

General Evren also referred to the Cyprus problem. He said his country "hopes for a permanent solution of the Cyprus problem through the intercommunal talks." Unfortunately, on this point, actions contradict words. Until now and throughout all the "rounds" of intercommunal talks during the past 7 years, the Turkish side has systematically raised obstacles in a deliberate manner and, even refusing to talk, it abrogated written agreements with the leaders of the Cypriot state and let it clearly be understood that the only thing it wants is perpetuation and official recognition of the "faits accomplis," in other words, the current "defacto" situation in Cyprus which is the result of the illegal, internationally condemned invasion of 1974.

General Evren referred to the proposals submitted--at long last and after 7 whole years--by the Turkish side last August, and he described them as "an extremely constructive contribution toward a solution of the Cyprus problem." These proposals, however, are nothing but a freezing of the "faits accomplis" and are aimed at the territorial and population partition of Cyprus along the current "Attila line" with only slight territorial concessions. How is it possible that such proposals--even with all the good will in the world--become a basis for discussion? In what way do they alter the current situation and the fundamental goals of the Turkish side? Where is the "constructive" element to which General Evren made a reference?

We know that the claims of Turkey on Helladic territory, both Greek and Cypriot, are an organic part of the entire complex of the "national" goals and aspirations of Turkey which will not be easily abandoned, so long as there is no change in the factors which allowed the introduction and presentation of these related aspirations. In other words, as long as Turkey is not pressured by those strong countries, both in the West and in the East, upon which it relies, or which it fears and which are in a position to make themselves obeyed. However, "all is possible" and a change in conditions will eventually come about. It is only then that the Turkish leaders will understand that over and above any adventures of the moment and any expansionist aspirations--intangible in any eventuality--it is only friendship and coexistence with Greece on the basis of mutual respect and without any ulterior motives, which is to the true and long term--or rather permanent--interest of the Turkish nation.

FOREIGN MINISTER TURKMEN DISCUSSES TIES WITH EEC

PM211513 Brussels LE SOIR in French 11 Sep 81 p 5

[Maroun Labaki interview with Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen: "I Do Not Believe Our Relations With the EEC Will Be Frozen;" date and place not given]

[Excerpts] On the eve of the first anniversary of the military takeover, Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen summed up relations between his country and the EEC for us. He stated: In our relations with the EEC, our aim is a desire to become a full partner in the community eventually. This is the goal first formulated in the 1963 accord on associate membership, and it was recently reconfirmed by the present regime. We are naturally fully aware that we have not yet reached the stage when we can apply for admission. We know perfectly well that such an application can only be made when parliamentary democracy is fully restored in Turkey. In the light of this, we hope to develop our ties with community members and at the same time to fulfill our responsibilities toward them. In agreements made with the community we entered into obligations which we have not yet carried out.

[Question] Are your relations with the community strained?

[Answer] I would not say that they are strained. Governments do not pose a problem, but there have been debates in the European Parliament, and the attitude of certain parliamentarians arising either because they are not sufficiently acquainted with the true situation in Turkey or because they are prejudiced, or because they have endorsed certain ideological positions which they do not wish to relinquish. However, for our part we have made an effort to maintain a dialogue with European parliamentarians, both with members of the European Parliament and members of the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe.

These parliamentarians must take account of the fact that we are passing through a transitional phase and that our decision to restore parliamentary democracy is irrevocable. To this end, our government is pursuing the policy it adopted at the outset.

[Question] Don't you believe that there is a risk that the accord on Turkish associate membership of the EEC will be frozen.

[Answer] I do not think that any such danger exists. Obviously, I cannot predict what will actually happen, but on the whole I do believe that rational tendencies will prevail, and will regard ties between Turkey and the EEC as important.

[Question] If the attacks continue, do you envisage that you yourselves will seek to suspend the accord?

[Answer] It is the stances and policies of governments which will determine the future of relations between Turkey and the EEC. The question will not arise so long as government decisions and collaboration as it exists in practice remain uninfluenced by the views of the parliamentarians.

[Question] Will the time you have before the restoration of parliamentary democracy in Turkey be used to make the idea of Europe more popular in Turkey?

[Answer] The idea of Europe is not unpopular in Turkey. On the contrary; although certain parties have adopted stances opposed to the establishment of closer links between Turkey and the EEC, they represent a minority. There is of course the left, with its doctrinaire position, but that happens even in England, doesn't it?

On the whole, there is no significant opposition to the idea of joining the community, since it can be justified on economic and political grounds, and it will strengthen Turkey's adherence to the Western community, which is of importance to us.

[Question] The spectacular development of your relations with Libya would appear to be paradoxical, insofar as Turkey is a member of NATO with an U.S. military presence....

[Answer] You know, life is always full of such difficulties. We are not alone here either; other NATO countries maintain full relations with Libya, which has problems with Muslim countries. International relations are always complicated....

MILLIYET WARNS GREECE ON AEGEAN WATERS ISSUE

NC221326 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 20 Sep 81 p 8

[From Metin Toker's notebook: "Who Is on Whose Agenda?"]

[Excerpts] The other day I was chatting with a Greek friend of mine. He said: "We never expected you to do this to us." And I replied: "But we had clearly and seriously warned you." He insisted: "But even then we did not expect it. We were under the impression that a Turkish-Greek war in our area was out of the question.

Again I replied: "This was not a Turkish-Greek war.... Turkey had to use its right to intervene in Cyprus in its capacity as a guarantor state only because of earlier Greek intervention. Even then, it said a thousand times that it was going to do so." My Greek friend went on: "You landed a large army on the island supported by your navy and air force, and you fought us there. This is the truth of the matter. We thought this could never happen. This is what lies behind the doubts and fears as well as the anger caused by disillusionment in Greece against Turkey."

As you will guess, we were discussing the "Cyprus issue." The ability to correctly diagnosis the seriousness of warnings requires skill, and those who fail to display this skill should blame themselves for the pain they may suffer. If the Greeks, either by themselves or with moral support, extend their territorial waters from 6 to 12 miles, Turkey will not recognize it. Turkey will preserve its freedom of movement on waters open to it now as well as on its own territorial waters and on international waters. If the Greeks attempt to intervene militarily, it will mean war. It is up to the sides concerned to determine what the outcome of such a war would be.

Turkey does not covet an inch of Greek land, sea or airspace. It has had to put up with the preposterous status of certain Greek islands that penetrate into our homeland. Had we cherished other ambitions and designs, we could have "captured some of these islands." We could have reckoned that in the state of confusion that Athens was in at the time, the risk would not be too great. We could even have taken into consideration that Israeli-style faits accomplis could not be easily countered. Turkey refrained from such an action not because of the risks involved, but because no such thought had entered its mind. And neither does it entertain such ambitions now. But if Greece attempts, either singlehandedly or with moral support, to change the present status in the Aegean and to squeeze Turkey's throat to the point of strangulation, Turkey cannot possibly be expected to remain idle. Did the United States remain idle even in the Gulf of Sidra?

The warning is clear: Turkey will not recognize any such action. Recognition can only be forced upon it when it is defeated in a war. If a war breaks out, no Greek friend will be able to say: "We never expected this from you." Neither should Europe, whose support Greece is enlisting, be able to say the same thing.

[Message of greetings by Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen to Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party First Secretary Yumjaagiyn Tsedenbal on the latter's 65th birthday; dated 17 September 1981]

[Text] Very dear Comrade Yumjaagiyn Tsedenbal, on behalf of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee and on my behalf I sincerely congratulate you on your 65th birthday and extend the revolutionary struggle greetings of the Turkish Communists and working class.

The working class and all progressive forces in our country know you as the organizer of the gains of the Mongolian people in establishing socialism without going through the capitalist path, as the organizer of the success in completing the material and technical foundations of socialism and in turning the country into an agricultural-industrial country, as the well-known leader of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party [MPRP] and as a distinguished soldier of the world communist movement.

The Turkish Communists attach great value to your contributions for the strengthening of the unbreakable ties between Lenin's party and the MPRP. The brotherly ties between the TCP and the MPRP which rise from a basis on Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism strengthen with each passing day. Despite imperialism's Beijing hegemonists' provocations, the TCP supports your active efforts for the protection of peace in the world and the Far East with all its might.

Very Dear Comrade Yumjaagiyn Tsendenbal, on your 65th birthday, we wish you great success in your responsible duties, health, happiness and a long life. With our communist greetings. TCP Central Committee Secretary General I. Bilen, 17 September 1981.

'OUR RADIO' ON NATO INVOLVEMENT IN TURKEY, GREECE

TA221911 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0500 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Station commentary: "Turkey and Greece and the NATO, EEC and Rogers Plan"]

[Text] Relations between Turkey and Greece were recently strained again. They were aggravated by others. The fact that the attempts to incite the problems between Turkey and Greece were intensified on the eve of the Greek elections is not a coincidence.

In a preplanned manner, Karamanlis' party and the reactionary forces of Greece who are behind him took their proposal to extend Greece's territorial waters to 12 miles to the EEC on the eve of elections and extracted an approval from the EEC. Moreover, in a bid to prevent the Greek people from voting for leftists, these forces are also waging the propaganda that the rights of the Greek people will be protected against Turkey in the event that Greece remains within NATO.

Dear listeners: A most significant point about the propaganda waged by the reactionary forces in Greece is the election speeches by the Karamanlis candidates that NATO will prevent any military attack by Turkey against Greece. Both the EEC--through its recent decision--and NATO--through its moves--are supporting the reactionary forces in Greece. They are trying to prevent the progressive leftist forces in Greece from winning the elections. The EEC is overtly supporting the Karamanlis government for the elections. The NATO generals are acting as though there really is a military threat against Greece from Turkey and are thus trying to enhance and activate Karamanlis' propaganda. When they arrive in Turkey, these same NATO generals pamper Turkey and try to use Turkey against Greece.

Dear Listeners: It is in exactly in such an atmosphere that the chauvinistic cries of the Turkish reactionary circles--against the chauvinistic cries and moves of the Greek reactionaries--and the mobilization exercises serve the interests of the reactionary forces in Greece. The statements to the effect that if the Greeks act in this manner war can break out, and the wanderings of NATO generals posing as mediators are clearly tantamount to Turkey being used to influence developments in Greece. However, the real issue is not the problems between Turkey and Greece. The real problem consists of the NATO leaders themselves and the United States. NATO General Rogers' plan consists of obstructing the positive developments and trends in both countries and inciting Turkey and Greece against each other. The plan consists of becoming involved in this situation, posing as a mediator, imposing the interests of the United States on these two countries and trampling upon the national interests of both countries for the sake of their own imperialist interests.

Dear listeners: By approving the Rogers plan from the beginning, the junta administration bowed to the United States and NATO, which are opposed to our national interests. The same case is true about the reactionary forces and the Karamanlis government in Greece.

Recent developments again show that the two countries should discuss the problems between themselves, independent of NATO and EEC control or plans. Otherwise, genuine steps cannot be taken for the solution of these problems in the interests of both countries and peoples; nor can actions be taken in favor of regional and world peace.

PRIME MINISTER TRUDEAU RESHUFFLES CABINET

LD222145 Montreal International Service in English 1900 GMT 22 Sep 81

[Text] There has been a cabinet shuffle in the Canadian Government. Prime Minister Trudeau has brought in four new faces and switched the portfolios of labor, secretary of state, and the status of women. The new ministers are Charles Caccis, Bennet Campbell, Serge Joyal and Senator Jack Austin. Caccia becomes labor minister in place of Gerald Regan, who is now secretary of state. The secretary of state portfolio had previously been held by Communications Minister Francis Fox. Campbell assumes the vacant post of minister of veterans' affairs. Joyal and Senator Austin are ministers of state, but their responsibilities have not yet been defined. In other moves, Mines' Minister Judy Erola takes over responsibility for the status of women from Lloyd Axworthy who retains manpower. It's the first cabinet shuffle since Trudeau's Liberals were re-elected to power in March 1980.

OFFICIAL CITES FINNISH-USSR ECONOMIC LINKS

PM221215 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 18 Sep 81 p 16

[Finnish news bureau report: "Difficult To Balance Trade With Soviet Union"]

[Text] The problems involved in balancing trade between Finland and the Soviet Union were discussed by Ahti Karjalainen, acting director in chief of the Finnish National Bank when on Thursday [17 September] he addressed a meeting in Tavastehus dealing with the current situation within the construction industry.

According to Karjalainen, it is clear that in the future the range of building projects in the Soviet Union will become more varied. In the border regions, there are still plenty of possibilities worth keeping an eye on, but gradually projects will move further and further away, he said.

"This means that the nature of the projects will change and that the problems will not become fewer." Karjalainen said. The greatest problem today is to find new import possibilities.

The problems involved in balancing trade cannot be solved through the construction industry, but we must seek solutions in other commercial sectors, he said. Production cooperation and specialization offer great possibilities, according to Karjalainen.

Another future possibility is cooperation projects in third countries. A working group presently is busy investigating this question, Karjalainen said.

Karjalainen also stressed that trade between Finland and the Soviet Union increased by 50 percent last year and will probably increase by as much again this year, Karjalainen pointed out. Project exports today amount to around 10 percent of exports to the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union presently is investigating the possibility of buying prefabricted housing centers from Finland. Each center is designed for 400 inhabitants. The housing centers are intended for the natural gas pipelines' service personnel, said V.G. Silonov, chief of the Soviet trade mission's technical-commercial section. According to him, the Soviet Union is interested in building an automated depot in Tolyatti, a factory for combine harvesters in Gomel, a harbor in Tallinn and a repair workshop for railroad cars in Tosno. In addition, hotels and industries probably will be both build and renovated, Silonov said.

The long term plan for up to 1990 provides for cooperation on both industrial and other projects in the Soviet Union and in Finland. For instance, new thermal powerstations and a 1,000-megawatt nuclear power station will be built. These would include a unit using natural gas and waste oil.

Other joint projects include the expansion of the metallurgical factory in Raahe, new heating centers and continued work on the natural gas pipeline.

NRC HANDELSBLAD REPORTS ON DEFENSE BUDGET

PM211515 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 15 Sep 81 p 15

[Excerpt] At the special NATO meeting of 12 December 1979, the Netherlands Government signed the resolution for nuclear arms modernization. Primarily to give as good a chance as possible to European medium-range nuclear arms limitation, the government requested a postponement of the decision to deploy cruise missiles on Netherlands territory.

As a responsible ally, the Netherlands has always assumed a proportionate share of joint defenses, both conventional and nuclear. This will not alter in the future, also as far as the medium-range nuclear arms are concerned. "Nuclear arms remain indispensable for a credible deterrent."

These passages from the explanatory notes attached to the defense budget draft make it quite clear that they were drawn up under former Defense Minister De Geus. New Defense Minister H. van Mierlo of Democrats '66 writes in a "note" on the draft: "The time between the formation of the new cabinet and today was too short to test the draft budget and the explanatory notes against the program on which the new cabinet came into being." He states that there will be changes.

Compared to last year, the defense budget has increased by 292.5 million guilders to almost 12 billion guilders. This means that the NATO target of an annual real term budget increase of 3 percent has more or less been achieved.

DEFENSE MINISTER CRITICIZES REAGAN POLICY

[Text] Oslo, 22 Sep (AFP)--Norwegian Defence Minister Thorvald Stoltenberg said here today that current problems in Latin America, the Middle East and Africa were in no way a result of Soviet infiltration. He also affirmed that Soviet influence in the Third World today had decreased.

Mr Stoltenberg said that a Western policy which did not respect all people's right to self-determination and which neglected social and economic problems among the majority of the world's population could however lead to increased Soviet influence.

"This is one of the reasons why we have expressed concern about the fact that the (U.S.) Reagan administration's policy so far has resulted in a halt in the North-South dialogue and in the negotiations on a treaty on the Law of the Sea. This policy weakens our security," said Mr Stoltenberg, who was addressing students at the Norwegian defence college.

CHANCELLORS KREISKY, SCHMIDT COMMENT ON POLAND

AU231057 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0506 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Roland Machatschke report on 22 September Vienna press conference of FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky]

[Excerpts] Helmut Schmidt's first statement at the press conference complimented the host country. He congratulatee Austria on the comparatively excellent situation of its national economy with its low inflation rate and minimal unemployment. Regarding the FRG, he expects an economic recovery next year.

Last night, Chancellor Schmidt also commented on developments in Poland, though he was noticeably more reserved than Bruno Kreisky on the same occasion.

[Begin recording] [Schmidt] I can only hope that all Poles are aware that prudence and judgment are necessary for a good outcome of the experiment that is currently being undertaken in the Polish People's Republic. I also belong to the people, to the forces that have remitted and continue to remit to Poland large private and public funds and that have given state guarantees for private loans to Poland and, if only for the sake of our good money, we certainly hope that the whole experiment will come to a positive end.

[Kreisky] Permit me to add that I have the impression that there are people for whom no risk is too big--at Poland's expense, you see? People who would like to see things develop toward a situation of conflict even at an accelerated pace because they regard such a conflict as inevitable. I am one of those people who believe that a situation of conflict can be avoided if the measures of freedom that have been achieved are gradually expanded and especially if the supply situation in Poland does not again and again lead to desperate outbreaks. And that can be prevented if there is at least a modicum of economic cooperation between Poland and its creditor countries.

[Schmidt] I don't want to give you figures as far as my country is concerned. Irrespective of forthcoming negotiations, conversions and so forth, we have already earmarked in our 1982 budget DM1 billion as guarantee payments for overdue private loans--just to give you an idea of the magnitude involved. These are tremendous amounts. Nevertheless, we are not of the opinion that our aid to Poland should end here, by no means. Indeed, we see that other states are helping, such as Austria, France, America, to name a few--and the Soviet Union. [end recording]

Schmidt did not want, however, to have the FRG's aid to Poland assessed as a measure to safeguard peace, but rather as an aid for someone who needs aid. Schmidt did not comment on the Middle East issue but confined himself to noting that there are views that he shares with Kreisky as well as differing views.

SYNAGOGUE ATTACKER ADMITS COMING FROM CSSR

[Summary] There has been a surprising turn of events in the investigation into the Vienna synagogue attack. One of the two terrorists, 30-year-old Hasan Marwan, admitted that he lied when he claimed he came to Austria from Switzerland accompanied by a case officer of "Al-'Asifah" and that he had actually come from the CSSR. "Furthermore, he said that he had received his orders to participate in the Vienna attack directly at the "Al-'Asifah" terrorist headquarters in Baghdad, that he traveled from there to Prague and finally proceeded to Austria.

"Even though entry from East European countries can be checked relatively easily in general since communist countries always stamp exit or transit visas into passports, Marwan's latest statements cannot be verified because he claims to have destroyed his passport after his arrival in Vienna." Austrian authorities expect difficulties in investigating the duration of Marwan's stay in Prague and possible contacts he may have had there since the CSSR will hardly be cooperative in this case.

VOLKSSTIME REPORTS ON CIA 'SABOTAGE MAP'

AU211457 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 20 Sep 81 p 1

[Julius Mader report]

[Text] Vienna--After the 40 U.S. atomic bomb targets in Austria and the plan to blow up Salzburg airport with a nuclear mine, another sensational document has come to our knowledge which proves how little Washington cares about Austrian neutrality. With code No 77706/10-70, the CIA had a map of Austria printed on which all targets for raids and sabotage acts are marked. Moreover, Austria is depicted as a target area for nuclear missiles of varying explosive force.

The printing was done by the security office of the official Government Printing Office, Washington, North Capitol and H Streets NW. Copies of this CIA map of Austria are already in a safe of the secret service building block No 605 of the Hawkins barracks in the Bavarian Oberammergau.

That is where the "intelligence, military police and special weapons school, Europe" is located. And there, military spies and military diversionists are prepared for assignments in east and southeast Europe. Their training ranges from deadly karate blows to the use of nuclear mines--as are known to have been earmarked for the Salzburg airport.

All the more noteworthy, indeed alarming, is the conspicuous marking on the CIA map of Austria—the CIA is known worldwide to be anything but a tourist enterprise--of espionage and sabotage targets in Austria, a country which is committed and adhering to neutrality. These are primarily the natural gas pipelines from Vienna to Linz, Ternitz, Leoben and Donawitz; all Austrian civilian and military airports and airfields, bridges and tunnels as well as geographical "bottlenecks" of roads and railroads; iron and steel industry plants especially in Linz and Donawitz, as well as coal, salt, antimony and graphite mines.

A graph shows Austria as a target area for nuclear missiles with specified yield radiuses of 500, 1,000, 2,000 and 3,000 nautical miles. And what strategic or practical purposes could the territorial overviews of Austria's greatly differentiated population density ultimately serve other than as guidance for the gunner training the beastly neutron weapons that are already being assembled in the United States?

Thus, the secret of U.S. document No 77706/10-70 has been revealed. We have open before us new proof that it is necessary to take effective action in good time against the planners of a new mass murder in Europe, from which Austria quite obviously would definitely not be excluded.

CHANCELLOR KREISKY LEAVES FOR DENMARK, SWEDEN

LAMBSDORFF DEPARTS FOR MOSCOW ECONOMIC TALKS

LD231358 Hamburg DPA in German 1247 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Excerpt] Moscow, 23 Sep (DPA)--Federal Finance Minister Count Otto Lambsdorff flew to Moscow on Wednesday to participate in FRG-Soviet economic discussions. The talks, which are within the framework of the German-Soviet Economic Commission, are taking place only a few weeks before the visit to Bonn by head of state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev. The chief negotiator on the Soviet side is Deputy Chairman of the Council of Ministers Leonid Kostandov.

The main emphasis of the commission's session, which is to end on Monday with the signing of a protocol, is on a "review of bilateral economic relations" and "focal points and prospects" of future cooperation. Regarding possible future large-scale projects, the USSR primarily is interested in joint enterprises in the liquefaction and gasification of coal. Such a project is to materialize in the coal mining area north of Krasnoyarsk in central Siberia. The planned deal involving large quantities of natural gas pipes, of which it was said in Moscow on Wednesday that it is "practically sewn up," will also play a part.

INTERIOR MINISTER DISCUSSES RED ARMY FACTION

DW241009 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 25 Sep 81 p 10

[Interview with FRG Interior Minister Gerhart Baum; date and place not given]

[Text] ZEIT: The RAF [Red Army Faction] announced last year that it would "organize the fight against U.S. imperialism, NATO and aggressive foreign and domestic political aims." Is this the new main target of terrorist actions?

Baum: We have known for quite some time, as a result of the evaluation of material found in the conspirators' apartments as well as confession letters, that this is the real aim of the RAF. Security authorities therefore were not surprised by the targets of the latest attacks. Documents found last September in a Heidelberg apartment belonging to conspirators contain coded information on goals ranging up to attacks on political figures.

ZEIT: Weren't Bonn and the Federal Criminal Office surprised by the fact that the RAF was able to regroup despite the successes of the prosecuting authorities?

Baum: No, although the dimensions of the assassination attemp on General Kroesen give cause for concern. We have always warned against considering the absence of spectacular actions as indicating a lack of ability and preparedness to take action. Prosecution successes in past years have certainly handicapped RAF action. The security authorities and responsible ministers in the Federal Government and laender repeatedly have stated that the RAF still has the strength and determination to make new attacks. We have, therefore, never decreased our efforts aimed at fighting the terrorists. That pertains also to the protective measures which prevented the worst with regard to the attack on General Kroesen.

ZEIT: Do you believe that the RAF will gain new support because of these actions?

Baum: No, at any rate, not if we keep a cool head. There is even criticism in the so-called "in-group" of the "elitist arrogance" of the RAF putschists. Only in the event that we ourselves abandon something of the liberal substance of our republic would the senseless fatalism of RAF members and their helpers seem to have some sense. In such a case, their terrorist scheming could work. Even if this attempted murder is not all, we must remain calm so as not to play into the hands of the terrorists. Everything possible is naturally being done in the field of investigation.

ZEIT: With its actions against the Americans, does the RAF endanger the external political value of the FRG?

Baum: These incorrigible fanatics will not be able to harm the friendship with the United States. Rather, the contrary can be expected. They will never gain the agreement of our country's citizens, including those citizens who take a critical view of current American policy. They did not succeed in 1972 when American soldiers were killed in a Heidelberg explosion nor in 1979 when they tried to murder Alexander Haig, NATO commander in chief at the time and current U.S. secretary of state. They won't succeed this time either. I was impressed by how General Kroesen expressed his optimism.

ZEIT: Does the RAF discredit the German peace movement?

Baum: The RAF and its helpers are trying to use this movement for their aims. But if there is something that really has nothing to do with peace or the longing for peace, it is cynical murdering or shooting of people. The terrorists have no positive concept at all; they do not know what they actually want. They have nothing but absurd theories for anarchistic violence. Because they have nothing to offer, they will always remain isolated as they have been during the past 10 years. Terrorist methods only create publicity.

DIE WELT ON 'LINKAGE' OF ARMS TALKS, POLAND

[Freidhelm Kemna commentary: "Also About Poland"]

[Text] The world looks spellbound at the two action centers of international politics. In Poland, a struggle is underway for the modicum of coexistence possibilities between a breakthrough to liberal action and the forms of preserving Leninist power. In New York, the United States and the Soviet Union tomorrow will resume the dialogue on arms control negotiations. As much as one tries in some camps to master the conflicts by separating these two issues--two possibly fateful challenges--methodically and politically, it is obvious to everyone that they belong together because of their character.

The U.S. secretary of state pointed out the connection. It pertains to a particularly obvious example of "linkage," a concept of political action which measures cooperation possibilities with Moscow by the Soviet Union's general adherence to the norms of cooperation between the nations. Soviet intervention in Poland would have "grave consequences" on disarmament and arms control talks between the East and the West. One cannot doubt the fact of such consequences.

The statement that this would be unavoidable is an indication of the difference between European and American conflict diplomacies. Bonn attributes great significance to talks with Moscow "particularly in difficult times," and nothing is feared more than a lack of dialogue between the East and the West. Nobody has forgotten that the selective use of "linkage" in the past, particularly by the United States, has lost much of its credibility. If the Reagan government revives this concept in connection with the development of the potentially strongest crises in the world, it signals great preparedness to run risks for the sake of deterrence. If Moscow wants to implement its "interventionist" tendencies, as Haig called them, a dialogue on overcoming the arms race would be out of the question for an indefinite time. The dialogue with Gromyko will inevitably also be a dialogue about Poland.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG VIEWS HAIG'S UN SPEECH

[Commentary signed A: "Haig Discovers the Third World"]

[Text] The UN General Assembly session that just opened in New York forms a framework this year for a politically important event: The U.S. secretary of state twice will meet in private with his Soviet colleague on the East River to examine opportunities to make a new beginning in relations between both world powers. The UN assembly is also a kind of preparatory program for a Mexico summit meeting of all states involved in giving development aid to the Third World. The meeting with Gromyko and the Cancun conference set visible as well as invisible accents on Alexander Haig's UN speech that had been awaited with much attention.

UN speeches are not generally examples of spontaneous eloquence. In general, they are used to point out concepts to the world, which a government particularly favors at a given moment. To the amazement of all, the U.S. secretary of state dealt this year almost exclusively with development aid--which so far has not been a main issue for the Reagan government. It is quite possible that Haig did not want to burden his first talk with Gromyko with polemics, so he mentioned the Russian occupation of Afghanistan almost casually. Poland was not mentioned at all. Maybe he just wanted to indicate that detente today is mainly a Russian-American affair outside UN responsibility.

Haig's statement that economic progress and social justice are the greatest problems of mankind--next to avoiding war--caused diplomats of the Third World to line up to shake hands with him. Moscow hit back immediately, saying that only America and no one else is interfering in Afghanistan. This is not a particularly good omen for Haig's talks with Gromyko.

NEWSPAPERS REACT TO GROMYKO'S UN REMARKS

DW231049 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0505 GMT 23 Sep 81

[From the press review]

[Text] NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG discusses the speech by Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko at the UN General Assembly: The remarks made by Gromyko in connection with the forthcoming struggle over the limitation of strategic weapons in Europe are politically more important than all the stories and basic statements about preparedness for talks. The toughest of all Moscow negotiators did not give the slightest indication of a compromise. The demands to include advanced U.S. weapons systems in the talks and to renounce the deployment of new medium-range missiles right at the beginning of the talks are unacceptable for the United States. Doing this would mean calling Western deterrence into question while simultaneously accepting Soviet superiority. Gromyko's statement that an approximate balance exists with regard to strategic weapons in Europe belongs where fairy tales are told and not in the United Nations.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN says if it is true that Gromyko rewrote his UN speech after Haig's speech the day before--toning down some passages--the question must be raised as to how much more polemical sharpness would have been possible. What the Moscow guest told the General Assembly was sharp, insulting and rather ruthless and came shortly before the first meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Haig. Gromyko's hard language ought to be considered as a forward defense in a tense situation. Propaganda barrages cannot cover up how urgent it is for Moscow to establish a basis of cooperation with U.S. President Reagan and Secretary of State Haig so as to avoid war.

FRANCE DECIDES AGAINST NATIONALIZING FOREIGN BANKS

[Summary] This morning's Council of Ministers meeting made a definitive decision concerning nationalizations in France. The main points of the plan are known but the question of the nationalization of foreign banks was only decided this morning.

(Dominique Souchier) at the Elysee: The government has decided that foreign banks will not be nationalized. It also decided that French banks with deposits of over 1 billion francs will be nationalized. Compensation for shareholders in firms to be nationalized will be carried out by considering the stock exchange rates and the wealth and profits of the companies concerned.

PREMIER MAUROY DISCUSSES ECONOMIC REFORMS

AU231303 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1020 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Thomas Fuhrmann interview with French Premier Pierre Mauroy; date and place not given--recorded in French with superimposed German translation]

[Text] [Question] Mr Premier, in your economic policy statement at the National Assembly, you spoke extensively about Austria's economic achievements. You said that, although it was not a model for France, it would be very good if some comparable effects could be achieved.

[Answer] Quite right. What I wanted was to stress that the Austrian experience is highly interesting. And as we have had similar experiences to yours in the economic field, I wanted to demonstrate with my statement that, in view of the excellent results achieved in Austria, I fail to see why we in France should not obtain just as favorable results. Naturally, the Austrian path is not a model because the two countries are different and there is a great difference between the conditions under which our two national economies operate. But I believe that what is being done in Austria is not sufficiently known and is at any rate very noteworthy, in view of the crisis in Europe and the international crisis. That certainly does bring credit to your government and your Chancellor Kreisky.

[Question] But you also said that this policy in Austria was possible only at a high price--a high budget deficit and a high balance of payments deficit?

[Answer] Naturally. But, as you know, the decisive factor in the economy is the political objective. Once this objective becomes economic expansion, with reasonable projects providing for a controlled expansion, the risk of a budget deficit is worth taking and a temporary deficit in foreign trade can be risked. Naturally, the problems of Austria and France are different. Our main problem is the 2 million unemployed. Something must be done about that because 2 million unemployed, the majority of whom are young people, will invariably cause a general increase in violence in society. We will not put up with that.

Basically, we want to find a way to make the impulses of the free market economy, with its international difficulties, compatible with our intention to obtain for everyone the right to work. This requires a policy of economic growth and stimulating the economy. This is where we agree with Austria. And that also requires a new distribution of work. Instead of 40 hours per week, 35 hours should be worked; instead of retiring at the age of 65, one should retire at 60, and in the coming years, in some exceptional cases, even earlier because it is better to have pensioners than jobless people, because it is better to let everyone work 35 hours than to have some people out of work while others work 40 hours or more.

Our starting position is made worse by the fact that in France we have had a rapid population increase since 1945. That is why the employment problem in France is not only an industrial and economic problem but a demographical one, a problem we must try to solve through stimulating the economy and through social measures. Our primary task is to open for the very large number of young unemployed people other prospects than lining up for the dole. That is why we have taken a number of measures which have been adapted to our country's specific conditions. But regarding basic principles, the French and the Austrians should form an alliance and I hope that in the coming months and years we will achieve the same results that you have achieved in Austria.

[Question] But there is yet another means that you intend to use to stimulate the economy--nationalization. You said that in Austria the nationalized industrial sector is larger than that in Yugoslavia to indicate that France would not be alone in this respect. What do you want to achieve with the planned nationalizations?

[Answer] What we want to do is to control the economy. In other words, we want to be represented in the strategic areas of the economy. Moreover, this demand is indispensable for us Socialists who dream every day of a better society. We want a social testing field where we can apply self-administration and where we can practice the increasing adoption and division of responsibilities. We want something like an oasis of hope, where we can achieve economic results and where we can tell the French and all those who put great hopes on socialism: Look here! We want to combine economy with freedom. There is no question of a general nationalization, but here we have this sector that will make you dream--about what? About the correctness of our ideas, our proposals, our program, our principles. our doctrine.

[Text] Paris, 24 Sep (AFP)--Armed men today stormed offices of the Turkish Embassy's cultural service in central Paris, and shots were heard within the building.

The men were described as members of the Armenian secret army. Police sealed off the area. A number of the employees inside the Turkish cultural service offices managed to escape on ladders police had placed against the building.

12-Hour Deadline

NC241021 Paris AFP in English 1017 GMT 24 Sep 81

[Text] Paris, 24 Sep (AFP)--A telephone caller claiming to be a spokesman for the secret Armenian army for the liberation of Armenia told Agence France-Presse that the group inside the cultural offices would begin executing "all the employees held hostage in 12 hours if the Turkish Government does not free Armenian political prisoners in Turkey by that time. He said Ankara would have to fly the Armenian detainees to an airport in the Paris region.

"The 12-hour deadline will be counted down as of Thursday at 11:15 am local (09:15 GMT)," he said. That was the time the Armenians gained entry to the cultural offices.

Meanwhile, police officers from the crack anti-commando brigade, which is specialized in anti-terrorist operations, were sent to the office building in central Paris.

LE MONDE EXAMINES FRENCH-CHAD RELATIONS

[Editorial: "Helping Chad To Exist"]

[Text] The Chadian president's visit to Paris has just given rise to a rather unusual type of diplomatic exercise. Indeed, it is not often that the entirely theoretical leader of a state divided into factions and occupied by a foreign army, even if it is "friendly," comes to Paris for negotiations on questions which largely escape his control and on which the French Government has almost no hold. Therefore, this visit could not be expected to be more than symbolic: The meeting between Mitterrand and the former rebel, nominal head of a government which has collapsed, demonstrated that France can not be indifferent to Chad and that it intends to help it exist.

Indeed, the problem lies at this basic level. By receiving Goukouni Queddei as head of state Paris can hope to consolidate his position in order to one day bring the Chadian state out of the sphere of fiction. Nonetheless, as soon as you seek practical measures which might help to rebuild a country ruined and dismembered by civil war, the difficulties are almost insuperable and the two partners' undoubted good will is not enough to overcome the problem.

What about rebuilding Ndjamena? A technical mission is in the country and France has already allocated funds for an operation which exceeds the means at its disposal and in which Europe will be extensively involved. However, this aid must not ultimately result in a division of tasks between Libya, controlling the country politically and militarily, and a Paris paying the costly bills. When Claude Cheysson confirmed that France is "prepared for the rebuilding of a unitary and totally independent Chad," he used the very two adjectives which sum up the problem. Goukouni Queddei, for his part, was not convincing when he maintained that the Libyan troops will withdraw as soon as he asks them, even when he invoked, rather too conveniently, the "Sudanese" aggression.

What about training a national army? France clearly has stated that it will not become involved in military-type adventures. Hopes are placed in neighboring Cameroon. They certainly do not seem in keeping with the natural caution of President Ahidjo who, while in Paris, once again advocated resorting to the United Nations and recalled that his country will not "interfere" in Chad's problems, "be it in the framework of a neutral force or a different framework." In any case, the creation of an efficient army is a long job.

Finally, the formation of an inter-African force, for which Paris is giving diplomatic backing and promising financial support, is a delicate operation for which there are many disappointing precedents. Algeria's possible participation could constitute a trump card. Nonetheless, Goukouni Queddei is not very likely to be taken seriously when he threatens his Libyan allies with the not very worrying wrath of the OAU which is "prepared to make them leave by force" should they outstay their welcome in his country. In the extraordinarily difficult game which he has to play, false premises cast doubt on his chances of success.

COLOMBO ADDRESSES UN ON MIDEAST, AFRICA, MISSILES

AU231558 Rome ANSA in English 1552 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Text] New York, 23 Sep (ANSA)--Mutual recognition between Israel and the Palestinians is an obligatory stage towards achieving peace in the Middle East, according to Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo today in a speech before the United Nations assembly in New York.

He said that the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) must be given a chance to show its willingness to contribute toward finding a political solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Colombo also said that Italy considers the "PLO" a prominent political force for the Palestinian people. The Italian minister also voiced the concern of numerous Mediterranean states for the tense situation which has been created in this area.

He insisted that behavior contrary to international norms must be eschewed and that a sense of responsibility must prevail in keeping with the peaceful co-existence of peoples. In this context, he pointed to the accord Italy signed with Malta to guarantee that island nation's neutrality.

In this hour-long address, Colombo touched on all of the chief international problems to be discussed at the general assembly. He renewed Italy's call for a ban on chemical arms and the complete destruction of existing stocks of such weapons.

Continuing with the theme of disarmament, Colombo emphasized the missile imbalance between the two blocs. The imbalance presently favors the Soviets and must be righted, he said. He stressed that Italy would continue its efforts for fruitful negotiations on armaments with regard to the superpowers.

Colombo also outlined efforts Italy is making to peacefully settle the grave crisis in the Horn of Africa which exploded into war three-and-a-half years ago. The Italian minister recently travelled to Ethiopia and Somalia to sound out local leaders with a view to finding a path to peace.

PCI'S BERLINGUER DISCUSSES 'DEMOCRATIC ALTERNATIVE'

PM221333 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 13 Sep 81 pp 1, 18

[Report: "Peace, the Moral Question, the Democratic Alternative"]

[Text] We are publishing an extensive summary of the closing speech which Comrade Enrico Berlinguer delivered at the party Directorate's meeting last Thursday.

Berlinguer opened his speech by stressing the increasingly rapid deterioration in the international situation in recent weeks. Reagan's election to the presidency and the policy he immediately introduced are giving rise to substantial changes in U.S. conduct; especially through the boost to the arms race and the openly reactionary nature of the policy adopted toward various areas of the world (Central America and Africa). On the other hand, we have been pointing out for some time that the Soviet Union also bears some responsibility for the crisis in the detente process because of some actions of power politics carried out after the U.S. defeat in Vietnam. The state of international relations is also being aggravated by the world economic crisis which actually affects all countries and which each country is trying to overcome by its own means, giving rise to acute conflicts which delay the prospect of a new world economic order.

Berlinguer, therefore, asked a crucial question: Is it really possible to talk of a danger of world war or--as some people maintain--will there sooner or later be an all-embracing agreement between the two superpowers?

This second hypothesis cannot be ruled out. However, there is reason to talk of a real threat to peace--a threat which is now becoming even more acute. Three factors are now emerging as causes and symptoms of this threat: 1--The start of a new phase in the arms race, characterized by the introduction of arms whose quantity and qualitative characteristics would make it impossible for them to be monitored by the other side; 2--The increase in conflicts and tension in the world's "gray areas" with a powerful clash between the two superpowers and an obvious temptation in U.S. leadership circles to seek and experiment with trials of strength; 3--The fact that the internal situation of some countries which are vital to world balance (like Iran and Poland, for instance) is developing with an impetus which might accelerate and bring the danger of upsetting the world balance.

It was, therefore, inevitable and only right and proper that we should place the question of peace as a central problem on the country's agenda. We do not think there is reason to share Craxi's view that "peace is not endangered." This view does not strike us as the fruit of an objective analysis. Without wishing to make accusations against anybody, this in fact stifles the interest of people's masses and their trust in being able to take part in an essential battle and leaves everything to the "wisdom" of the states' rulers.

We should welcome--the PCI secretary added--the fact that although Italy is behind some countries in northern Europe in this sphere, it is now seeing the development of a broad and composite movement defending peace; that this crucial question has found a prompt response from the party; that many other forces--in the parties and outside them--are starting to act together with us or on their own account; Catholic forces and organizations which refer to the pope's appeals and exhortations, and socialist and secular forces, pacifist, ecologist and other groups.

Berlinguer recalled and confirmed the platform on which the PCI has acted (principally, immediate negotiations on the Euromissiles), to reach a balance at the lowest possible levels, seeking all possible areas of agreement without trying to impose our own ideas but also without abandoning our own original vision.

The new aspects and dangers of the situation confirm the need to step up our action at the international level, the leading role which can be played by forces like the Non-aligned Movement, Western Europe and, in particular, its leftwing democratic forces and the great people's masses of every country and continent. An analysis of the positions adopted by the various European governments (which, in their ramifications, express significant elements of concern, caution and even practical initiative) highlights the negativity of the Italian Government's conduct with the decision to deploy the missiles in Comiso. It should be pointed out that we observed a substantial measure of agreement with our comrades from the League of Communists of Yugoslavia on all these questions and assessments.

Berlinguer then referred to the European situation from the viewpoint of the political lineup and ideological orientations. Contrary to what many people thought after the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, and after Reagan's victory, and contrary to similar predictions connected with the aggravation of the economic crisis, the contest between the progressive and rightwing forces in Europe is more undecided than ever. This is primarily demonstrated by the left's victory in France and some international and domestic policy steps by the new French Government; but it is also demonstrated by the discussions, the work going on in the socialist and social democratic parties. On the great questions of how to solve the economic crisis, trends are emerging in this debate which go beyond the traditional reformist statements. This encourages us with regard to the possibility of progressing in the search for a third way which involves a critical transcending of the traditional lines of both the communist parties of the third international tradition and also of the social democratic parties through a common search by all the leftwing and people's forces.

Berlinguer then moved on to an analysis of the Italian situation and the party's relevant tasks.

A Complex Crisis

Our country's situation has its own characteristics and cannot be compared with the situation in other countries or with the situation which emerged in the early days of the center-left. In the present phase, we are not facing a reformist policy or challange, represented by the PSI. We are, instead, facing a complex crisis, whose newest aspect--which we have emphasized--is the fact that, in addition to an economic and social crisis, there is a crisis in the political system, in other words, in this 30-year old system based on the DC's monopoly of power and on discrimination against the main opposition force. The most serious and dangerous aspect of the present situation is the fact that, at the very time when this system is entering a crisis thereby creating the conditions for it to be overcome by extending and strengthening democracy, for people's participation and for the reform of the state, for an end to the occupation of power; an attempt is being made to maintain discrimination against us at any cost. But the consequence is that, to obtain this they have to commit even more serious actions as regards rendering void the democratic institutions and reviving the worst uses of power. This brings the degenerative process in Italian democracy to a climax--a process sparked off by anti-communist discrimination--in other words, the harmful exclusion of the majority of the working class from running the country in Italy--which is now paralyzing the political system.

At this point, Berlinguer referred to a quantity of facts and phenomena connected with the life of the state and of the parties, and also the trade unions, from the viewpoint of their specific role and their internal democratic life. He recalled the risk which is now emerging of the most serious political--institutional scandals--the P-2 scandal--being shelved, recalling the grave responsibility which the government parties like the DC, PSI and Italian Social Democratic Party have in this, all hurriedly absolving all their men under suspicion of belonging to the Gelli lodge.

Negative factors are emerging and interweaving at the social level, the most dangerous being the rapid corporative trend and the signs of distrust and of detachment from the institutions and the parties, of which the increasing number of election abstentions is a clear symptom, but not the only one.

All this threatens not only to jeopardize the possibility of creating a new social and economic order but to bring about the republic's collapse. One of the most alarming dangers, which is likely to grow worse, is terrorism; the mistakes made, the tendency to give in, as in the Urso case, weak points in operations after a period of undeniable success by the forces of order largely explain the phenomenon of the reorganization and strengthening of the subversive groups.

This context provides the reasons why we decided to raise the moral question as the main national question--the moral question seen not only as the struggle against corruption, but primarily as the reform of the state and the parties and their mutual relationship. In making this choice, we followed the best Togliatti tradition which picks out the PCI's function as that of shouldering the task of making the major contribution to solving the central vital questions for the nation's salvation and development (questions which, today, are primarily peace and the moral questions).

It is vital to pose the moral question in these rigorous terms in order to arouse and mobilize all the energies inside and outside the parties which can be channeled into the battle for reform. It has not escaped our notice that this might help to make the political battle fiercer in the short term. However, it must be made clear that this is not directed against the party system and against the parties as such but against those positions and forces which oppose the urgent and necessary task of effecting a far-reaching reform of their existence and improving their political behavior, thus creating the conditions for instituting and realizing higher, more fruitful and more responsible relations of cooperation and unity.

Since the PCI is not showing that it can be absorbed into the current methods of administering power but, being the contradiction of those methods, is the factor which made it possible to abandon and transcend them, it is easy to understand why the opponents of change should seek to deal us a decisive blow or even to impede our battle.

How is this attempt being made? Berlinguer picked out four characteristic elements of this action against the PCI.

First, the plans to reform the constitution, which distort its foundations and move toward the limitation of rights and of the democratic dialectic. Second, the proposals and signs indicating the desire to give an organic character and a long-term stabilization to the DC-PSI alliance (from the stage of justifying the theory of "governability" by necessity and its transitional nature, we have now reached the affirmation of the "non-casual" nature "of the new encounter"). At the economic policy level, the partly concealed attempt to blame primarily the working class for inflation, trying to channel the discontent of other social classes and strata against the industrial workers. Finally, the ideological and propaganda offensive against the PCI.

With regard to this last aspect, Berlinguer pointed to the various aims of the anti-communist offensive: to isolate us, to force us into sectarian positions or subordinate positions or even positions of consent, to undermine our relationship with the masses, and to divide us, even at the leadership group level. It is necessary to rally, starting from the comrades who have most responsibility, to take account in our behavior of the character and objectives of this offensive without detracting in any way from free debate in the party. In addition, we must not underestimate the grave fact that this offensive is also taking advantage of an alarming situation which has been created in the sphere of information and mass communications. The crude anticommunism of the fifties can no longer be used, hence the main effort today consists not of ignoring us but of distorting the meaning of our positions. The ridiculous accusation of entrenchment and conservatism is seen as the sign of a desperate view of the situation and prospects. It is an accusation which is not borne out by the facts and reveals that there is some other aim behind it. We must recall that we have fought some great battles and won victories. For instance, the battles against governments which can now clearly be seen to have been incompetent and dangerous, like the second Cossiga government and the Forlani government (the latter fell as a direct result of an aspect of the moral question; the P-2 affair); the advent of a non-DC prime minister, which we were the first, if not the only ones, to demand and which constitutues, we repeat, a considerable political innovation. Then there was a series of other battles, of social and ideological importance, most recently that of the referendum which led to important new approaches to new problems and to sections of society hitherto not reached.

The unfounded accusation of conservatism and entrenchment, therefore, conceals irritation at the major achievement we secured, the full importance of which should be appreciated; in other words, the fact that the failure of the national solidarity policy did not result in decline in the PCI since it was we who essentially succeeded in opposing the negative trend and, in a whole section of the country, in initiating a revival which kept the communist question open and alive, in all its significance.

It is quite clear that the current enemy offensive aims to give people and make them believe a distorted view and to damage our identity or, as people say, our "diversity." It is obviously a fact that we are different from the other Italian parties; but we are also different from the European social democrats and even from other communist parties. However, this originality of ours which has led us to become a political party which stands ourside any scheme or model, does not prevent, and even implies, an initiative and unitary policy on our part toward all these other forces, without harmful ideological discrimination and on the basis of practical political positions. We are, therefore, a highly individual politico-ideological party but a fundemental part of this character is the constant search for unity among the progressive forces at international and domestic levels. But what people really fear and want to destroy today is this completely political aspect of our individuality which takes shape in the desire to raise and answer the moral question in its political substance and to promote and assert a democratic alternative.

In the Interest of Democracy

But we cannot and must not withdraw from this commitment and this character. If we did so, we might perhaps be able to reduce the virulence of the enemy attack, we might perhaps be able to acquire a few positions of power; but ultimately what would it mean? Ultimately we would have a party which had not only lost touch with the country's fundamental masses but, above, all, we would not have made our contribution to the reform of our democracy and to overcoming the crisis. This would, therefore, certainly be a losing tack. We know that a line which concentrates strongly on the question of the state has risks but it is the only one which canmobilize forces and keep open the possibility of a way out ahead.

People who accuse us of orthodoxy do not understand that the question of defending the party, its image and its role is an essential aspect of the battle to reform and strengthen Italian democracy. It is in the interests of Italian democracy to safeguard the class, democratic and national character of the PCI, the strength of its ties with society, its ability to open up new dimensions for unitary initiative. At the same time, to encourage the reform of the state and the parties, to stimulate healthy forces wherever they are to be found, it is essential to make an open and frank criticism, with which the people can identify, of the distortions and damage done and of the dangers which may threaten the whole system. This is not a utilitarian, retaliatory propaganda choice but the necessary precondition for seeking and building a new and strong democratic unity.

In connection with this, Berlinguer then tackled a few questions relating to the nature of our democratic alternative proposal. Why a democratic alternative and not a left-wing alternative? (Although not ruling out the possibility of a leftwing alternative being raised in a different phase ofthe political struggle). It is primarily because the aim is to solve a decisive national problem--the moral question, to be precise--for which a range of democratic forces, wider than the left, must be mobilized. The other point which should be reaffirmed is that the democratic alternative, as a way out of the crisis caused by the existing party system, is not directed against the party system as such--a system desired and sanctioned by the constitution--but, on the contrary, has the particular aim of reforming the whole system on which the constitutional design of Italian democracy is based. Because of its nature and in view of the present situation, the democratic alternative cannot be defined purely in terms of a lineup. Indeed, it involves a reform of the parties and calls into question social and cultural forces which also exist outside the parties. It is in this context and to this end that a specific effort is found and must be developed for a more fruitful relationship among leftwing parties. For this reason, we cannot exempt the PSI from criticism of current methods of government and power. If we were to do so, we would weaken our battle and undermine our power to persuade people that it is necessary and possible for there to be a commitment by the whole left to the task of reforming society and the state.

The fact is that--beyond the tone of the argument which can and must become less inflamed and beyond legitimate rivalry--there is now a divergence of analyses and political prospects. This is the point on which the discussion and clarification should be concentrated.

Two things are vital for developing our party's line and political action:

First, a further great effort to analyze the international situation and Italian society, a more intense commitment to cultural, political and programatic development and a constant and more intense political initiative in the various spheres.

Second, the party's debate, the comparison of positions and the observation of disagreements must be carried out on the basis of the communists' own tradition and style and hence in a clear and open way with the constant aim of strengthening the party's political and operational unity.

EL PAIS REPORTS ON AID PLAN TO EQUATORIAL GUINEA

PM231529 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 17 Sep 81 pp 1, 3

[Carlos Mendo report]

[Text] Spain has proposed to Equatorial Guinea a three-phase plan, the first phase of which envisages an intensification of cooperation between the countries in defense and security as an essential precondition for the continuation of the help that the Madrid government provides to the former Spanish colony. Chairman of the Supreme Military Council and head of state Col Teodoro Obiang Nguema has accepted the Spanish proposal.

EL PAIS has learned from Spanish official sources that the plan was presented last Friday to Colonel Obiang by the director general of the bureau for cooperation with Equatorial Guinea, Jesus Martinez Pujalte, during a brief visit to Malabo, during which he spoke privately with the Equatorial Guinean leader for 2-and-1/2 hours.

It seems that for the first time since cooperation between the countries began following the so-called "freedom coup" in August 1979, Spain is determined to play tough to ensure that its aid to Equatorial Guinea is not weakened by the Guinean leaders' duplicity. The talks between Obiang and Pujalte, described by Spanish diplomatic circles as "frank and cordial," which is equivalent to "friendly but tough," serve to clarify the status of relations between the countries.

Martinez Pujalte informed Obiang that Spain has two courses of action in Guinea--one passive, the other of active involvement--and that it is up to the Guinean Government to choose the alternative. In the former case, Spain would drastically reduce its present aid, though still maintaining its humanitarian undertakings in the form of food and medical assistance. If the Malabo government opts for a continuation of aid in all fields, it would involve prior acceptance of a three-phase plan.

The first phase would be designed to guarantee security in Equatorial Guinea, to which end there would have to be an intensification of cooperation in security and defense matters. In this connection, Spanish Police Inspector Gen Jose Saenz de Santamaria will arrive in Malabo from Las Palmas on Monday for a 3-day official visit to the Guinean capital at the head of a delegation composed of Spanish police and armed forces officers. General Saenz de Santamaria will present to General Obiang a specific plan of action for reorganizing Equatorial Guinea's armed and security forces, involving the appointment of Spanish advisers "with executive status" in the small republic's military and police units.

With regard to Colonel Obiang's personal guard, Spain proposes the creation of a joint group composed of Guinean personnel trained in the Spanish military academies together with a few members from the Spanish police general reserve companies. This joint agreement gradually will replace the present Moroccan personal guard, which performs security services at the offices of the presidency of the Guinean Republic.

The second phase of the plan envisages a similar action in the economic field, with Spanish executive advisers in Guinea's various ministerial departments. In this connection, it seems that a Spanish delegation headed by Secretary of State for the Economy Agustin Hidalgo de la Quintana will travel to Malabo on 5 October.

The third phase, once the first two have been implemented, will be the political development of the former Spanish colony, with the creation of a constitutional state and government structure.

Martinez Pujalte told President Obiang that Spain is willing to wait as long as necessary for the Guinean Government to reply and make its decision known to Madrid, but Obiang gave his consent on Saturday for the implementation of the plan and the Spanish official conveyed Guinea's acceptance of Spain's plan to Foreign Minister Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca. At its Friday meeting, the Council of Ministers is expected to pass an executive order to issue specific instructions to General Saenz de Santamaria for the completion of his mission.

At the same time, the abovementioned official Spanish sources categorically denied that the message delivered to King Juan Carlos by the Guinean ambassador in Madrid contained a request from President Obiang for Spanish troops to be sent to Equatorial Guinea. In the message, having referred to "the solid ties of friendship between the two countries within the Hispanic community of nations," Obiang simply asks Juan Carlos to send a Spanish military leader, specifically a lieutenant colonel currently working in the Spanish Defense Ministry, as head of the Spanish military advisory delegation in Malabo "for more effective military cooperation between the countries." This request caused some circles to speculate about "a request for Spanish troops." Apparently, the aforementioned lieutenant colonel has a strong reputation in the Guinean Armed Forces, having taught many of its cadets.

Florencio Maye, Malabo's first deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs, who has been in Madrid since Monday [14 September] and is on his way to New York where he will attend the UN General Assembly session, met yesterday afternoon with Spanish Foreign Minister Perez-Llorca to discuss the state of relations between the countries and the intensification of Spanish cooperation.

PAPANDREOU ADDRESSES PASOK DEPUTY CANDIDATES

NC232102 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 23 Sep 81 p 16

[Text] Yesterday in his speech at the "Kings' Palace" hotel, Andreas Papandreou expounded to the movement's candidate deputies the PASOK program and the strategy it will implement during the election period. Specifically, Papandreou said the following:

I suppose you too are feeling the thrill I am feeling tonight with you, especially because we are thinking how we started 7 years ago. We started with a clear vision that crystallized in the declaration of 3 September 1974 which constitutes a historical document.

At the time, our goals seemed very remote: They were the goals of a man seeking to abolish, not contest, authority. Since then we have succeeded in achieving something unprecedented in the political life of Greece and Europe. For 7 years we have advanced without any compromise in our declarations and today we have succeeded in being our country's future government.

Then, in the first days, when some of us had just returned from exile and at Kastri we were planning the declaration and were trying to find the terms we should use, we were not frightened by the term socialism, so that currently everyone wants to be a socialist.

In 1977, we became the official opposition. This time we shall be the overwhelming majority--and the current government will assume our status of 1977. We are something new, even among the other European socialist parties.

One of the principal characteristics that makes us different is popular participation, because we do not believe in bureaucratic centralized socialism, because bureaucracy and the party become the tyrants of popular will. We have the framework of a program that will be implemented and acquire shape within a constant dialogue between the state and the people.

We have diversified our positions from those of the European socialist parties, and this is a result of our historic course. As a socialist movement, PASOK supports the crusade for detente, the reduction of arms and peace. In this field we have offered everything we could and we believe we have played a significant role in the reduction of arms escalation.

The position I took in Paris in March was that before the issue for the installation of missiles in Europe be placed for discussion, the opportunity should be given to the Soviet Union to withdraw the SS-20. I am glad that Chancellor Schmidt, who until some time ago had accepted the two parallel decisions to proceed with the installation of the "Pershing" and "cruise" missiles and at the same time continue negotiations with the Soviet Union for the reduction of the Soviet missiles, now agrees with the PASOK position.

We have already undertaken a commitment toward the Greek people that we intend to remove without exception all nuclear arms stored in our country and what we shall try to convince all other European countries of this. However, there is a vision that is decisive for us. We do not accept that Europe can remain divided, we do not accept that the Potsdam and Yalta resolutions can still exist.

Every country should weaken its relationship with the "alliance" it belongs to and, little by little, should take its own position. It is in this sense that we understand how to be Europeans.

Then Papandreou referred to the role of NATO and of the United States during the 7 year dictatorship and the Cyprus tragedy. I regret, he said, that in Thessalloniki the prime minister declared that the 7 year dictatorship was the work of some conspirators, although he knew that it was the work of the United States and NATO.

We do not forget that a NATO member country with NATO arms (Turkey) attacked another NATO country. We cannot disregard that Turkey is being armed by the United States and West Germany in order to trample upon the Greek sovereign area in the Aegean.

It is surprising that a member country of the "alliance" attacks another country of the same "alliance" and the "alliance" refuses to protect the [second] country's borders. It is also surprising that in negotiations for return to NATO, the "alliance" refused to add even a harmless phrase saying that it would not remain indifferent in case our borders were in danger--as the Greek Government had asked.

Greece cannot participate in an alliance which compels it to deploy its military forces in order to confront the forces of the Warsaw Pact and not deploy them against the threat of ally Turkey. We are a movement which represents the people's interests and the national interests. We shall deal with all issues with national interests and the readiness of the armed forces as our yardstick.

Finally, Papandreou referred to the economic deadlock into which New Democracy has led the country, and stressed that it was inevitable for the results of our work in the economic field to be much slower than it could have been had the elections been held a year ago. There is no precedent of a government undermining the country's economy to this extent with a circus of laying foundation stones, inaugurations and payments.

Certainly the people will give us a period of time to implement what we are promising. And in our work we shall have the support of socialist France and the Arab nation.

I should stress that our meeting today is a great honor for us because we are not only an electoral ticket, we are the visible representatives of a movement that will bring change to our country. We are drafted to this great cause. We know the historic significance of PASOK for Greece and we are absolutely aware of the responsbilities we are shouldering before the Greek people and nation.

You should not forget that you are the official and visible representatives of the great change. We shall not criticize New Democracy only because of its life and work--because it never had a policy--but we shall give samples of a new morality in the country's political life.

At this point Papandreou referred to the enormous corruption the right has brought about in the last decades in all sectors of the country. He concluded: For the first time we are being afforded the opportunity to prove to the establishment, local and foreign, that we are in a position to guard Thermopylae. I greet you, we shall meet again as victors.

At the "King George" hotel [as published] meeting, all the members of the executive office were present in addition to the candidate deputies. A. Koutsokheras, P. Avyerinos and An. Khristodhoulidhis spoke on organizing and tactics in the election campaign. C. Karatsis of the election struggle committee was also present.

[Begin recording] I am very happy to see Canadian National Defense Minister Lamontagne in Turkey and in my office. It has always pleased us to see that Canada, a country on the other side of the Atlantic, shows close interest in Europe's problems and conducts close cooperation with the European countries, including Turkey. We have observed with pleasure that we have no political problems with Canada and that we agree on many international issues. Also, I would like to express our thanks to Canada for the close interest Canada has shown in the Turkish Armed Forces and for the aid it had extended. This aid began with the escort vessels supplied to the Turkish Navy. It continued with the training of Turkish Air Force pilots in Canada during World War II. This aid also involved planes and spare parts to the Turkish Air Force. Lastly, we reached an agreement on an aid issue at the beginning of 1981. We sincerely hope that this aid will continue in an appropriate way.

It is also our sincere hope that our cooperation in the economic field develops as our cooperation in the military field. We are working on ensuring a commercial balance, on ensuring that Turkey exports certain items to Canada and that it develops its exports to Canada. I believe that the work being conducted on the issue by the concerned officials of the two countries will be auspicious. [end recording]

The visiting defense minister who completed his official contacts today is now holding a joint news conference with National Defense Minister Bayulken. The Canadian minister will leave our country tomorrow.

TCP SECRETARY BILEN'S REPORT TO PARTY PLENUM

Part Six

TA171040 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 17 Sep 81

[Part six of report by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen submitted on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] Struggle of the Trade Unions

Prior to the coup of 12 September 1980, the positions of the class conscious and mass trade unions was further enhanced through the struggle waged by the trade unions. Efforts for the unity of the syndical movement were intensified. Some gains were obtained in the field of labor conditions through the unity of action achieved among trade unions and workers affiliated with the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is] and the Confederation of Revolutionary Worker Unions [DISK]. Strong class conscious trade unions like the Turkish Mine, Metal, Metal Works and Machine Industry Workers Union [Metal-Is], Bank Workers Union [Bank-Sen] and others affiliated with DISK made appeals to the leaders of Turk-Is as well as its grassroots for a unity of action. These appeals were well received by members of various trade unions in the factories. Workers active in the fields of oil, glasswork, highway construction, housing and textiles took important steps in this direction. As a result of the climate created by these developments, the Turk-Is leader even suggested that May Day could be marked together with DISK.

Among the ranks of the Turk-Is, the movement for class unionism gained in strength to the detriment of those in favor of a union movement based on union personalities. The communists played an active role in this struggle.

With the coup of 12 September, the military junta closed DISK as well as all trade unions affiliated with it, banning all activities of the class and mass trade unions. However, the gains obtained by DISK are still living. Though they have been left without a trade union, workers managed to be organized in a bid to fight for their rights under the new circumstances created following the military coup. The communists are supporting such efforts of the workers with all their might. Other parties do not place as much importance on being active among workers who are affiliated with trade unions that have not been closed by the military junta.

The most reactionary, militarist and pro-American forces within and outside the junta as well as the military prosecutors--that are under the influence of those forces--are intensifying their aggression against the detained DISK officials. They are openly proclaiming their wish to prosecute the DISK officials and militants--who were never involved with incidents of terror--demanding the death sentence for them. The communists are calling on all democratic forces to unite in a bid to confront these aggressions. They support with all their might all national and international expressions of solidarity being voiced for the release of the DISK officials and militants and will continue to do so.

Though it has not closed the Turk-Is, the military junta has basically restricted all activities of that confederation. Today Turk-Is has reached a stage in which it cannot conduct union activity. It is working under the threat of being closed and has been obliged to adopt all the resolutions of the military junta though they were against the interests of the working class. By openly siding with the military junta's aggressive stand against the workers trade unions, some reactionary elements within the Turk-Is leadership are tools in the gross trampling of the rights of thousands of workers.

However, the TCP will support all Turk-Is steps favoring the working class. The TCP views as a new and significant development the fact that many workers whose trade unions have been closed are applying for membership in trade unions affiliated with Turk-Is in a bid to support efforts by these trade unions to prevent the firing of the workers and to strengthen the struggle against the oppression and exploitation of the workers. However, by their policy of "Yes" to resigning from the trade unions but "No" to new membership applications, the military junta and the Turk-Is officials are in fact closing the door to the workers. The challenge by the workers applying for Turk-Is membership to force open these doors is not a step that weakens the positions of the mass and class unions. On the contrary, it is a step that reflects the maturity which the Turkish proletariat has reached in its struggle for its rights. It is a known fact that workers continue to adhere to their traditional unionist cause through illegal or semilegal organizations and to support the leading cadres of their [banned] unions.

Workers believe they should not be idle until a decision is taken by the authorities for the reopening of DISK. They find ways of being active based on their intuition of class unionism. The communists should examine these ways of struggle which the working class has devised as a result of its own self-experience and should seek ways to help them out.

While on the one hand, they are carrying out these activities, the communists should, on the other, try to spread the fundamental views of the TCP among the workers affiliated with DISK and Turk-Is.

The TCP demands the lifting of all bans and limitations on union rights and liberties and the recognition of these rights and liberties. In addition to this, the workers should unite in free and united trade unions that they will lead through the representatives they themselves elect from their own ranks, thus putting an end to the rift between DISK and Turk-Is by their own will. The workers have in the past suffered the consequences of this rift which was created mostly by the reactionary union officials in the Turk-Is leadership.

The communists should nevertheless avoid giving a hand to efforts being exerted to transform the working class into a single state trade union movement under the threat of the bayonet. There are elements within the Turk-Is leadership that are supporting this so-called merger of the trade unions. "Yes" to unity and merger but only in the event it is carried out freely. This is the motto of the TCP on this matter.

The Youth Movement

The junta made several promises about saving youth from terrorism, ensuring them jobs and professions, expanding their educational opportunities and ensuring an orderly and organized education. However, the junta cannot reach the source of all these problems because it pursues basically proimperialist and promonopolist policies. Hundreds of thousands of youths were pushed to unemployment due to the economic policy being followed. The bans placed on syndical rights further increased the exploitation of young labor.

By charging fees for higher education and by opening private schools, the ruling classes are trying to completely curtail the educational opportunities of the workers' children. Meanwhile, the junta is trying to enact laws that will prevent the youths from freely organizing themselves. It is talking about the establishment of a single youth organization. All these things show that in a so-called democracy to be established by the junta, the working class as well as the youth will be left without democratic rights and freedoms.

The 12 September 1980 coup brought about a series of new results concerning the youth movement. First of all, the damage done to the working class and the democratic movement by the impasse of terrorism and its counterrevolutionary essence were proven once again. The military junta used terrorism as crutches in its attack against the democratic forces. A large number of youths who were sunk in the terrorist quagmire were destroyed by means of various provocations.

The process of disintegration of the petit bourgeois revolutionarism, which has been going on for a long time, still continues. Undoubtedly, a section of the petit bourgeoisie can learn lessons from its experiences, can see the impasse of terrorism and can approach the positions of the working class. The communists must help the youth sections which have leftist radical positions to rid themselves of the erroneous ideological and political views they uphold. For this purpose it is necessary on the one hand to further strengthen the ideological struggle against the various appearances of leftist deviationism and on the other hand to establish a unity of action with the sections which are under the influence of leftist deviationist trends but which are not of a provocative nature.

The progressive youths were stripped of their opportunity to work under legal conditions with the closing of the Progressive Youth Association [IGD] and other youth organizations. Today, the progressive youths are faced with the problem of establishing a nation-wide, centrally and organizationally independent youth organization suitable to the present conditions and placed on more stable foundations.

The TCP supports the struggle of the progressive youths to create a wide mass youth movement based on an anti-imperialist antifascist and patriotic platform. The goal of achieving a united youth organization continues to be a current issue. The progressive youths' perspective on the issue is correct; first to unite the youths from the Kurdish anti-imperialist democratic movement with the youths from the working class parties; eventually to win over the Republican People's Party youths and the other youth sections which are opposed to terrorism and which do not follow the provocative action path.

The Teachers' and the Professionals' Movement

The democratic teachers movement has an important function in our country. Traditionally, teachers have had progressive influences over our people. The teachers' struggle has enabled the democratic movement to extend to the villages. Prior to the 12 September coup, the oppression and exile of the teachers had reached unimaginable dimensions. The teachers' right of organization had been usurped. After 12 September, a large number of teachers were arrested for various reasons.

The communists have supported the democratic teachers' movement with all their might. It supported the teachers' struggle for economic, democratic and professional (?freedom). It waged a constant struggle against the oppression and exile of teachers. It is known that in this way our party gained effective positions within the teachers movement in a short time.

Our party carried out active work among the engineers, technicians and physicians and gained advanced positions among them. The communists supported the struggle of the professionals for their economic and democratic demands. It can be said that the most outstanding characteristic of our recent work in this field has been the wide alliances we established and the fact that our policy for a unity of action was implemented creatively.

The Women's Movement

The democratic women's movement displayed an effective development before the 12 September coup. The Progressive Women's Association [IKD] was the leader of this development. It attracted women workers extensively, organized them and drained them. The democratic women's movement was active not only among women--it played a role in the general struggle for democracy, in the unity of action of the progressive forces and in the development of the peace movement. Our party supported the struggle of the democratic women's movement. During their work among the women, the communists will exploit all legal opportunities, big or small, and thus continue to support the democratic women's movement's development and strengthening. This carries great importance both for the present and the future of the revolutionary movement. The mass activities of the democratic women's movement have clearly shown that it is a unique source of power.

Part Seven

TA181233 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Sep 81

[Part seven of report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] On the Single Front of the National Democratic Forces

Comrades, to struggle for the single front of all the national democratic forces under the present complicated and problematic conditions is our party's current basic policy. What must we do to implement this policy? We believe that there is a single criterion to assess the decisions taken and that is the actual, practical results.

Seven years have passed since the TCP program was written and 4 years since the party conference convened. In other words, it has been a long time since we announced the front policy. Furthermore, this policy is not something new. We lived a period when all the progressive forces were faced with the fascist threat during the recent years when the mass activities of the working class, the toilers and the middle strata were enhanced and when the nation was faced with political and social upheavals. Today, there is a military dictatorship. In short, we have lived and are living in years which have the really convenient conditions that can enable the national democratic forces to unite. However, our party has not been able to carry out the duty it has placed before it, namely, to establish a national democratic front.

At this point, it will be useful to discuss a certain problem. What is the tie between the program for a national democratic front and the (?similar) TCP program? The following approach was present at the 1980 Central Committee plenum: "It is wrong to consider the national democratic front program and the (?similar) party program as identical."

We have said several times in our broadcasts that these two have become identical. Such an attitude really means tying the hands of the party. In a way, it means "you either approve our program or there will not be a national democratic front." We must not forget that the front question also involves compromise. What sort of a front are we thinking about? An ideal front or a real front to be composed of the representatives of the existing classes?

We are being told frequently that the national democratic front is a slogan special to the TCP. That is natural. If we say "the front program is the TCP's [word indistinct] program" then all these criticisms will always be justified. However, the front problem is not a concrete or inconstant one. From its top to its bottom most organizations, the party must constantly study all the classes and strata of the society, their organizations and political parties. It is especially necessary to know in detail the new tendencies, programs, administrations, membership composition and inner conflicts of the political organizations and mass organizations. Unless this is done, the efforts of the party administration to prepare a platform for the very well thought out front program would be fruitless. The masses would no longer believe in the front programs.

Can we say "even if nobody approves it we will issue a front program and thus influence the masses?" However, life does not stop. It is necessary to adapt the detailed front programs to the new economic, social and political developments. Otherwise, the program becomes obsolete without being implemented. The right attitude is to propagandize our party's [word indistinct] program on the one hand and on the other hand to consistently defend--with revolutionary content--the democratic and anti-imperialist demands which are posited by the masses, which are urgent for them and which are upheld by any parties or organizations that can become allies.

In other words, the right attitude is to draw the masses into action for the demands of the forces and the classes we want to gain to our front and to tie these demands to our revolutionary aims. It is to search for and create the widest unity of action and means for political alliance for every single one of the demands. Communist parties do not posit demands for themselves. If that is so, we must find ways of expressing the masses' demands after we learn them from the masses. The communists have the duty to learn the masses' demands, to unite the widest masses in the struggle for these demands, and to establish unity of action around these demands with the local representatives of the political trends that are influential on the masses. A correct understanding of the front program is essential for establishing that front. Furthermore, it is necessary to determine the forces which can take part in the front concretely in the front today, and to develop flexible relations with them.

Our basic starting point is clear. The unity of front of the political forces is determined by the activities being carried out in the grassroots. However, this does not justify the mechanical attitude of first working in the grassroots and then establishing cooperation at the top. The party must work among the masses with all its might and it must find the ways of establishing a political bloc with all the democratic parties and groups.

Already today, there are forces which wage a constant struggle for peace, independence, democracy and social developments against the rightist military dictatorship.

A way will be opened for millions of people to make a leap forward if the communists, the labor parties' and Republican People's Party [RPP] members as well as Kemalists who are close to the communists, the religious circles who are taking anti-imperialist positions and the Kurdish anti-imperialist democratic groups can unite.

The point is that today, the positions of the forces which can be drawn into the front must be reassessed. How is the present polarization of these political forces? The concrete situation shows that no single reason can be given to this question. Is it possible for all the forces outside the junta to unite in a single front? For example, it is in line with the Justice Party's class and political nature for it to oppose the junta in certain fields. This party supports the junta's oppression of the progressive forces as well as its proimperialist and promonopolist economic steps.

The RPP's attitude is more complicated. For example, party leader Ecevit takes a position against the junta. However, the various wings of this party are establishing a dialogue with the junta's relatively moderate elements.

In general, even if they oppose the junta in various fields, the Ataturkists support it from this or that aspect. One reason for this complicated situation is the junta's balanced policy among the various bourgeois political (?circles). In this balanced policy, the relations (?within) the junta and the army administration sometime deviate in favor of the most reactionary forces and sometimes in favor of the liberal circles.

Undoubtedly, as increased forces confront the junta, it intensifies its attacks against the working class and the progressive forces. Under these conditions, the communists must on the one hand recognize, on time, all the old or new representatives of the present or future social opposition and use the means for a unity of action with them. On the other hand, the communists must make use of the slightest crack in the enemy camp. These cracks enable the working class and the progressive forces room to maneuver.

Among all these conflicts, our party must pursue a flexible policy and try to unite all the national democratic forces. For this, our party must take into consideration all the forces which are opposed to the bloc of imperialism, collaborationist, monopolist bourgeoisie and landlords, including those that are temporarily assembled around the junta. It is possible and essential to unite them and to create a wide movement against all the junta's attacks and against the junta's most reactionary and pro-American elements.

No matter what it is called, the united front which will constitute the embryo [last word in English] of the anti-imperialist and democratic force that will assume power in the future will pursue the joint policies of the TCP and the other workers' parties. Such consensus will make the taking of concrete steps for the realization of this front possible. What is important is that such an integrated front is the only force that can, under the present political conditions, defend the rights of millions of workers and toilers. Possibilities for such an eventuality which seems to be so limited today will be further realized through the process of political struggle. All progressive forces should not miss such a historic possibility.

Unity of Action of the Working Class

The united front of all anti-imperialist, antimonopolist, antifascist and antichauvinist forces is strongly linked with the unity of action among the various parties of the working class. Though in the period following the military coup of 12 September relations among the TCP, the Turkish Labor Party [TLP] and the Turkish Socialist Workers Party [TSWP] did not progress as they should, some steps forward were taken. The TCP believes that it is beneficial to hold talks with these parties on all levels, in order to examine the issues. Particularly, contacts to be held among the higher levels of these parties can provide possibilities for the straightening out of past mistakes and for the timely taking of necessary measures. Only such cooperation may lead to the creation of a lasting climate of unity of action.

Comrades, past differences between our party and the TLP, particularly on the issue of the stages of the revolution have been settled to a great extent. However, we are now witnessing the emergence of new differences of view between our party and the TLP with TSWP on the nature of the present rule in Turkey and the policies to be pursued under the circumstances. On this issue our stand is very clear: We are in favor of constructive discussions and exchanges of views among the three parties on the subject of the nature of the present rule on Turkey. Such discussion should not be a reason for undertaking joint action. We believe that big possibilities have emerged that will permit a more intensified unity of action with these parties. We will try to take advantage of these new circumstances.

The unity of action with TLP and TSWP will create the possibility for parties of the working class and communists to play an effective and leading role in the political life of our country as well as in the struggle of the masses. All three parties should jointly act in order to create a concrete political alternative. We believe that the process of the political unity of the working class is deeply linked with the process of the unity of action among the workers' parties. This link is also valid for the pace, shape and other aspects of the process.

How can such a unity of action be realized under the (?present) circumstances? New ways must be devised in order to achieve this objective. The unity of action to be realized among the three parties will facilitate the devising of methods of work under the new conditions.

Another outstanding issue that must be settled by the three parties is the mass organizations of our workers abroad and the support to be offered to these organizations in their activities. The communists will support all steps to be taken to ensure an integration beyond the unity of action among (VITPAK), (GERCEK), (ADK) and FIDEF [acronyms of organizations of Turkish workers abroad]. Preventing rifts among workers abroad is, on the one hand, a national issue and, on the other, the international task of the three workers' parties. Rifts among workers of foreign countries must not be reflected among the Turkish workers abroad. It is our belief that the Turkish workers abroad should be considered an integral part of the working class in the country in which they are employed.

Basic Alliance Between Workers and Peasants

Peasants are the basic allies of the working class in the united front of the national democratic forces. The situation of peasants has deteriorated under the rule of the military junta. High income taxes, low floor prices for their products, high bank interests on loans, the profiteering of usurers and middlemen, the high cost of fertilizers and other agricultural inputs have all been factors that have hastened the collapse of the small farmer. The situation is the same for the rich or middle-size farmers except for the big capitalist farmers and the landlords. Monopolies are now interested in the agricultural field too. The main reason for this development is to monopolize the agricultural products used in industry.

Plans for Turkey's joining the EEC as a full member represents the greatest threat for the Turkish agricultural sector and the peasants. The latest figures by the state planning organization prove this fact.

The friction of classes in the village is a "painful" process. Currently this process is deepening. The agricultural proletariat is reaching great proportions. It is being organized in cooperatives. Hundreds of thousands of persons are emigrating yearly from the rural areas to urban areas. Possibilities for these to go abroad for work are getting slimmer. As a result belts of poverty all around the large cities are growing at a gigantic pace, becoming an ominous sign of the (?ills) of capitalism. In the rural regions, the difference between the wide masses of peasants and the monopolies and landlords is sharpening.

The cooperative movement has gained strength in the villages. In addition to Hazel Nut Agricultural Sales Cooperative Union [Fiskobirlik] and Cukurova Cotton and Citrus Fruit Agricultural Sales Cooperative Union [Cukobirlik] and the like which are dominated by the big farmers, landlords and banks, a cooperative with millions of members--the Union of Cooperatives for Village Development and Other Agricultural Goals [KOY-KOOP]--also emerged. Millions of villagers joined the KOY-KOOP in which they were actively organized carrying out in practice the program of the democratic peasants. In addition to defending the rights of the small and middle-level peasants, this cooperative movment was struggling for a democratic counrty and army. This movement was able to awaken the peasants that followed in the footsteps of the reactionary bourgeois parties. The results of this were clearly seen in the alliance between cooperatives and the workers trade unions.

The communists warned the peasants against reformist beliefs that salvation could be achieved through the cooperative movement without hurting the fundamentals of capitalism. They told peasants that the agricultural policies of the monopolies would mean disaster for them. Communists supported the small and middle-size farm owners against the efforts of the rich peasants and capitalist farmers to seize the cooperatives.

ROMANIA REPORTEDLY HAS PAYMENT DIFFICULTIES

[Special DIE PRESSE report]

[Text] Vienna--After Poland, Romania's banks are now also encountering growing difficulties in paying due bills of foreign suppliers. There have been frequent delays, but lately the situation has become more and more critical. When there are payment arrears, the Romanians attempt to negotiate respites of 180-360 days, but want to pay interest only from the time that such a respite is agreed on, rather than from the date a bill is due.

Not only Austrian, but most other Western suppliers to Romania are affected by the liquidity difficulties of this Balkan country. FRG chemical concerns have already threatened to stop deliveries because of the nonpunctual payments. Western banks, however, report that they still get interest and redemption payments from Romania fairly punctually.

At the Austrian Kontroll-Bank no applications by enterprises for guarantees regarding deliveries to Romania are pending at the moment. Next week the advisory council in charge will discuss the question of such guarantees. It may well be that the Kontroll-Bank will be authorized to issue more guarantees for Romanian orders that are "in the interest of Austria's national economy."

At the end of 1980, Romania's debts to the West totaled about $9.5 billion. Its debts to Austria at present amount to about 3.6 billion schillings. At the forthcoming annual World Bank and International Monetary Fund meeting in Washington, a high-ranking Romanian delegation will negotiate on new low-interest loans.

SUCCESSFUL TECHNOLOGY EXHIBIT HELD IN MOSCOW

[Moscow correspondent Uwe Engelbrecht dispatch]

[Summary] The Austrian technology exhibition held in Moscow 13-16 September, which was combined with a technical-scientific symposium, was apparently very successful. On Monday afternoon, it was visited by Soviet Premier Nikolay Tikhonov, and a few days before it was closed it had already been visited by six Soviet cabinet ministers and about 30 deputy ministers. The largest Soviet economic paper, EKONOMICHESKAYA GEZETA, carried an 8-page special supplement "Austria 1981," with an introduction by Foreign Trade Minister Patolichev, Trade Minister Staribacher and the ambassadors of both countries, and advertisements of Austrian firms. This supplement was regarded as quite a sensation among Soviet economists and journalists, since no other Western country had ever been able to have such a supplement published in the USSR. Most of the 60 participating firms reported above-average attendance of the 120 technical lectures and discussions, and noted that industry managers and scientists even came from the remotest parts of the USSR.

The preceding session of the joint Austrian-Soviet commission in Moscow had also shown a positive trend: Austrian-Soviet trade in 1981 is expected to go up about 15 percent, but at the same time, the Austrian deficit will further increase. At present, the Austrian export-import ratio in trade with the USSR is 1:2 but it tends to a 1:3 ratio. Despite the demonstrated political good will of the Soviet hosts, Austrian trade experts in Moscow warn against the illusion that the success of the exhibition will immediately be reflected in larger Soviet orders.

SCHMIDT VIEWS HAIG-GROMYKO TALKS, ZERO OPTION

DW250829 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 1800 GMT 24 Sep 81

[Reporter Kleinmann interview with FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt; date and place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Federal Chancellor, does the information you have justify hopes that the Haig-Gromyko talks are an indication that substantial American-Soviet disarmament talks will take place in November?

[Answer] Yes, I can answer that in the affirmative without any reservations. Mr Haig, as well as Mr Gromyko, said that both big powers strongly emphasized that these negotiations must be successful. I consider this also a success of German policy. Almost 4 years ago, I pointed out the danger of nuclear medium-range missiles to the world public in a public lecture in London in October 1977. About 2 years ago, there was the famous dual decision by the Western alliance and, 1 year ago, Genscher and I visited Moscow where we emphatically pointed out to the Soviet leadership that it would also be in its interests if negotiations were to take place. Naturally, the negotiations will be difficult. Through consultations with the Americans, we Germans will try as before to represent our interests during the negotiations--European and special German security interests--and to bring a positive influence to bear on the negotiations.

[Question] Does your information permit the conclusion that the so-called zero option will really be among the topics for negotiations?

[Answer] I have no doubt that the U.S. Government will introduce the mutual zero option in the negotiations. Mutual means that the Soviet Union also must reduce to zero the number of its nuclear medium-range missiles aimed at West Europe--and there are several hundred of them now--so that the American side can remain at zero, where it is at present. I have no doubts that the Americans will include that in the negotiations. I cannot predict how the Soviet side will react to this. However, this will be among the issues to be discussed with General Secretary Brezhnev in November when he comes to visit me in Bonn.

GENSCHER, GROMYKO DISCUSS DISARMAMENT IN NEW YORK

LD250912 Hamburg DPA in German 0017 GMT 25 Sep 81

[Excerpt] United Nations, New York, 25 Sep (DPA)--Before returning to Bonn, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher had extensive political discussions with GDR Foreign Minister Fischer and his Soviet counterpart, Gromyko. The U.S.-Soviet talks on nuclear medium-range missiles in Europe due to start in Geneva at the end of November was a theme at both meetings.

Genscher told Gromyko of his satisfaction with the two superpowers' decision and expressed his hope that their negotiations might proceed briskly. Genscher also noted satisfaction on Gromyko's part that the USSR and the United States had succeeded in agreeing to open negotiations.

According to sources close to the Bonn delegation, Genscher pointed out to Gromyko that the West's counterarming requirement could be checked by concrete talks in the negotiations with the East. The so-called zero solution, which amounts to counterarming in the West, becomes unnecessary if the East renounces advance arming as the ideal solution. [sentence as published]

Members of the German delegation described Genscher's talk with Gromyko as "very responsible, argumentative and constructive." The Soviet foreign minister refrained from any polemics against third parties.

The principle topics of Genscher's meeting with Gromyko at the Soviet mission at the United Nations included, apart from disarmament, the visit of Soviet head of state and party leader Leonid Brezhnev to Bonn in November. Both ministers drew attention to the importance of this meeting for German-Soviet relations and declared themselves in favor of the continuation of the policy formulated in the agreements between Bonn and Moscow.

Other topics included the developments in Poland, the efforts for a disarmament conference for Europe and the Madrid CSCE meeting. The situation in Afghanistan also was mentioned.

LAMBSDORFF COMMENTS ON GAS-PIPELINE DEAL WITH USSR

DW241209 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1100 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Excerpts from reporter Klaus Altmann interview with FRG Minister of Economics Otto Graf Lambsdorff prior to his departure for Moscow; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The gas-for-pipeline-deal, which has been criticized by the Americans, will certainly also play an important role. Do you think you can push it one step forward in Moscow?

[Answer] I think to a certain degree, but the most important role is played by the negotiating partners. In this case, it is the buyers of natural gas and the sellers of pipes as well as the sellers of natural gas in the Soviet Union, who have not agreed on the price so far. That cannot be done by the commission. The commission can only confirm once again that it wants this deal to be made for political reason and I believe it will confirm this.

[Question] We have trade worth DM15 billion a year with the Soviet Union. Can that be increased?

[Answer] If the gas-pipeline deal comes about, it will mean a considerable increase. I cannot exactly say how much it will be, but it will reach billions regarding just the foreign currency income of the Soviet Union. There has been a constant upward development in past years; the tendency always has been positive.

BRIEFS

SHIP ORDER FROM USSR--Hamburg shipyard Blohm and Voss received a large order worth about DM75 million from the USSR. Under the terms of this order, Blohm and Voss will build for Moscow's Gas Industry Ministry a special stilt carrier ship which is to transport support stilt structures weighing up to 18,000 tons for offshore platforms from the construction shipyard to the offshore location in the Caspian Sea and install them there. Delivery of this ship of 26,800 dead weight tons is planned for mid-1983. [Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 23 Sep 81 p 14 DW]

MITTERRAND HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE 24 SEPTEMBER

LD241910 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 24 Sep 81

[Press conference given at the Elysee Palace by President Francois Mitterrand--live]

[Excerpts] [Mitterrand] Ladies and gentlemen, I bid you welcome and I am happy to receive you here. This is the first time in 4 months that I have spoken to you and, through you, to the country under circumstances such as this. It is true that before 10 May I expressed myself often on all subjects which rightly preoccupied the French people. Thus, I have spoken little in my capacity as president but I have been working calmly, assured by a lengthy term of office and assured also by a solid parliamentary majority.

First of all, I had to restore every institution. The government governs and parliament is legislating and participating in the debate without any pressure whatsoever being exerted.

As for myself, if I intend to exercise the responsibilities which the sovereign people have fully entrusted to me, I do not want to put myself in the place of either one or the other of these powers. The equilibrium of our institutions will gain by it, there is no doubt about that.

With democracy guaranteed, alternation came into play and what was regarded as impossible has come about in calm, by relying on a great popular movement that sprang from the depths of our people. The republic has recovered its authenticity and the mutation that was effected has made it possible to avoid many a peril that was looming.

The government set to work under the authority of Premier Pierre Mauroy who deserves the trust of the French people just as he also has mine. A great deal was done in a few weeks. Should I recall the increase of the minimum wage, the raising of the minimum old age pension, of the family allowances and the lodging allowances, the passing of a broad and generous amnesty law, the suppression of the state security court, the abrogation of the death sentence, the decentralization law, the reestablishment of university freedoms, the price regulation of books, the nationalizations adopted yesterday to provide our country with a credit system geared to encourage initiative, and with an industrial apparatus capable of leading all the enterprises into the technological revolution of the end of this century, an employment program, protection of the franc and so on.

Without doubt, a lot remains to be done. I have the means to do it. I will lack neither the time nor the will to fulfill my commitments. I appealed for unity, for a wide-scale popular rallying for national recovery. I have been given ample response, at least as much as I could expect. And I do not exclude anyone from the struggle for France. I have decided, with others, to place France at the top of the industrial nations, to be the initiator of a new type of development, based on a better and more just organization of social relations, a better utilization of our resources and a better distribution of our income and working time.

This is a long term task, all the more so since the legacy we have assumed is a heavy one. Unemployment and inflation hit hard at many of our people and it is against unemployment and inflation that the government has directed the main brunt of its action. I will speak about this in dealing with your questions.

Ladies and gentlemen, France would not be worthy of its history if it were to live in self-imposed isolation.

This would not be possible even if it wanted to. Monetary disorder, local conflicts which are spreading, the tense relations between East and West are all there to remind us that the world's equilibrium is fragile. This aroused in me a concern, from the very first weeks of my 7-year term, to make the voice of France heard in all the continents and in world bodies, to turn to the peoples and their rulers to invoke the plain facts of freedom, development and the necessary primacy that arbitration, disarmament and collective security must have over the resort to violence.

Needless to say, Europe's future is for us a matter of prime importance. France untiringly will contribute to any undertaking that will enable the people of the community to draw their links closer and to tackle together present and future tasks.

As for freedom: Those who aspire to it know that France is there, conscious of its duties and of the lessons of its history. A land of asylum and law, it neither challenges nor provokes anybody. Each country has the legitimate right to determine its own path. In Latin America, Africa and elsewhere, revolts, revolutions and the liberation movements are born primarily through misery, exploitation and totalitarianism before they become, unfortunately, the pawns of East-West conflict. Legitimate aspirations ultimately surface more violently if they have been oppressed for a long time. To the fighters for freedom throughout the world, who always oppose intolerable oppressions, I send my salute and my message of hope.

Concerning development: 600 million men and women, and children most particularly, are living in what is called absolute poverty. By the end of this century, there will be maybe as many as 1 billion if nobody intervenes. France judges it impossible to accept such a prospect. In the first place, I have decided to increase the means of economic and cultural cooperation with these peoples and I wish to encourage the developed world to solidarity by creating the conditions for a real stabilization in the prices of raw materials. In Ottawa, I proposed that an energy policy be launched within the framework of the objectives and means of the World Bank and I will not cease proclaiming the need for that.

Let us know how to blaze in good time the path of new nations to new rights, to a more equitable international economic order, and let us admit without further delay what is just and at the same time inevitable.

Europe: In order to build it, one has to overcome the inevitable bilateral or community disputes. I will seek solutions to current problems in the light of specific projects of European resurgence. I have already spoken about the idea of a social community which, in particular, would allow the improvement of employment and social rights. I also suggest that the joint external policy be strengthened, that a policy of energy savin be financed by community loans and that specific industrial cooperation projects be introduced to help the modernization of operations which are facing competition or to develop the activities of the third industrial revolution.

Finally everyone--and primarily the French--expect security. France is the ally, in all sovereignty, of its 14 NATO partners and it knows its rights and duties to them. I hope that they also know them. This was not the least (?usefulness) of the talks I had with several leaders of the alliance and notably President Reagan.

With the Soviet Union and the other countries of East Europe, France wants to maintain mutually advantageous relations in accordance with history and geography. I do not forget the old and strong friendship linking their peoples to ours and I will see to it that this friendship is safeguarded and, if necessary, revived. But France does not mistake pacifism for peace. As a result, it is the latter that I am interested in and it is its realities which govern the policies of France.

The debate -- or the dialectic, arms versus negotiations -- must be organized around the basic notion that only a balance of force safeguards peace. This is why I have alerted opinion to the excessive Soviet armament in Europe. This is why I want negotiation to start, but on clear bases and without one or the other of the partners being able to speculate on the advantages of a moment. In all this, France will develop its own deterrent strategy, loyal to its commitments, knowing that, in the final analysis, just like individuals in the face of life, its risks and chances, a great country is always alone when it comes to decisive options, facing none but itself.

I have proposed to the country a new policy. But this policy is based on the French people rallying around the national impetus.

The national impetus on the living forces of the country, our nationalized industries, and also our private enterprises, the small and medium-sized businesses, our craft industries, agriculture, all make up the wealth of the nation. This rallying, this national impetus, must be the conviction of each Frenchman and woman that they are taking part in a great task. France has a role to play for itself, but also in Europe and the world, and for Europe and the world. Many peoples on this earth look toward it; for many of them it appears to offer them hope. It is up to me, along with the government, to turn this hope into certainty. I already told the nation all this before 10 May. I am now ready to confirm it through the questions that you will put to me. Thank you.

Since we are so numerous here, we must proceed with the discussions. You have questions to put to me, I will reply to them. The vastness of the subjects -- and I am also thinking of the multiplicity of interests involved -- means tnat we must bring some order so I suggest that we divide out talks into three sections. One, rather longer than the others of necessity -- but there will be other press conferences, other meetings with the press -- will be devoted to economic, social, monetary and financial problems. We can begin with this. A second part, rather shorter, on matters of foreign policy. Then, a third part, but by no means the least negligible, on the problems of our society, which would touch upon certain events of our foreign policy and the stance of the president on problems which affect the future of our civilization. If you will kindly make the task easier, I ask for no more. We will be able together to draw certain conclusions that will be of benefit to the nation. So we will begin, as I told you, with the problems of an economic, financial, social and monetary nature. I am now listening. I will take notes.

Your questions -- I have them before me -- are on diverse issues. Firstly, nationalization. Well, yes, ladies and gentlemen, my idea of nationalization corresponds to my view also of modern society. How many papers have said: But this is the working of an ideology. [passage indistinct] But at any rate, the explanation of society in 1981 -- more than a century and a half after the development of capitalism in France -- with the phenomena of the accumulation and the concentration of capital, of the multinationalization of capital in the world in which we exist -- all this leads us to see as just and necessary that a certain number of enterprises, whether they have become monopolies or whether they tend toward monopoly, and which manufacture the products necessary to the nation, should become nationalized, as we say, become an integral part of the nation, that they should not have an economic, and thus a political power enabling them to prevail over decisions of general interest, and, no more, having abolished all national competition under it, to be the masters of the market. That is a first declaration.

The second is that if I think that nationalization will give us the tools for the next century and for the last 20 years of this one. If this is not done, far from being nationalized, they would, believe me, rapidly become internationalized. And I reject any international division of work and production decided far from our country, any obeying of interests which are not ours. We are not a pawn on the chess board of those who are more powerful than us. It has to be made clear. Nationalization is for us a weapon with which to defend French production. Of course, this is not the only objective of this reform. But it is an important one and if it corresponds to a certain view of modern society, I repeat, it corresponds also to a concern for effectivenss. I will come back to this in a moment.

What will be the practical outcome of our new situation? Well, the fact is that today, slightly more so than yesterday in our mixed economy society, the nationalized sector represents 10 percent of all wage earners, 18 percent of investments and 15 percent of the value added by industry.

We are confronted with 2 million individual or private enterprises, with over 10 million people active in this sector, nearly half the active French population in what is called, roughly speaking, the domain of the small and medium-sized enterprises, the small and medium-sized industries. And I intend to preserve them. How many times have I said that my proposals bare the value of a contract?

There have been complaints of haziness. However, I have always said this, but they didn't want to believe me. All this was clearly put to the French people, company by company, enterprise by enterprise. And those companies that have not been included in the nationalization plan will not be included, at least as long as national decisions taken in consultation with the people -- I mean either parliamentary elections or presidential elections -- have not decided otherwise in accordance with the program outlined by the candidates.

I therefore have made a contract and I intend that French businessmen as a whole, but also all those taking part in business -- I am thinking of the workers -- know that they have a long term contract with me, that it is a durable policy, that they know their commitment, their restraints, but also their field of liberty, which is the largest. This is why I insist so much on this point. We have also come out in favor of efficiency.

I am going to reconstruct our industry. A considerable effort was made at the time of the presidency of Monsieur Pompidou, an effort which was subsequently slowed down or dissipated.

Reconstructing our industry: Well, it is important to know that nationalization in France works. (?Some) results, as they say always in this field, when these things are discussed [words indistinct] are impressive in the case of the French public sector, which is not the case, it must be admitted, in many foreign public sectors.

There is no reason why nationalization should not work even better from the moment that we add a true nationalization of credit.

Consider motor vehicles, consider oil, consider aircraft, helicopters, the bank, the Credit Agricole, the Credit Lyonnais, Societe Generale de Banque -- three of the largest banks in the world -- are already nationalized corporations and have been so for a long time now.

We therefore intend to continue along this path in order to continue ensuring France's presence and thus increasing its wealth.

But, as I said earlier, we must next conquer our internal market [words indistinct]. This is at least an essential objective of my policy throughout my 7-year term of the presidency.

I will give some guidance: Remember, we must reconquer or conquer the steel, aluminum and plastics sectors; we must build up a machine-tool industry, an integrated circuits industry, a cybernetics industry, particularly microcomputers and microprocessors. I will see to it that a world center is set up in Paris, which will make it possible for us to attract to France the most advanced techniques as well as, as they say, the best informed brains.

I want to multiply the possibilities for creating consumer goods designed for French consumption: textiles, hi-fi equipment, telecommunications equipment, videodiscs, motorcycles.

I want a true timber industry to be created in France. France could be the leading forestry country in Europe. And imports--let us say the deficit in the balance of trade--this item comes immediately after oil. Imagine this absurdity! And this absurdity has gone unchallenged for a quarter of a century.

Finally energy savings. The list is long, without forgetting, as I said earlier, the power-driving effects in winning the battle for jobs that will underlie the working procedure of a nationalized industrial complex which will obey flexible rules. I have one reservation: My intention is that these new national companies, as well as some of the old ones, will regain the flexibility, the mobility and the freedom of action that some of them have lost or never had. Moderate or rightwing governments established state control over the nationalized industries; we do not want any of this. From now on, we want nationalized companies to be managed in the same fashion as--without this being taken as an absolute model, but it is nevertheless an interesting criterion--Renault, for instance, has been managed, without any nitpicking or a posteriori controls on the part of the central administration.

Through nationalization, we are going to make a considerable effort--which I will return to in my conclusions--on research and development. And thanks to this, we will be setting up a vast sector that will act as a model for creating new social relations. Social relations are not unimportant. Not long ago, when addressing businessmen, businessmen of small and medium-sized businesses in particular, I said: Look, here is a whole list of measures that are aimed at giving you confidence, to help you set off on the right foot if necessary, but you well know that social peace is not the least of the elements.

Businessmen in France want to work in harmony with those who have been chosen by the popular will, which opens up the paths to work and freedom. I spoke a short time ago about the long term contract which links me to the nation. The rules of the game are set for a long time--at least for 5 years, until the legislative elections. The government must have a sure and lasting position and not only the government but every enterprise and each individual in its or his effort to do better. These are a few observations, ladies and gentlemen, which touch upon some structural reforms. I will not deal any more with decentralization. The debate has taken place in the national assembly.

I do not forget--and this is a reply to some other questions--that we will not succeed in anything with regard to our tax system without a general restructuring. I am thinking in particular about capital gains tax which in its present form must disappear. It is a kind of brake on transactions and exchanges and does not attain its objective. I am also thinking about the indispensable restructuring of the professional tax, but I say to the person who has questioned me on this that he has addressed the wrong person, it was not I who said during the presidential campaign that the professional tax must be abolished. I said that it must be modified, reformed, and I stick to this.

The wealth tax. First, is it just? If one wanted to judge by comparison, I would say that a wealth tax already exists in a certain number of countries which to some of you are almost models which are forever to be imitated. I am thinking of the United States, Great Britain, Germany. Great Britain has, from this point of view, a lesser reputation. I am thinking of the model of models--Switzerland. Well, in these countries, there is a wealth tax.

And finally, currency. A delicate matter. I am asked whether I want a more vigorous franc, whether I want to defend our currency. What other answer can be expected from me than this one--obviously. Currency--and this has been repeated 100 times and I learned it at school--is nothing but the reflection of an economic situation, a sort of photograph. Regarding the franc within the European Monetary System, we will act toward it as necessary, considering it as a precious object that should be safeguarded and as one of the indispensable elements of French reality.

And now, ladies and gentlemen, I propose that we turn to foreign policy.

First, the Israeli-Arab conflict. My rule regarding the one and the other is to employ the same language and to make the same proposals. People tell me: But you will earn the displeasure of Israel and also the Arabs. The matter is not one of causing discontent or of trying to reconcile opposites, but of having a policy for France which is useful to this part of the world. And this policy, which has only one path, is the following: Let us begin with Israel, if you wish. Israel had its existence recognized by international law. This international law cannot, having recognized existence, refuse the means. Thus, we have a series of ideas, such as safe and recognized borders, and so on and so forth. All that could threaten Israel's existence, in its reality recognized by international law, will be opposed by France. It is simple. The dispute, in the view of some, is over the very existence of Israel. Well, we cannot deal on this basis with anybody who will defend this principle. The dispute, in fact, is mainly over the territories which Israel holds under its administration since the 6-day war. In short, can the Palestinian people--who, as one must recognize, can only denounce this policy--hope to hold within their future homeland territories recognized as belonging to Israel, will the Palestinian people have a land which will be their homeland and which will belong to them, on which they will build a state structure of their choice? To this I have always replied: Yes.

I said this to Tel Aviv or to Jersualem as I defended Israel's right to exist, to have the means to exist; to Algiers, to Cairo.

Rule number two: I refused to have to choose--I have just been asked to do so--between one approach and another, that is to say, global proceedings or bilateral agreements. I take both. If one can advance toward peace by bilateral means, I am in favor. That is why I approved of Camp David. The countries which wage war can make peace; at least to progress toward it.

This method could very well not allow the whole problem to be settled, as one well sees, so either there are other methods or ways that do not condemn the first one. I have often told the Arab leaders I have met and who have understood me: You are men of honor--your civilization, your traditions, your history shows this. What would you think of a country like France that would trade one friendship against another? I have nobody to surrender and if I had I would not . Do not let people expect of me such and such a word such and such an attitude or action that would betray the principles of law I have just defined. Be it for this or that economic advantage [words indistinct].

But if it is a question of a global action, I say simply I have said it in Luxembourg to my partners in the community--Your objective and ours should be a global agreement, that is self-evident, provided everybody is around the same table, including the Palestinians. But to demand it as method is asking a lot, it is surrendering all the steps that could be useful even before the start. Who possibly can pretend that he is capable of bringing together at the same table all the Arab countries. Even less so Israel and the Palestinians and under actual circumstances, the PLO. Well, let us not work in the clouds and let us try in advance, as they say, step by step. The expression is not mine. If it is good to go forward step by step and progress is made, all the better. If one can make bigger steps, even better. I intend, in France, to develop a policy that will not be locked in any procedure. The external relations minister very well expressed this view in a recent statement: France--at any rate the president--approves today Camp David but Camp David is at the present time showing its limitations. If Camp David proves the opposite, I will then approve it; if Camp David is failing on a possible expansion of its diplomatic flank, then other means must be looked for. And in this respect, France will take all the steps, will meet the main leaders in order to make matters move forward. And it is in this sense, gentlemen, that I have received Prince Fahd's proposal--the Saudi step--as one of the most positive elements of these past years. I intend to discuss the eight proposals, or each of the eight, and this in particular will be the subject of the talks which I will have in 48 hours from now.

I cannot bind myself prematurely, but I do consider this initiative as one of the most important of the past few years. I consider it positive. There are a few reservations I have about some aspects of these proposals.

Lebanon: We can be brief, with the consideration that for as long as the community of nations cannot contribute to strengthening Lebanon's unity behind its government; for as long as there has not been provided any means for independence, notably by ensuring a UN presence in a larger zone that would serve as a buffer in the south of Lebanon--and perhaps one must also ensure linking at the UN level the excellent quadripartite demarche by Arab states which are trying, at the intiative of Saudi Arabia, to extend an olive branch and reconcilition--then France feels that it has particular obligations with regard to Lebanon and will respond to any appeal coming from its legitimate government. Please understand me when I say that I do not intend to substitute myself for it, but it was necessary to make the distinction. I am going by the order of my notes, which might mean a certain disorder in my speech.

I was asked if Mitterandism would become contagious, at least in West Europe, the community of Europe, so that I would not feel so lonely. This could be linked to another question: I have no illusion of having converted, or of being able to convert Mrs Thatcher to Mitterrandism. There are certain Britons who are concerned about knowing if I had been converted to Thatcherism. [laughter] I was at a concert in Albert Hall in the company of the British prime minister and some young people who were there received me with great kindness, I must admit, and even with enthusiasm. It was probably France they were welcoming, but then they turned with rather less kindness toward their prime minister. And among the chorus that arose, somewhat joyous and rather mocking, was this: Mitterand, do not let yourself be Thatcherized. I reflected on this, independently of the undeniable qualities of Mrs Thatcher on internal policies, which it is not for me to judge. I contented myself by saying that if I were British it was likely that I would not have voted for her party. But I said to myself: After all, what is the best way of being Thatcherized?

This is my double dilemma when I address the prime minister of Great Britain. One must say yes; must one say no? If I am truly Thatcherized, then one must say no. [laughter] But matters do not go like that. It was no pretence. We did, after all, agree on seven or eight very important aspects--engines, telecommunications, computers, the channel tunnel and much else to develop bilateral activities. And you well know that this is possible. They've recently been dormant. This is not Mrs Thatcher and Francois Mitterrand. It is Britain and France. We must admit that there is something, even a lot, to be done together. This perhaps was forgotten. If we have different stances with regard to the development of the Common Agricultural Policy, then we must talk it over. I agree to our talking it over. The treaty is the treaty. Community preferences, uniformity of prices, all these are bases on which we cannot negotiate since we have already done so. It is done. In this case, it should not have been signed, but Britain's signature has always been succeeded by a signature in gold. I do not doubt for a second that what is done is done on condition, of course, of adapting oneself to circumstances when one must. And I look to the discussion on the mandate with the consideration that one must not rest content on a budgetary approach. This is what I think on this subject.

Has France the means to contribute to the development of the Third World?--means in accordance with its capacity, which is not small, as I have just said. Don't make me repeat what I have already said: We are in favor of the recommendation made to us regarding 0.7 percent of our gross national product; we are in favor and even recommended 0.15 percent for the least developed countries. We have come out in favor of the existence of an energy policy in the Third World. We have come out in support for the reform of certain international institutions.

Visits by African heads of state take place; they are going to continue. We have an African policy and I think that rarely has harmony between France and these states flourished to this degree. We will see this for ourselves when most of them come to attend the French-African conference scheduled for early in November.

I recently, as a matter of fact, received President Goukouni of Chad and I told him: What matters to me is the unity of your country and its independence. But I am not setting conditions. The arrival of French doctors, engineers or technicians has as its sole purpose that of making things work, without laying down any prior political conditions. France is present everywhere it has to be.

From this viewpoint, France has [words indistinct] of international relations and it does not intend that [words indistinct] very rapidly the ambitions of the superpowers. If we in France wish to serve peace, we have to be present because no one should doubt France whenever one speaks of ambitions, imperialism or pawns to take.

Paris-Mexico: Yes it was there that the unique, original joint declaration was drawn up by Mexico and France to indicate that it would be advisable for the genocide to stop in El Salvador and that, for this purpose, it is absolutely necessary to recognize the reality of the popular movements today fighting against the junta government.

We are not minding our own business said some [words indistinct] and in what conditions they pronounced themselves? How many others approved our action instead? Well, in that case, it would be forbidden to have an opinion on the future of Poland. It would be forbidden to have an opinion on the future of Afghanistan. It would be forbidden to have an opinion on the future of Kampuchea.

We, for our part, believe that any outside interferences which ruin the hopes of these people are detestable interferences which have to be forbidden.

As to Poland, the principle of no external interference--I will deal rapidly with this. How can the reality of the ending of the last world war be denied? But at least a kind of consensus was established by it.

The country has its institutions. A strong trade union movement was born from among the workers, particularly in the working world. A great proof of the confirmation of trade union freedom which begs the question of freedom which could establish [words indistinct] arbitrary areas of freedom, without immediately crossing the frontiers in between. But if France has given its material and, I hope, psychological, assistance untiringly to allow the Poles to bear the crisis they are going through at the moment, we take care not to go any further since we want everyone to measure his own degree of responsibility. And we do not gamble on misfortune.

If it should happen, France, of course, would examine how this contagion of power or of interference should be stopped. Of course, this could only be based on the means which we have within the context of an equilibrium which is already very fragile. But in any case today, no one can hope to ruin the right of peoples to decide their own fate without France appealing to the conscience of the world. You will say that conscience is not very much compared with machineguns or rockets. I have already had the occasion to write that the sarcastic sentence of a head of state who speaks of the divisions at the disposal of the Vatican was perhaps lightly spoken. Power is not only to be found in weapons.

I would add, and this is important, that many questions were asked, and were worth being asked, if we had time, on East-West relations. France's relations with Spain are a small matter--it is impossible for me to deal with relations country by country especially as I have before me a journalist who is my usual partner. I think this must be the 15th time that I have explained to him what my positions are since the beginning of the year. But I can well understand that, speaking to an audience, he is fulfilling his role, his profession, by asking me the question again. I say: Negotiations on Spain's entry into the Common Market, am I in favor of negotiations? They must begin, but Spain must know that on the French side they are based on a number of realities of an economic, agricultural, industrial character, also of a regional character, and we cannot simply let the nine other European partners of France be referees in dealing with this problem.

One must realize that one cannot discuss [word indistinct] the problems of Spanish wines without perhaps posing at the same time the problem of American soya. This seems strange, but we understand it. I would also like to say that I regret that French-Spanish relations have not improved as much as I would have wished. This is due to the harshness of the times, to the nature of things, to a certain number of political realities which I do want to diminish. France, as you know, does not extradite. Obviously, it must not, even indirectly, give a hand to anything likely to destabilize Spanish democracy.

Regarding the Turkish consulate, I do not know the details of this affair. Our police force has a mission naturally not to...they cannot always foresee crimes or acts of violence. We are at the center of this action. It would be premature for me to express myself on this matter. The interior minister is a man who knows what he must do and I trust that he will lead this issue to a successful end, avoiding the worst.

Am I shacking up with the United States of America? Really, this is a question which a leading newspaper has asked itself today. Shacking up. For that matter I don't know whether the said newspaper approves or disapproves. In my opinion, it would rather approve, it must be said. [passage indistinct]

Now I must point out to you that I am not shacking up with America because the same newspaper, at the very same time--it is not the only one--expresses astonishment in its next feature over the fact that I am pursuing a policy radically opposed to that of the United States as regards Central America in particular and Latin America generally. And this is logical. It is because the journalist in question failed to note that my logic is that of my country, is that of France, which does not have to shack up with anyone.

The security of France depends first of all on its capacity to defend itself and then on the quality and rapidity of its alliances. In this respect, it is the United States which is our ally, among 13 others, with 13 others. It is normal to consider that what strengthens this defensive alliance, which, despite ourselves, at any rate despite us in France, was becoming a bloc--I would like to see the simultaneous disappearance of military blocs--it is normal that I would like to see this alliance equipped with the means enabling it to ensure the security of the West, that geographical summary, and of France.

If I notice an imbalance, in that case I intervene. And it is a very nice question to ask oneself, namely, what is the exact truth? For this, (?in order to satisfy my conscience) [words indistinct] I have read everything that could be read in the way of secret documents, or at least confidential documents which are available to me. I have had communicated to me all the documents that could emanate from abroad. I decided to summon a meeting of the Committee of National Defense on this very question: What is the truth, what is the balance of power?

Roughly speaking, the claims made are the following:

The Americans say: Potentially--this is not the case today--the order book is such that in 1985 the Soviet strategic force will be the strongest.

The Soviets reply: No, that is not entirely true. Even in Europe, there is an equilibrium, at least on the plane of theater weapons, of tactical nuclear weapons. They do not go so far as saying: It is not entirely true on the plane of conventional forces because everyone knows that the Soviet Union has an enormous advantage.

My personal conclusion is: Until 1984 or 1985, the real strategic equilibrium will be maintained. As from 1985, it risks being broken in such a way that the Soviet Union will have increased power at its disposal and that the American programs as a whole, as defined by competent authorities and as submitted in the future to the American Senate, will have the effect, as from 1985-86, of reversing the strength ratio, no doubt permitting the Americans to have the advantage by approximately 1990.

It is impossible to make head or tail of it. I must point out that if we have to wait--before negotiating--to know at what moment one player has driven his ball further than the other, we will never negotiate.

I belong to this world and to all the forces chosen by my country [as heard] and I do not intend changing. It is right that I should see to it that at least the demonstration not be given [as heard] that in 1985 and potentially in 1981 it would be the Soviet Union and its allies that would possess the means that would enable them within the timeframe of but a few minutes to dominate the world. I do not accuse the Soviet Union of aggressive intentions, bellicose intentions. It is a great nation, one that suffered much from the war, and its leaders lived through that era. I simply say that we are approaching a time of new generations which did not experience that war and I do not want to see the simple equilibrium of forces unbalanced to the point that war could break out. And that is why I sent up a cry of alarm at the massive advent of the SS-20's.

It is my hope that the measures taken -- and they are being taken on the Western side -- be followed right away, that is to say, before the end of the year, by negotiations between the great powers who alone are in a position to begin negotiations not on the halting of overarmament, but on disarmament.

We might be asked: And what about you in France? But hold on, matters are rather different. We are in Europe. We have, of course, strategic and tactical means. We are not faced with the problem of crossing the Atlantic. You know that what has to cross the Atlantic is called strategic and tactical what has to cross [words indistinct]. This is a rather summary way of explaining things, but sufficient. But we have the means to go far, so we will call that strategic, and to go near, and we will call that tactical. France has sought deterrent and that means that it has gone beyond the threshold from where doubts can be entertained about our force and our commitment. The national territory will be defended against all aggression and by the means at our disposal, which are not the means of graduated defense. We haven't the means because we would go under the barrier that would ruin our deterrent, to negotiate away a part of our nuclear armanent. [sentence as heard] And in any case, we refuse absolutely to be considered as an involved party in the gigantic gauntlet that the superpowers have thrown down to each other -- quite out of proportion with what we have at our disposal. We would like to be considered in this matter an element in the discussion of disarmement and collective security. We would offer all facilities. Paris is a fine and great capital and if it were thought desirable to so use it, each side would find the warmest welcome so that within a reasonable time, and by reasonable time I have just fixed this, the great negotiation on disarmament could begin.

With regard to the Soviet Union, I also said this just now, shall we have a meeting of the grand commission? But of course, a meeting has already been called. And the minister of state in charge of foreign trade, Mr Jobert, will lead the French delegation -- it is already appointed -- which will take part in December, I think, in a meeting in Moscow of the grand commission. We have continued to keep our promises and we will be very pleased with any exchange of views which will allow us to maintain the quality of our trade, and, if possible to have serious discussions on the conditions of peace. It is perfectly normal that we should not be pleased to have 200 extraordinary means trained on us, the west of Europe -- SS-20 missiles capable of destroying the whole Western military network from the north of Norway to the south of Italy. it is perfectly normal that this is talked about, as it is normal to talk about Israel, the Arab countries, about this and that.

Ladies and gentlemen: I will finish by saying that France's international policy rejects all restrictions. We reject American prohibitions, Soviet prohibitions, the prohibitions of all. There is no area where we have decided not to have an interest if it is in France's interest and in the interest of peace. Let entrenched ideas and habits disappear: No one will dictate our behavior to us -- and particularly not on the neutron bomb. We [words indistinct] the position of the communist party. The policy of the government is that which I have defined. The neutron bomb is still being studied in France. We have, moreover. gone quite long way in studying it. We do not envisage applying it for the movement. So we will not produce it. That is all I have to say to you, sir. If you have thought about these things, you will know there is a kind of incompatibility between the strategy of organizing the forward battle and using the whole of our nuclear force for any aim other than the sacred defense of our territory, but this does not stop France in any way from fulfilling its obligations in regard to its alliance.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would like -- I am sorry that this has lasted so long, but it is not my fault alone. I have a few little things to say, and two or three big ones, on domestic issues.

The nuclear submarine and the nuclear aircraft carrier: The earlier program will be implemented and even accelerated. The sixth submarine is under construction after experiencing a 3-year delay. I hav also said that it is my intention to start construction of the seventh as soon as possible, which will enable us from the early 1990's to enjoy constant mobility for at least three of these nuclear submarines, thus ensuring the security of France at long range.

As for the death penalty--disregarding the malice of the question asked--I will tell you, sir, that as a member of the socialist group, I put forward a measure proposed by the socialist group in parliament. Each one within this group knows the position I have assumed. I did not wait to become president to advocate the abolition of the death penalty and, as you know, this penalty was abolished by the socialist group.

Regarding nuclear energy, I will not go into it in detail here, but I will hold a press conference in this connection, if necessary. I will sum up my position for you by saying that the energy independence of France will be assured. While one can debate the nuclear projects introduced by the previous government, that is to say, for the production of electricity from nuclear powerplants, and the ones which we will implement, but overall--because we will enjoy the benefits of much greater energy savings, because we will enjoy the benefits of more new sources of energy, because we will enjoy the benefits of more coal and so forth--the industrial implication of all this means that in the next few years we will enjoy energy independence.

However, a debate is to be held in early October which will be open to all French people. It will be taken up to parliamentary level. If you wish to hear the government's answer, you should follow it assiduously and attentively.

Some more questions and I will have finished--on the cultural plan and the policy on research. But that does not prevent me from stating one or two other facts which seem to me indispensable if our information is to be complete.

Earlier on, we spoke about my trips. I wish to inform you that I will go to Saudi Arabia on Saturday for 2 full days; I will go to Algeria in the second half of November; I intend to go to Israel during the first 3 months of 1982; I have received many other invitations but I have decided to go to each of the countries of the European Community, accompanied by several of my ministers. I intend to preserve and increase the good and healthy French-German friendship and I intend to awaken the good French-British relations. I will deal with the other countries of the community, as full-fledged partners, and I will visit each of these countries with several members of my government.

Ladies and gentlemen, I thank you.

MITTERRAND, BENIN PRESIDENT DISCUSS RELATIONS

AB241614 Cotonou Domestic Service in French 1930 GMT 23 Sep 81

[Excerpts] [Benin] President Kerekou has been in Paris for 2 days now. He had a working luncheon with President Francois Mitterrand this afternoon.

At 1200, the French president appeared on the Elysee steps accompanied by his guest. President Francois Mitterrand was the first to speak to journalists:

[Begin recording] I had great pleasure in receiving and entertaining at lunch President Kerekou of the people's Republic of Benin this morning.

I knew him from afar and I also knew about the efforts he has made for the development of his country. It was for me and for the people accompanying him an opportunity to deepen our discussions on the possibility of development and underdevelopment and, at the same time, set up on a durable basis the good relations between our two countries. I do not have any other statement to make other than to repeat that President Kerekou is welcome to our country, France. [end recording]

For his part, the Beninese head of state stressed the atmosphere of friendship and perfect understanding which dominated the discussions and which, according to him, constitutes a real sign of frank, (?fruitful) and loyal cooperation between Benin and France:

[Begin recording] Mr President, because of the importance we attach to the first official working visit currently going on in your beautiful country, France, and in order not to give cause to the foreign press to wrongly interpret our objectives in responding positively to your invitation, we are going to make a short statement so that when we leave here, journalists cannot speak on our behalf and against the friendship we have just (?sealed) between us personally and between our two countries. It is a deliberate statement and we want the press to interpret it as such, without comments.

So, we have just held with French President Francois Mitterrand very cordial and warm discussions during which we made a broad survey of matters of common interest to our two countries and exchanged views on international issues. During the talks, which we can describe as historic, we noted with deep satisfaction the perfectly identical views between France and Benin on most questions discussed.

In this regard, our talks on bilateral issues were held on a sincere and frank atmosphere of mutual understanding marked by our common determination to further strengthen the longstanding bonds of friendship, solidarity and cooperation existing between our two peoples and our two countries. On this occasion, we above all expressed our firm political willingness to overcome as soon as possible the few difficulties which occurred in our relations--which are normal--in the past. We have particularly outlined the new framework for cooperation between the People's Republic of Benin and the Republic of France.

On international issues, we examined major political and economic problems facing the world in general and Africa in particular. In this regard, the situation in southern Africa, along with apartheid problems, were also examined with great interest, especially given the recent repeated odious armed aggressions against Angola by South Africa. Western Sahara and the Middle East also came up in our discussions.

Lastly as was expected, we thoroughly examined the major problems facing the development of the African Continent. In this regard, we must point out that our country, the People's Republic of Benin, which is one of the world's least developed countries, has been devoting all its efforts to its development since the advent of the revolution on 26 October 1972. This is why France's contribution to the development of our country is highly appreciated by all Beninese working masses. We have henceforth expressed to President Francois Mitterrand our hope that France will play a more decisive and active role in economic cooperation with our various countries. We also told the French president of our entire satisfaction with his courageous and constructive position in favor of all Third World countries in general and Africa in particular during the recent UN-sponsored conference on the least developed countries and with the explicit and precise explanation by the new French Government of its policy on cooperation and development. More clearly stated, I mean that I am leaving the Elysee with full optimism about the future relations between the People's Republic of Benin and the Republic of France.

I will also say that we were not mistaken in giving a positive response to the friendly invitation from Francois Mitterrand to visit him in Paris in a new political context which he has brought about and is maintaining relentlessly.

Messrs journalists, that is the substance of the talks which we have just had with the president of the Republic of France, Francois Mitterrand, in an atmosphere of real mutual understanding and frankness. Ready for the revolution, the struggle continues. [end recording]

ARMENIAN GUNMEN SURRENDER, REQUEST ASYLUM

[Excerpts] Paris, 25 Sep (AFP)--Armenian gunmen who seized the Turkish Consulate-General here before noon yesterday surrendered unconditionally and requested asylum early today after holding 60 hostages for 15 hours.

Four commandos burst into the consulate on the first floor of an office building in the Boulevard Haussmann not far from the Arch of Triumph, wounding the interim vice-consul general with five bullets. A Turkish guard was killed by a shot in the head during a scuffle and one of the gunmen was wounded.

Negotiations were carried out through a go-between, an Armenian "newsman," who stood under the consulate windows talking with a bearded gunman. The gunman used a woman hostage as a shield, holding a pistol to her head and a grenade in the other hand.

Meanwhile, 200 Turkish demonstrators whom police kept 50 meters (yards) away urged them to storm the consulate, and 60 Armenian demonstrators on the other side of the police demanded the release of Armenian political prisoners. Helmeted police with clubs broke up several fights when Turks reached the Armenians through side streets. Police said they hesitated to storm the consulate for several reasons: The Armenians were heavily armed--with a submachinegun, grenades and pistols--they released only one hostage, a little girl unable to tell what was happening inside, and because the gunmen acted unpredictably and went through phases of "hysterical excitement".

The hostages, mostly Turkish immigrant workers, were forced to lie down all in one room. They said they were fairly well treated, though they feared for their lives throughout the ordeal, and were given only 14 small loaves of bread to share.

Responsibility for the raid was claimed by the Armenian Secret Liberation Army (ASLA), which killed the Turkish ambassador here in 1975, the press attache in 1979 and two other diplomats last March 4. ASLA also bombed the Turkish consulates in Lyons and Strasbourg last year.

LA REPUBBLICA INTERVIEWS EGYPT'S BUTRUS GHALI

FM241039 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 18 Sep 81 p 10

[Magdi Allam interview with Egyptian Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Butrus Ghali in Rome; date not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] On what basis will negotiations on Palestinian autonomy be resumed when Israel persists in making a partial interpretation of autonomy, continues to regard the eastern sector of Jerusalem as an integral part of its own territory and continues to build new settlements in the occupied territories?

[Answer] When we started talks with the Israeli delegation in Alexandria a few weeks ago, the Israelis, represented by Defense Minister Ari'el Sharon, promised to introduce new provisions to create a climate of confidence in Gaza and on the West Bank, to give the Palestinian people hope in the peace initiative. The objective of the trilateral negotiations is to involve the Palestinian people in the negotiation. Egypt is trying to end the Israeli occupation of Gaza and the West Bank, and to arrange elections to set up a Palestinian government and authority which will be capable of negotiating with the Israelis. I would like to add that no alternative to the trilateral negotiations has hitherto been proposed. Neither the EEC, nor the OAU nor the United Nations has proposed an alternative. We are fully prepared to accept any new initiative for solving the Middle East crisis.

[Question] Egypt regards the agreement between Israel and the PLO on a cease-fire in Lebanon as an important development in the Arab-Israeli conflict--a development which should be extended to lead to mutual recognition. In your opinion, how can this recognition be effected in practical terms?

[Answer] Egypt tried to obtain this mutual recognition in November 1977 and I personally gave the PLO representative in Cairo an invitation to attend the preparatory conference at the Mena house. The aim was to bring about an initial meeting between Palestinians and Israelis. However, the Arab states refrained from taking part in the conference, as did the PLO, thus wasting this opportunity. Diplomatic efforts are being made to secure contact between the PLO and the Israeli Government, which might pave the way for mutual recognition. We have asked a few friendly states to work for a reconciliation between Israel and the Palestinians. I would like to add that there are various ways of attaining mutual recognition and they might conceivably be preceded by indirect contacts. What counts is for actual contact to be established between the two sides.

PCI'S PAJETTA LEAVES PRC AFTER 3-WEEK VISIT

[Text] Beijing, 24 Sep (ANSA)--Italian Communist Party official Giancarlo Pajetta left Beijing today at the end of a visit to China that lasted over three weeks. During his sojourn he met with Chinese Government leaders and members of the Chinese Communist party. His contacts with government leaders took place within the framework of a trip Pajetta made here with a delegation from the European Parliament. His contacts with Chinese Communist Party officials took part during a private stay that included a vacation at the resort area of Wuxi.

At a party level, the culminating part of his visit was a talk he had with Peng Chong, who besides being a member of the political office is also part of the Secretariat. Source close to Pajetta described the talk as very cordial and extremely frank. The Italian deputy made no comment, however. The New China News Agency today said that the two men discussed, in a friendly atmosphere, the internal Chinese situation, relations between the two parties and various international questions. Pajetta was seen off at the airport today by the party's deputy director for international contacts.

CUBAN PARTY DELEGATION ARRIVES, MEETS PCP AIDES

PM241011 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 17 Sep 81 p 2

[Text] At the PCP Central Committee's invitation, a Communist Party of Cuba [PCC] delegation comprising Jorge Valdes Rodriguez, Central Committee member and City of Havana Province second secretary, and Julio Ballesta, an official of the Central Committee General Department of Foreign Relations, visited Portugal 5 through 10 September.

The PCC delegation was received by PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal and held talks with a PCP delegation comprising Domingos Abrantes, member of the Political Commission and the Central Committee Secretariat; Manuel Pedro, member of the Central Committee and the Lisbon regional organization leadership; and Graca Filipe of the International Section.

The delegation took part in the AVANTE! festival, representing the PCC and the Cuban communist press. It also acquainted itself with various aspects of actual conditions in Portugal through visits to the Sorefame enterprise, the Alfredo Lima and Mouchao do Ingles agricultural cooperatives in Alpiarca and the municipal councils of Amadora, Alpiarca and Sobral de Monte Agraco.

During the talks, the PCC and PCP delegations exchanged information on the situation in their respective countries and their parties' activity and broached issues of the current international situation.

The PCC delegation expressed once more the Cuban Communists' and people's feelings of active solidarity with the Portuguese Communists in their struggle in defense of the workers' interests, the gains of the April revolution and the demcratic system enshrined in the construction.

The PCP delegation again expressed the Portuguese Communists' militant solidarity with the Cuban Communists and people in building and developing a socialist society and in the struggle in defense of their country's sovereignty and integrity in the face of U.S. imperialism's repeated provocations and threats.

The two delegations firmly condemned the criminal aggression perpetrated by the racist regime of South Africa against the People's Republic of Angola, threatening not only the Angolan people's territorial integrity and peace but also peace and security in Africa and in the world; and demanded the South African aggressors' rapid and unconditional withdrawal.

The PCP and PCC delegations emphasized the increased importance the present context assumed by the unity of action of the international communist movement and all democratic and progressive forces in the presence of imperialism's aggressive policy, which is endangering world peace, and bringing mankind to the brink of nuclear war.

The two delegations reaffirmed their parties' desire to continue to strengthen the relations of friendship and fraternal and solidarity cooperation existing between the PCP and th PCC on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, in the interest of the workers and peoples of Portugal and Cuba.

O AGON Report

NC240926 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 24 Sep 81 p 18

[Correspondent's report]

[Excerpts] Limassol, 23 Sep--A 21-year-old Arab, who was in possession of three maps--on which various locations in Nicosia, Limassol and Larnaca were marked--and a military compass, disclosed that he is a member of a Palestinian organization and carried out the bomb attack at 1030 today at the main office of the Shoham shipping company in Limassol. As a result of the attack, five employees--three women and two men--were injured, the men seriously.

From information and evidence that the police collected, they have concluded that the young Palestinian and other members of the same organization had plans to carry out more bomb attacks in the next few days against Israeli interests, and probably against embassies of countries that take a hostile stand toward the Palestinian struggle. Then they were to escape into the occupied territory from the area of a Nicosia suburb, probably Kaimakli, according to one of the maps found in his possession.

On the basis of the maps, the investigating authorities are trying to establish the points or buildings against which the bomb attacks were to be carried out in Nicosia and in other cities. But most important of all, they want information on the other members of the team. The only information he himself has given is that he arrived in Cyprus at the beginning of this month and stayed at a Larnaca hotel the name of which he refuses to disclose. It connot be ruled out that this admission may be misleading.

The Palestinian, who used two bombs of Russian make in his attack, told the police that his name is Muhammad Isma'il but he refused to divulge other information or particulars which the police want to know; for example, who assisted him and where the other members of the team are.

The police have information that at least two more members of the team were in the area where the bomb attack took place, and that they had a car with them to assist the arrested Palestinian. However, for reasons still unknown, they failed to make contact, probably due to the fact that the young Arab got confused because he was being chased.

Special police squads are discreetly carrying out searches to locate the hotel where the arrested Palestinian stayed; they do not rule out the possibility that he stayed in a hotel in the occupied area.

TA NEA CRITICIZES U.S. ENVOY'S STATEMENT

NC240702 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 24 Sep 81 p 5

[From the "Positions" column: "Mr Ewing"]

[Text] Mr Ewing, the new U.S. ambassador to Cyprus, has described the confirmation of the gap between the views of the two sides as "progress." He made this astonishing statement while testifying before the U.S. Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which was considering the ratification of his apppointment. And of course, he is not unfamiliar with the Cyprus problem. There cannot be any excuse that he was unaware that his statement amounted to absurdity.

Therefore, he should not be surprised when he is met with cautiousness on his arrival in Cyprus. This is so because, beyond his professional obligation to support the policy of the government which he represents, he also has a moral obligation to respect truth.

KKE, CUBAN PARTY DELEGATIONS ISSUE COMMUNIQUE

NC241624 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 24 Sep 81 p 3

["Text" of joint communique issued in Athens on 12 September 1981 by the delegations of the Cuban Communist Party and KKE Central Committees]

[Text] The delegations of the KKE Central Committee and the Cuban Communist Party [PCC] Central Committee, which recently visited our country, signed the following joint communique:

Following an invitation of the KKE Central Committee, a delegation of the PCC Central Committee, consisting of Comrades Raul Valdez Vivo, Central Committee member, and Dennys Guzman of the PCC Central Committee Foreign Relations Department, visited Greece from 2 to 13 September.

During their stay in the country, the PCC delegation was received by Comrade Kharilaos Florakis, general secretary of the KKE Central Committee, and had talks with a KKE Central Committee delegation consisting of Comrades A. Ambatielos, Central Committee Politburo member, and O. Kolozov, Central Committee member responsible for the Central Committee International Relations Department.

In addition, the KKE Central Committee guests had meetings with the guides [kathodhivitis] of the party organizations of Macedonia-Thrace, Thessaly and Piraievs; participated in the prefestival celebrations of Thessaloniki and Larissa; and watched the celebrations of the 7th Greek Communist Youth Festival [KKE] in Athens.

The Central Committee delegation laid a wreath at the Polytechnic and the shooting range of Kaisariani in memory of the heroes of the Polytechnic uprising and the victims of the Nazi occupation. Finally, the delegation visited Khaidhari municipality where the mayor and the municipal council hosted them.

During their meetings, which were marked by a warm comradely atmosphere, the delegations of the two parties discussed issues of common interest, especially issues concerning the international scene and the international revolutionary movement.

The PCC delegation briefed [the KKE Central Committee delegation] on the efforts of the communists and all the Cuban people to implement the resolutions of the 2d congress stressing the slogan: "Everything for production and defense." The KKE delegation expressed the solidarity of the communists and all the democrats of the country with the people of heroic Cuba who are struggling to build socialism and defend the revolution from the threats and aggressive activities of U.S. imperialism. It was also briefed on the situation in the country. It referred to the development of the popular movement and specifically to the struggles of the workers class for the defense of the rights and freedoms of the working people and all the people.

The KKE stressed the significance it attaches to the development and strengthening of the unity of the anti-imperialist and democratic forces for the defense of our country's independence, for the withdrawal from NATO and the EEC, for the abolition of the U.S. bases and nuclear weapons, for moves against the installation of new U.S. missiles and nuclear weapons in Western Europe, and for strengthening the movement against the production of the neutron bomb. The PCC delegation was also briefed on the struggles the KKE is waging to implement a policy of peace, friendship and solidarity with all peoples, and primarily with neighboring peoples.

The KKE Central Committee del gation also stressed to the guests that at this period our country has entered the preelection period. The KKE assessment is that the policy of the right has gone completely bankrupt under the people's incessant struggle, and that it is necessary and possible to implement a true democratic change in the country's life.

This will be the task of a democratic government which will implement a policy of national independence, democratization, limitation of the monopolies' unaccountability and the improvement of the peoples' lives. The implementation of such a policy can be made only by a government that will be supported by all the democratic forces desiring a change and by a grassroots popular movement. For this reason, the communists are struggling so that out of these elections the KKE can emerge stronger in the Chamber and among the people, something that will constitute a guarantee for the certain electoral defeat of the right and true change in the country.

The two delegations condemned the recent aggressive activities of imperialism, especially U.S. imperialism, like the production and installation of the neutron bomb, the Pershing-II and cruise intermediate missiles, the nonimplementation of the SALT-II agreement and so forth, which fall within the framework of the strategy of tension that imperialism has recently been following which aims at striking at detente, guaranteeing arms superiority, especially in nuclear arms, the regaining of lost positions, the undermining of the socialist camp and dealing blows at the national liberation and workers' movement.

They also stressed that currently the principal duty of all people, all democratic forces, all forces desiring peace and hating war, is the struggle for the defense of our planet from the danger of the calamitous nuclear war threatening it. For this purpose, the two parties support every act, every initiative aiming at the defense of peace and the removal of the danger of war, like the Soviet Union's pacific proposals which constitute a realistic basis for the termination of tension, the creation of an atmosphere of mutual trust, and the strengthening of detente in the world.

The two delegations expressed their solidarity with all the peoples who are struggling against imperialism, fascism and racism for their national liberation and national independence, for social progress and socialism.

They specifically expressed their solidarity with the people and government of the People's Republic of Angola which is struggling to repulse the attack of the South African racists and restore its sovereign rights and national independence.

In addition, the two parties expressed their solidarity with the people of Namibia who, under the guidance of SWAPO, are struggling to rid themselves of occupation by the racists in Pretoria and gain their national independence.

The delegations of the PCC and the KKE expressed their solidarity with the people of Lebanon and Palestine who are suffering from the constant barbaric Israeli raids. They supported their rightful demands and condemned the conspiracies of imperialism, Zionism and Arab reaction in the area. Once again, they declared that the Middle East problem can only be solved through the recognition of the PLO as the only permanent representative of the Palestinians, the withdrawal of all Israeli troops from the lands they occupied during the 1967 War, and the pursuit of a generally just and stable solution through an international conference with the participation of all the interested parties, including the PLO.

The two delegations supported the struggle waged by the Polish Communists for the defense of Poland's socialist gains, the repulsion of the undermining activities of the counter-revolution and the imperialist interventions.

The delegations ascertained a coincidence of viewpoints on all issues that were discussed. Once again, they stressed the close comradely bonds which link the two parties and peoples and declared their decision to develop the bonds even more on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism in the interest of the two parties and the two peoples, for the strengthening of the struggle of all the peoples of the world, for peace, detente and disarmament, for freedom, national independence and socialism.

Foreign Ministry Statement

[Turkish Foreign Ministry statement on takeover of Turkish Consulate General in Paris--read by announcer]

[Text] Our consulate general in Paris and the embassy cultural mission in the same building were raided by five or six armed Armenians at about 1215 Turkish time today. The persons who were in the consulate, including acting Chief Consul Kaya Inal, were taken hostage. National Education Adviser Zekai Baloglu and his assistant, Ibrahim Cankerten, plus about 10 students who were in the building, managed to escape through a back door and windows with the help of police. Deputy Consul Hayri Erol also managed to escape. It is understood that some other consulate general officials escaped as well. The French police have cordoned off the area around the consulate general, and no one is entering or coming out of the building. Further news will be announced later.

Demarche to France

[Text] Ankara, 24 Sep (AFP)--The Turkish Foreign Ministry tonight urged France to try to avoid "irreparable" events at the Turkish Consulate seized by Armenian gunmen in Paris today. But the minister stressed in a message to the French Embassy here that the "terrorists" should not escape unpunished.

The Turkish Government had previously indicated discontent over "softness" of the French police toward Armenian activities; in particular, over the occupation of the Turkish Airlines office by about ten Armenian demonstrators on June 11 who were allowed to leave the premises without being detained. Last March 4, the Armenian Secret Liberation Army (ASLA) claimed responsibility for the slaying of the social counsellor of the Turkish Embassy in Paris that day.

Gunmen's Surrender Reported

[Excerpts] The three Armenian gunmen who raided the building of the Turkish Consulate General in Paris, killed Turkish security official Cemal Ozen, and wounded Consul General Kayal Inal and a 4-year old girl, surrendered to the French police. According to latest reports reaching the Turkish Radio and Television [TRT] news center, the three Armenians surrendered at 0312 Turkish time after holding the consulate for 15 hours. Turkey undertook diplomatic action during the takeover of the consulate general to ensure the safety of the hostages and the ending of the takeover. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in New York attending the UN General Assembly sessions, had a talk with French foreign minister Claude Cheysson on the incident. Similar demarches were also undertaken by the Foreign Ministry in Ankara and the Turkish Embassy in Paris.

In a statement to the TRT on the incident, State Minister and Deputy Foreign Minister Ilhan Oztrak said he considers the seizure of the building by Armenian gunmen a new example of international terrorism. Asking for all countries to assess well the acts of international terrorism, Oztrak said: Unfortunately, Cemal Ozen, our security official in the consulate general, has been martyred in this barbarous incident; Consul General Kaya Inal is being treated in the hospital for the wounds he received. It is our deep-felt hope that he will recover completely in a short time.

TCP SECRETARY BILEN'S REPORT TO PARTY PLENUM

Part Eight

TA190855 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 19 Sep 81

[Part eight of report submitted by Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] Comrades: We must draw conclusions from the experience of our past work among the peasant masses. For example, let us recall the types of organization used in the past for working among the peasant masses. Let us mention two viewpoints on this subject. First, new peasant organizations must be established throughout the country. Second, this organization is a forced one. It is necessary to turn to existing organizations, particularly to cooperatives. Organizations like associations are useful only to the extent that they emerge from within the struggle of the masses and answer their needs.

Our party's experience has clearly shown the limitations of artificial associations. It was seen that the work of the association had no tangible achievements beyond scattering already limited forces. On the other hand, party organizations that renounced this forced attitude after the Central Committee plenum in 1980 conducted effective work in Peasant cooperatives. Now, in the light of this experience, we must find ways to work in various existing organizations of the peasantry and in cooperatives, to strengthen them.

For centuries, the main wish of the poor peasantry has been the acquisition of land. The peasants have always wanted to be free of the village chief, the usurer, the middleman, and free of poverty and oppression. However, in order to work among the peasant masses, it is necessary to know the wishes of the peasants, who have differing characteristics according to province and region. Our party's local organizations do not have sufficient knowledge of this. Our local propaganda reaches the peasants only on rare occasions. Even on these occasions, the propaganda talks about the worker-peasant alliance, the role of the peasantry and production in agriculture. It is not able, however, to defend the plain demands of the peasantry in a clear and comprehensible language. Rather than complain that the peasants cannot understand the communists, it is necessary to understand the peasants. Undoubtedly, it would not be realistic to expect our local organizations to solve, in one blow, the problem of organization in the villages. Naturally, this organization process is developing in difficult conditions. Therefore, in an effort by the party to turn toward the peasant masses, our local organizations in the cities must prepare a special (?program) of organization and implement it step by step. They must above all enhance agitation and propaganda among the peasant masses. Communists know that it is not possible to organize the party committees among the peasant masses by penetrating the villages disguised as peasants.

It is, above all, necessary to communicate to the peasants our agricultural program and our attitude toward the peasants' interests. This can only be achieved by getting to know their concrete demands. It is the duty of the party organizations to gather information about the villages and assess the information concerning village life. The party organizations possess important tools to achieve this end. Sympathizers among village teachers, the agricultural worker unions, workers who return to their villages and health officers provide wide opportunities to establish the ties between the villages and the party. Even if a party committee is not inside a village, it can become involved in village life through its agitation and propaganda and thus prepare the grounds--step by step--for organization among the peasants. The consistency of the work in the villages will determine the extent of the confidence that our party inspires in the Anatolian villager, who is known for his realism.

Alliance with political movements which are broadly based in the peasant masses and which influence them will play a significant role in establishing the worker-peasant alliance and creating new possibilities for organization among the peasants. While working among the peasantry, in the various organizations of the peasantry and in the cooperatives, it is necessary to establish--on the basis of the front policy of our party--an alliance and unity of action with political forces that are effective among the peasantry.

Communists and Kemalists

The unity of action between communists and Kemalists is a complicated issue because of the nature of Kemalism. Nevertheless, the destiny of our country calls for the establishment of a strong cooperation between these political forces. The Marxist-Leninist analysis on Kemalism is very important in enlightening the national democratic front forums. A [word indistinct] and historical approach and [word indistinct] is necessary to this analysis. The basis and development trends of this (?movement) must be determined in a scientific manner.

Many years ago, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] made various assessments of Kemalism. Even if there are rightist or leftist aspects in these assessments, the fundamental evaluations of our party are still correct. Kemalism emerged as the ideology of the national bourgeoisie. This ideology, which was shaped within the national liberation war, has an anti-imperialist essence. The struggle against the sultanate and the caliphate has attributed certain democratic characteristics to this ideology. Although Kemalism is a bourgeois ideology, it (?includes) to a certain extent, populist positions characteristic of the small bourgeoisie. However, because of its attitude contrary to the democratic rights of the working class and the people and its refusal to eradicate feudalism, Kemalism has not been able to shed its bourgeois limitations and [word indistinct].

While evaluating the historical role of Kemalism, communists do not forget that it has positive as well as negative aspects. This originates from the contradictory nature of the national bourgeoisie. However, in conclusion, communists stress the objectively progressive quality of the role of Kemalism in Turkish history. What is the current role of this ideology, which played a progressive role in our history? It is impossible to answer this question without discussing the evolution and internal disintegration of the bourgeoisie. This methodical approach must be complemented with the view that ideologies are sturdier than economic and social structures. This ideology, which was disseminated to the masses by the bourgeoisie, is still maintaining its influence on one or another stratum independent of the bourgeoisie.

The National Bourgeoisie--the bearer of the Kemalist ideology--has been subject to deep disintegration within itself. Its one branch escalated to monopolism and chose to cooperate with imperialism. Another branch remained outside the local and foreign monopolies. The urban middle classes, whose differences with the bourgeoisie were much more blurred in the first years of the republic, are now closer to the proletariat. The abyss between the middle classes and the monopolistic bourgeoisie became insurmountably deep. On the basis of this social foundation, Kemalism can no longer reflect the interests of a wide mass extending from the top of the bourgeoisie to the middle strata at the same time. On the other hand, how is it that forces that are contradictory to each other can defend Kemalism? It is possible to explain this phenomenon with the fact that Kemalism still influences the broad middle classes. Undoubtedly, the representatives of different classes and sectors do not defend Kemalism in the same context. These representatives defend the different variants of its nationalism. It is known that, particularly, old landowners who have become bourgeois and big traders who have established very close ties with imperialism support the most reactionary ideological movements against Kemalism.

The Democrat Party--which acted as their representative--and its extention, the Justice Party, constitute the political forces outside the Kemalist movement. These forces attack the anti-imperialist essence of Kemalism and incite the conservative and [word indistinct] prejudices in the population in a bid to increase their political influence.

At present, different trends have emerged within the Kemalist movement reflecting the interests of different classes. Broadly it is possible to classify these trends in three main groups. The first one consists of the Ataturkism concept which has now been raised to the level of official ideology. Those who defend this view are adapting Ataturkism to the interests of the current sovereign classes. For this purpose, they abandon the anti-imperialist essence of Kemalism and reduce it to the liberal tendency of the monopolies. Through this ideology, they defend NATOism; so much so that even the Opposers of Kemalism are able to use this type of Ataturkism in their own propaganda.

The second trend consists of the tendency prevalent in the RPP. The ideologues of the RPP argue in favor of renewing Kemalism with a social democratic reformism. This attitude originates from the RPP's class composition. Despite all its specific aspects, the Ataturkism concept of the RPP reflects the hesitant position of the bourgeoisie--whose interests clash with the local and foreign monopolies--between the imperialists and monopolies and the working class.

The third trend consists of the revolutionary and democratic interpretation of Kemalism. Ataturkists who subscribe to this view are in favor of anti-imperialist, antimonopolistic and revolutionary transformations. These forces, who in the past were concentrated in the magazine YON DEVRIM [DIRECTION REVOLUTION] and who are now in part included in the RPP, reflect the interests of the urban middle classes that are approaching the working class in their position.

There is no doubt that the boundaries between the different trends of Kemalism are not constant. There are overlaps. To the extent that these tendencies appeal to the same masses who are influenced by Kemalism, they are affected by each other as well as by the masses they appeal to.

Comrades: The fact that even the most reactionary circles are now engaged in antipeople actions under the banner of Ataturkism shows that they wish to attract to their side the masses who are influenced by Kemalism. We draw the following conclusion from this: Communists must appeal to Kemalists and cooperate with communists and with other progressive forces in a national democratic front.

Communists and the Army

Following the seizure of power by the generals on 12 September 1980, the politicization of the army reached a new level. This situation gives an urgency to the issue of the army. This development makes more vital the alliance between patriotic officers and non-commissioned officers and the working class. The problem is the direction which the inevitable politicization of the army will take. Will it develop in a totally antipeople direction, or will it develop in the direction of our national interests?

First, the TCP does not approve of the coarse and so-called class approach which ignores this dilemma and does nothing to solve it. This kind of attitude on the part of leftist extremists enables the reactionaries to provoke the army against the progressive forces. Second, our party is also opposed to pro-civilian bourgeois views that suppress this dilemma through words and claim that the problem will be solved when the army returns to the barracks. The bourgeois reformist and rightist parties are thus trying to regard the army alone as the defender of law and order. Third, the TCP also totally rejects the savior army concept, which is the inside-out form of civilianism. This viewpoint results, above all, in the unleashing of the army by the reactionaries and the militarists against the people in a hostile manner. The officers who want to save the country from its current situation are also subscribing the savior army concept. However, even these forces were--on numerous occasions--the victims of this erroneous view, by actions which they undertook without joining the working class and the masses.

Being content with the claim that the army is merely a tool for pressure in the hands of the sovereign classes is tantamount to simplifying Marxist-Leninist views on the issue of of the army. The army is a means for pressure in the hands of the sovereign classes; but, it is not a blind tool. Recent Turkish history has shown that, in several situations, the army played a (?relatively) independent role among the different groups of the bourgeoisie. It is necessary to view together the function of militarism, the reactionary role of the dependency on NATO, and the reactionary role of the policy of establishing a partnership between the monopolies and the army through organizations such as the Army Mutual Aid Organization [OYAK], as well as the reactions to these.

Will the officers and noncommissioned officers remain silent in the face of the increasingly dishonorable and antipeople role attributed to them by the Pentagon, NATO and the monopolies? Will the strict barrack discipline, with increased Ottoman despotism and the added modern U.S. army administration, be able to stifle the reactions of the officers and the noncommissioned officers? The replies to these questions depend on whether or not a unity of action can be established between the patriotic sectors of the army and all the other progressive forces; and on the extent to which the struggle for peace, independence and democracy will affect the ranks of the army.

Communists want the army to be democratized and stop being the striking force of imperialism and NATO. It is also clear that communists, who are opposed to armament, which is incited by imperialism, do not talk about an unarmed or unequipped army. We do see the necessity of a defense concept genuinely based on national interests and national independence in order to defend a country. This national security concept is entirely opposed to NATO's imperialist aggression program, which disregards our country"s defense. Under conditions of friendship with neighboring countries, an army sufficient for the country's defense can be sustained without tolerating the current heavy war expenditures. Dependence on NATO, on the other hand, further exacerbates this burden.

This issue consists of opposing armaments which serve the interests of imperialism beyond the needs for our country's defense; and preventing the existing weapons in the possession of the army from serving as a means of militarist threat against peace and democracy.

It is not impossible to prevent the army from being unleashed against the people in the political life of the country for increasingly more reactionary intentions each time; and to create an army that, with the people, defends the country against imperialism instead of an army that serves as a tool for reactionary dictatorships. Only in this way can the gap between the people and the army, which is becoming wider every day, be closed. Only in this way can the army return to the honorable tradition of the national liberation years.

Part Nine

[Part nine of report submitted by Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen on behalf of the party Politburo to the TCP Central Committee plenum; date not given--read by announcer]

[Text] The stand of the TCP concerning terror is clear. This stand is based on our Marxist-Leninist teachings, on the historic experiences of the international communist movement and the [word indistinct] sources of our own country. The founders of Marxism-Leninism were opposed in principle to terror. Lenin and the Bolsheviks considered terror as a counterrevolutionary means used by the reactionary forces not only against governments but also against the progressive forces. They stressed the socio-economic, political social and psychological causes of terror.

Terror is a fruit of crises experienced by capitalism. It is the expression in practice and theory of the disillusioned petit bourgeoisie that has lost all hope in the future and the class (?struggle). In the hands of the reactionary forces, terror has been transformed into a tool of systematic and ruthless political oppression against the people.

The history of all revolutions and class struggles note the links between terror and the counterrevolutionary forces and describe the uncompromising resistance waged against them mainly by the communists. Georgi Dimitrov, a famous fighter of the communist class movement, described in the Leipzig trials terror as a counterrevolutionary movement in its essence, and disclosed the terrorist characteristics of the Nazis.

The 26th Congress of the CPSU rejected categorically the ugly lies slandering the Soviet Union by the U.S. imperialists, the main supporters of international terrorism, proving once more that neither in practice nor in theory is terrorism compatible with Marxism-Leninism.

It is no coincidence that the countless terrorist organizations in our counrty belonging to various neofascist and maoist groups were united in their anticommunist and anti-Soviet stands. The following is an indisputable argument against those trying to slander the Turkish Communist movement with terror; The TCP has nothing to do with terror since it is a part of the international communist movement.

Comrades, an intensified ideological struggle is being waged in our country on the issue of terrorism as is the case in the world at large. Therefore, it will be beneficial to discuss some aspects of this issue. The propagandists of the bourgeoisie as well as the petit bourgeoisie are intentionally distorting the real causes of terror.

Reactionary circles in our counrtry are supporting the military junta's activities against terrorists in a bid to transform it into a crusade against the progressive forces. They try to hide the fact that the secret imperialist intelligence services provoke terror and that capitalism has undeniable links with terror.

Defining terror as a special method of fighting imported from abroad, measures are taken against the terrorist organizations under the climate of a state of war, thus trying to cover up for the nationwide oppression being conducted against the progressive forces.

The names by which these terrorist organizations have called their groups have only served to further strengthen this regional and anticommunist doctrine of the imperialists. In fact, these terrorists have called their groups by names like the People's Army, the Workers and Peasants Army, Armed Propaganda Unit, claiming that they were fighting against the state and therefore, the captured terrorists should be considered prisoners of war. By disregarding the fact that the deepening of the gap between the urban and rural areas was the result of the crises of capitalism and of the elements that are in the wrong side of the class struggle, these organizations became a tool in the provocations of CIA and MIT, the national intelligence organization.

The followers of the "ISCINI SESI" group--the leftist opportunists that were expelled from the TCP--are trying to explain terror with a Marxist parlance, claiming that terrorism is the armed uprising of the masses doing so at the expense of their lives. Thus they are trying to define a movement born from the crises of capitalism and counterrevolutionary in nature as a revolutionary development. Based on this assumption, the supporters of terrorism are pursuing an extreme leftist view which considers the marginal elements as real revolutionary vanguards of the whole of the proletariat.

The liberal and bourgeois reformist circles were to an extent aware of the social and economic causes of (?terror). However, instead of trying to eliminate these causes, they tried to appease the class struggle by offering small concessions. These circles wanted to use the struggle against terror as a tool in the struggle waged against the revolutionary forces. These forces had a [word indistinct] stand between the most reactionary forces and the progressive forces.

Communists, on the other hand, considered terror as the product of the socioeconomic crises experienced on all levels. They believe that terrorism can be eliminated by putting an end to the sovereignty of the collaborationist monopolies by fundamentally democratizing the state and by implementing the deep revolutionary measures. During the last 2 years, 5,000 of our compatriots were killed in terrorist incidents and 14,000 others were injured and some became invalids. These figures include our party members as well as party sympathizers. The responsibility for such a slaughter is very grave. That is why ideological circles as well as judicial organs are discussing this issue.

Reactionary forces are trying to save the accused fascist NAP members by trying to cover up for their acts of terror, accusing innocent people of being terrorists under the threat of torture. They exploit the fact that the extreme leftist and Maoist terrorists called their groups with names like: revolutionary, Marxist-Leninist or communist. They are trying to win the ideological war by mobilizing their propaganda organs in the media to this end. Through this ideological aggression, the most reactionary circles are trying to show that fascist terror as a reaction against the threat of communism. Under the circumstances, progressive forces can fight against such allegations only by revealing the real facts, by drawing a definite line between them and the extreme leftist groups, and by explaining to the masses whose purpose the incidents of terror served. The memory of numerous aggressions perpetrated by terrorist groups against the working class and its organizations in the period prior to 12 September 1980 are still fresh in the minds of the masses. The masses [words indistinct] of the struggle against terrorism constitutes a great resource for communists.
